BANKING (IRELAND) BILL.] On Motion of the Earl of Ripon, Bill read 3ª. An Amendment made.

The Marquess of Clanricarde proposed the insertion of a clause, as a rider, to empower the Hibernian and Royal Bank, in Dublin, to exercise equal privileges with the other banks; which, under this Bill, would have the power of issuing notes in Dublin. These two banks had been going on under the impression that these privileges would some day or other be conceded to them.

The Earl of Ripon felt it his duty to oppose the clause, but he did not wish to argue the question over again. The parties had been informed, as early as the year 1839, that no promise had been held out to any abstract notions of political economy.

Lord Brougham said, that no one felt more deeply than he the necessity of supporting the maritime defensive strength of the country; but he was for supporting it by the true and legitimate mode of increasing the commerce of the country, by the removal of its restrictions, by removing the fetters which bound up trade, and by giving every possible facility to the employment of capital, and by these means increase the already vast amount of the commercial resources of England. The coasting trade was a most valuable branch of those resources, and the nursery of our seamen. In estimating the state of the coasting trade, his noble Friend opposite totally forgot the increase of the coal mines, consequent on the increase of the metropolis; in the last sixty or seventy years the consumption of coals had been doubled. He totally dissented from the position that they were bound to discourage the inland trade for the sake of encouraging any other branch of commerce.

Lord Stanley stated, with reference to the number of ships and men engaged in the whale fishery, that the decrease which had taken place was not attributable to the reduction of duty on foreign whale oil. It was true that a great decrease had taken place between 1832 and 1842; but this was concurrently with the maintenance of the highly protective and almost prohibitory duty of 26*l.* 10*s.* per tun on foreign oil. In 1832, the price of whale oil in this country was 61*l.* per tun; in 1840, it had risen to 104*l.*; in 1832, 81 ships, of 26,393 tons, and employing 3,645 men, were engaged in the northern whale fishery; in 1842, the duty remaining the same, the number had fallen to 18 ships, of 5,400 tons, and employing only 810 men altogether. But since the reduction of the duty on the foreign article, on the contrary, a great increase in the trade had taken place; for, since 1842 to the present time, the number of ships had arisen from 18 to 32, the tonnage from 5,400 to 8,955, and the number of men employed from 800 to 1,440.

Lord Colchester called the attention of the Government to the great importance of maintaining the coasting trade, and particularly the sea-borne coal trade; because the seamen who were brought up in it, were formed in the very best school of their profession; and it was almost the only nursery left. If it should be destroyed, there must necessarily be an increase in the Estimates. He had no wish to see coals dear; but he trusted the Government would look seriously at the question with a view to keep up our maritime superiority.

The Earl of Haddington said, a greater blow could not be struck at our naval power than by the loss of the great nursery of seamen offered by the coal trade, from any considerable diminution of the number of ships engaged in the carriage of coals from the north of England. It would be satisfactory to their Lordships to know, that the coasting trade was now in the most vigorous condition, and increasing rather than diminishing. The general shipping of the country was also on the increase. The opening of the trade in the interior of the country was not at all likely to diminish the coasting trade. On the contrary, the cheapness that would be so caused, would create a greatly extended market; and if coals could be brought from the north to the other parts of the coast more cheaply than by railway, the demand would be supplied from that quarter. But of course the interior could be supplied direct by railway more cheaply than if they were brought round by sea to some part of the coast, and then sent overland.

Lord Kinnaird said, the quality of the Newcastle coals was superior to all the inland coal; and they always commanded a preference. The noble Marquess need be under no apprehension on that account; but he would recommend the noble Marquess to break up the monopoly at the coal pits. At the time of his visit to the district, coals were being shipped to France at 2*s.*, which, when sent to Dundee, were charged 6*s.* The coal owners were bound by regulation to produce only a certain quantity.

Lord Wharncliffe thought the monopoly was now entirely broken up, and that the trade was perfectly free.

The Marquess of Londonderry did not regret that he had brought forward this Motion; his sole object in doing which was to call their Lordships' attention to the importance of maintaining the coasting trade. There could be no doubt that the coal owners would prefer to send their coals to London by land carriage, if they found it the cheaper mode of conveyance. With regard to what was called the monopoly, an immense number of new collieries had lately been brought into the field to extend the supply, owing to railroads and other causes, which had lowered the price in London considerably; the new concerns not having so heavy rents to pay, or so great capital invested. The price of a ton of coals at the mouth of the pit was 7*s.* 6*d.*, while the freight to London consumed an equal sum, and the difference between 15*s.* and 26*s.*, the price at which they were delivered to the consumer, went to pay the port dues and corporation taxes of London. He thought it a great hardship that the individual coal owners should only have one-third of the price; and the fact was, that the best coals were sold in London at a loss.

The Duke of Wellington would say only one word in favour of a corporation with which he felt it an honour to be connected, he meant that of the Trinity House. He entreated their Lordships, in their resolution to maintain the coasting trade, not to lose sight of the lights on the coast of England, and of their immense importance to navigation.

Returns ordered.

OXFORD, WORCESTER, AND WOLVERHAMPTON RAILWAY.] Lord Brougham presented a petition from various parties praying to be heard by counsel against the Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton Railway.

Lord Redesdale said, he would take this opportunity of stating that a gross fraud had been practised upon the public by the Oxford and Worcester Company, which had adopted the broad gauge. When canvassing the public, they offered to carry iron ore at a penny per mile; but when they drove the rival line out of the field, they raised the charge to three-halfpence per mile.

Lord Hatherton did not think it likely that the Committee of the House of Commons could have been duped in the manner the noble Lord seemed to suppose; and he believed that the ironmasters of Staffordshire were much too sharp in looking after their own interests to allow any measure to be carried which might be prejudicial to those interests. It was required that a maximum toll clause should be inserted in all Railway Bills; but he believed nine-tenths of the manufacturers were very well satisfied with the low rate of charges which had hitherto been levied upon coal and iron. He believed that the rejection by the other House of Parliament of a line of railway projected by the London and Birmingham Company had had the good effect of preventing that company from possessing the monopoly they would otherwise have enjoyed in the iron districts.

The Marquess of Clanricarde said, it was worth while, as a matter of curiosity, to refer to the prospectus originally issued by the London and Birmingham Company, and the promises they then made, and to compare them with the prices charged by that company during part of the last and the preceding year. It would then be evident that no company had ever made such an attempt to deal unfairly by the public; for at the very time they raised their charges to a most unjustifiable height, their dividends were very great, and the price of the stock was immensely high. It was only because the attention of the country was called to the subject, and because threats were held out that means would be taken to compel them to lower their charges, that those charges were reduced.

Lord Brougham did not think it had been shown that the Committee of the House of Commons had not been duped. He knew that two instances had lately occurred in which the grossest frauds had been practised on Committees of the House of Commons. In one case, a gentleman named Whateley, a barrister, who intended to oppose the Bill, withdrew his opposition on the company promising to introduce a clause which would prevent the line of railway from passing close to his house; but when the Bill was passed, no such clause had been inserted. Another similar case had also occurred.

Lord Redesdale was understood to say, that the London and Birmingham Company had never raised their rate of charges, except in the case of the mail trains. The petition presented by the noble and learned Lord could be referred to the Committee, who would inquire into the matter.

After a few words in explanation from Lord Hatherton and Lord Redesdale,

The Duke of Richmond said, he considered it most desirable that Parliament should come to some understanding as to the tolls to be charged by railway companies. Scarcely two Bills had been introduced into Parliament in which it was proposed to charge similar rates of toll. It appeared to him that the best mode of remedying the difficulty would be to pass an Act providing that they would revise the rate of tolls charged by railway companies every five years. That step, in his opinion, would prevent the injurious results of monopoly, and secure the public interests; but, as one of the selected Members, he wished to guard himself against being supposed to express any opinion on this or any other Railway Bill which came before that House.

Subject at an end.

RAILWAY AND OTHER BILLS.] Order of the Day for resuming the Adjourned Debate on the 3rd Resolution (see June 3) read.

Lord Brougham then proposed the Third Resolution affecting the Standing Orders of their Lordships' House which he had submitted to the House yesterday, and the consideration of which had been postponed until to-day. The noble and learned Lord read the Resolution.

The Earl of Wicklow said, he objected to this Resolution, the effect of which, in his opinion, would be to induce the opponents of railroad projects to defer their opposition until the Bills came into their Lordships' House, under the expectation that they would then obtain their costs. He believed that this Resolution would not only prevent opposition to railway schemes in the other House, but that it would have the effect of bringing that opposition exclusively into their Lordships' House, and eventually a collision might ensue between the two Houses. Supposing a railway company refused to pay costs under this Resolution, had the House the power of levying them? They had not. They might recommend the company to pay costs, and in the event of non-compliance they might refuse to pass their Bill; but he thought such a course on the part of the House would be most unfair, for if a Committee of the House considered the project advantageous to the country generally, it would be most unjust to the community to reject it on such grounds.

The Duke of Richmond: If the Committee recommend costs to be paid to certain opposing parties, what so easy as to put a clause in the Bill for that purpose?

Lord Brougham said, the House had no power of levying money; but in the case of their judicial proceedings, they were in the constant habit of ordering parties to pay costs. If a person applied to that House for a divorce from his wife, the House might require him to allow her an annuity. He remembered a case in which a person suing for a divorce had offered to allow his wife 50*l.* a year; but the House refused to pass the Bill unless he allowed 150*l.* a year. What could be easier than to say to parties who brought in Railway Bills, "If you wish to carry this Bill, we think justice requires that you should pay the costs of parties who oppose it?" He would have no objection to allow the Resolution to stand over until Monday, in order that noble Lords might have time to consider the subject. He believed that this Resolution would afford great protection to private individuals; for, if railway projectors were aware that by the Standing Orders of that House they might have to pay the expenses of opposition, they would be disarmed of that power which they at present exercised with the utmost possible oppression. The companies frequently said, "We have a heavy purse—oppose us if you dare;" but this Resolution, if adopted, would prevent them from using those threats to deter their opponents from proceeding.

The following Amendments were then moved:—

"To add after the Word 'Parties' the following words—'incurred in the Proceedings before this House, or its Committee;' and at the End of the said Resolution the following Words—'That where any Committee has directed Expences to be paid by any such Party, it shall report such Direction to the House specially, with the Circumstances inducing them so to direct."

Debate on Resolution so amended, adjourned to Monday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, July 4, 1845.

3°. and passed:—Foreign Lotteries.

Private.—1°. Manchester and Leeds Railway (No. 2); Derby Court (Westminster).

Reported.— Lady's Island and Tacumshin Embankment; Brighton and Chichester Railway (Portsmouth Extension); Guildford, Chichester, and Portsmouth Railway; Direct London and Portsmouth Railway.

3°. and passed:—London and South Western Railway (No. 1); Erewash Valley Railway (No. 2); Norwich and Brandon Railway Deviation, and Diss and Dereham Branches; Glasgow Junction Railway.

PETITIONS PRESENTED. By Mr. B. Denison, from several places, against Grant to Maynooth College.—By Viscount Clive from a great number of places, against Union of St. Asaph and Bangor.—By Mr. Boyd, from Stockholders and others of Berrima, New South Wales, for Repeal of certain Acts relating to that Colony.—By Mr. Masterman, from William Thompson, Alderman of the City of London, and President of Christ's Hospital, against the Charitable Trusts Bill.—By Viscount Clive, from several places, for Establishment of County Courts.—By several Hon. Members, from a great number of places, in favour of the Ten Hours System in Factories.—By Mr. Cripps, and Mr. Hume, from several places, for Alteration of Lunatic Asylums and Pauper Lunatics Bill.—By Mr. S. Crawford, and Lord Henniker, from several places, against the Parochial Settlement Bill.—By Mr. Bright, from Inhabitants of Lerwick, Zetland, for Diminishing the Number of Public Houses.

OFFICERS OF THE HOUSE.] Mr. Baine presented a petition from two persons of the name of Scott, praying that the House would give leave to Mr. Paskin and three other officers of the House to attend as witnesses in the Common Pleas, in an action brought by Messrs. Scott against the hon. C. F. Berkeley.

Mr. Bernal said, that the circumstances out of which this trial and petition arose were these:—In the year 1837 or 1838 an application was made to the hon. Member for Cheltenham (Mr. C. Berkeley) to become a director in the Steam Navigation Company to India by the Cape of Good Hope. That offer Mr. Berkeley declined, and he heard no more of it for a time; but at length it came to his knowledge that a private Bill had passed through the House, and that his name had been inserted in it as a director, in (as we understood) the same company; but his hon. Friend had assured him (Mr. Bernal) that such a proceeding was without his sanction or knowledge. The speculation did not succeed, and not long after an action was brought against his hon. Friend and others for a sum of 30,000*l.*, the expense of building a ship for the company at Beyrout. Under these circumstances he hoped the House would reject the prayer of the petition, by negativing the Motion.

Mr. C. Berkeley was quite willing that the Motion should be carried, as far as he was personally concerned, but positively denied that his name had been inserted in the Bill with his approbation.

Mr. Warburton did not think the House would be justified in stopping the progress of a cause merely because an hon. Member was concerned in it as a defendant. He imagined that the hon. Member would be anxious that the whole matter should be fully investigated.

Mr. C. Berkeley added that he had no wish to stand in the way of the most searching inquiry. His name had been used without any authority from him.

Mr. Hume urged that whatever was usually done in such cases, ought to be done in this case.

Sir G. Clerk did not see how the officers of the House could be wanted to identify a Member, as was alleged in the petition, when so many other means of identification must exist. He considered the prayer of the petition unprecedented, and though the House would never stand in the way of public justice, it would not consent that its officers should be required to attend a court of law on so frivolous a ground.

Motion negatived.

MESSAGE FROM THE CROWN—RAILWAY ADDRESS.] Colonel Dawson Damer appeared at the bar, and stated that, in reply to an Address which had been presented to Her Majesty, he was commanded to present the following Answer:—

"I have received your Address upon the subject of securing an uniformity of Gauge for Railways in Great Britain.

"My consideration shall be given to the matter to which your Address refers."

AFFRAY AT BALLINHASSIG.] In reply to a question from Mr. Bouverie,

Sir T. Fremantle said, that he had received an account of the affray at Ballinhassig, in the neighbourhood of Cork. It appeared that a number of persons had assembled on the evening of a fair, and that the affray was caused by an attempt to rescue a man who had been taken into custody by the police. He had not received the accounts in detail, but he regretted to say that the circumstances, as they appeared in the public papers, were in the main correct. Several lives had been lost. As to whether the police were deserving of blame or not, he could not give an opinion until he had received further information. From that which he had already received, it would appear that they were not blameable; for when they fired at the people he was given to understand that they did it in order to preserve their own lives. As he had before said, an attempt was made to rescue a prisoner, who was removed to a place of confinement, the doors and windows of which were broken, and the roof was nearly demolished, when the police were driven to the necessity of firing on the people.

Mr. Sheil asked if any inquiry had been directed to be made into this unfortunate transaction?

Sir T. Fremantle said, that the coroner's inquest was to take place, and great care would be taken that it should be conducted with all the necessary formalities.

If that investigation did not bring out all the circumstances satisfactorily, it would be the duty of the Government to direct further inquiry.

COMMONS' ENCLOSURE BILL.] On the Motion that the Speaker do leave the Chair to go into Committee on the Commons' Enclosure Bill,

Mr. Sharman Crawford rose to move the postponement of the Bill until next Session. It appeared to him that the Bill would take away the rights of common from all future generations, and that the benefits of such rights of common would be taken away from the poor without any adequate compensation. The provisions of the Bill would offer a bribe to those who had the present use of those rights to sell that which they had no power to dispose of, namely, the rights of future generations. Ten acres was the utmost amount of common allowed for a population of from ten thousand to thirty thousand. He did not object to enclosures of commons on just and equitable terms, but the interests of the poor were not provided for by the Bill before the House. If the pasturage of cows on commons was subject to proper regulations, it would be of great benefit to the poor man. The experience of past Enclosure Bills, proved to him that the interests of the poor were not cared for. It was said, that the poor would benefit by the employment which the enclosure of commons would give rise to; but he thought that was very doubtful—he did not think the evidence of the past was very encouraging on this point. From the reign of Queen Anne down to the reign of George the Fourth, upwards of 6,000,000 acres of land had been enclosed; he did not, however, think that the employment of the poor and the improvement of their means would bear any proportion to the quantity of land which had been enclosed. Waste land, if applied to the purposes of small occupation, would be of great benefit to the poor, both by increasing their employment, and their supply of food. The House did not seem to like small occupancies, and the example of Ireland had been referred to. It was, however, unfair to say that the distress of the people of Ireland arose from small occupancies. The following was tne average size of farms in different counties, computed on the number of arable acres in each county, and taken from the population returns of 1841; Armagh, eleven acres; Down, fifteen acres; Meath, thirty-seven acres; Cork, 113 acres; Galway, thirty acres; Mayo, twenty-three acres. The wages of the Irish labourers did not exceed 6*d.* or 8*d.* a day, and they were therefore driven to the necessity of occupying small tenements. Mr. George Nicholls, in his Third Report on Holland and Belgium, stated—

"The farms in Belgium rarely exceed 100 acres; the number containing fifty acres is not great; those of thirty and twenty acres are more numerous; but the number of holdings of from five to ten fifteen and twenty acres is very considerable, especially those of the smaller extent, and to these I chiefly confined my inquiries."

It further appeared that the small farms, of from five to ten acres, which abounded in many parts of Belgium, closely resembled the small holdings in Ireland; but the small Irish holder, in many cases, existed in a miserable state, destitute of the common comforts and conveniences of civilized life, whilst the Belgian peasant farmer enjoyed a large portion of these comforts. Mr. Nicholls described the houses, the mode of living, the mode of management, the dress and condition of the small occupier, which in every respect indicated the greatest degree of rural comfort. Mr. Nicholls also said—

"The productive powers of the soil are inferior to the soil of Ireland. To the soil and climate, therefore, the Belgian farmer did not owe his superiority in comfort over the Irish cultivator, but to the system of cultivation, and the habits of economy and forethought of the people."

Mr. Nicholls said, that in a farm of six acres, the whole was worked by spade labour, and that the farmer had no assistance save that of his wife and children, excepting occasionally the aid of a neighbour or hired labourer in the harvest season. It was most gratifying to observe the comfort displayed in the whole economy of these small cultivators, and the respectability in which they lived. He described the circumstances of a particular small occupier in Ghent:—

"He had a wife and five children, and appeared to live in much comfort. He paid for house and land 9*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.* per annum. He owed little or nothing, but had no capital beyond that employed on his farm. He questioned him respecting his resources in case of sickness. He replied, that an illness of long duration would press heavily on him, and he might be obliged to sell part of his stock. If his wife and family were long ill, the doctor would give him credit, and he would, if he retained his strength, pay him in a year or two. The thought of applying for assistance in any quarter never appeared to have entered his mind."

Mr. Nicholls added—

"As far as I could learn, there was no tendency to the subdivision of the small holdings. I heard of none under five acres held by the class of peasant farmers; and six, seven, or eight acres is the more common size."

Mr. Laing, in his "Notes of a Traveller," said—

"The first operation in reclaiming land from a state of nature is certainly to plant it with men." . . . "It is the time only, and that time not valued, of the small proprietor, which can fertilize, bit by bit, such land;"

(alluding to the poor, sandy, sterile heath land of Holland). Speaking of the outcry against small holders in Ireland, Mr. Laing said—

"They do not consider the somewhat important difference of people being the owners or not the owners of the land divided."

He also instanced, in support of the benefit of small holdings, Belgium, Switzerland, Norway, and Tuscany, where forty-eight families in every hundred had land as their own property. He was of opinion that the Bill was calculated to benefit chiefly the landed proprietors, and, if so, it was unfair that the people at large should have to pay for Commissioners who were not intended to do them any service whatever. He would repeat, that the Bill was a landlords' Act; and he was farther of opinion, that whatever land was not now directly given up by this measure to the lords of the manor would ultimately come into their possession, because the small holders would be brought up by them, and all would thus become theirs. Another objection which he had to the Bill proceeding at present was, that it contained no less than 161 clauses; and he would put it to the House whether it was fair that a measure containing so many clauses, and such important provisions, should be brought forward at this late period of the Session? Under these circumstances, he had felt it to be his duty to record his dissent from the principle of the Bill, by moving its postponement until next Session. He thought he had given sufficient reasons for the measure being delayed, at least for that period; and he would, therefore beg leave to move that the House go into Committee on the Bill that day three months.

Colonel Sibthorp said, he fully agreed with the hon. Member for Rochdale, who had just sat down, that it was better to postpone the consideration of the Bill for another Session. There were so many interests concerned in the provisions of this Bill, that he confessed he thought the present was not a period of the Session when they could satisfactorily take the matter into consideration. He confessed he thought that the Bill was a vast improvement upon the measure that had been introduced by his noble Friend opposite, the Member for North Lincolnshire (Lord Worsley); but still there were many parts of it to which he had the strongest objection. It would, for instance, give great powers to men who were wholly unacquainted with the various parts of the country with which they would have to interfere, and where these inclosures would take place. Besides, he had no great predilection for Commissioners; and, he believed, the country agreed with him in that. They had sufficient experience already of the expenses of Commissioners, and of the little good which they effected. They had instances of that in the Poor Law Commissioners and in the Tithe Commissioners. These latter originated in the year 1836, and from that time to the present, they had cost the country some hundreds of thousands of pounds; and, after all, had done little or nothing for it. This Bill would give great powers to the lords of the manor. It would enable those individuals to take good care of themselves; and he had some misgivings about the manner in which they would exercise the power given to them. On going into Committee, he should endeavour to do his duty in improving the measure, and he certainly should aid his noble Friend (the Earl of Lincoln) as far as he possibly could.

Lord Worsley hoped the House would direct its attention to what he conceived to be the grounds on which this Bill rested. He had not had an opportunity of being present in the House when the Bill had been introduced by the noble Lord (the Earl of Lincoln); and he would, therefore, wish briefly to refer to what had already been done with respect to this subject. Hon. Gentlemen would, perhaps, recollect that he had himself introduced a Bill of this description three years ago, and with the permission of the House he would beg leave briefly to explain the progress of the measure from that period up to the present time. It was in the year 1837, that at the suggestion of one of his constituents, he brought in a Bill to facilitate the making of common fields enclosures; and having been fortunate enough to succeed in getting it passed into a law, he had for two or three years afterwards constant applications from parties connected with waste lands, pressing him to bring in a Bill for extending the provisions of his former measure. From the difficulties, however, which he had to contend against in the progress of the first Bill, he did not wish to do so; until the year 1843, when there were so many applications made to him on the subject, and so many of the hon. Gentlemen who had voted with him in 1837, promised him their support and assistance, that he was induced to comply with the solicitations that had been made to him. He had been selected as the fittest Member to bring the subject forward in the House, in consequence of his connexion with the former Bill; and because it so happened that he was neither directly nor indirectly connected with any land which this Bill or any general Enclosure Act could affect. The original Bill of 1837 had, he was aware, many imperfections, which were, to a great extent, to be attributed to his want of ability; but the subsequent measure which had been introduced by him had been prepared with great care, as affecting the rights and interests of a much larger class of persons. When the Bill of 1842 had been first drawn up, the Commissioners were left blank; and he expressly provided in the measure, that one of the Principal Secretaries of State should be the party to appoint the Commissioners, and that he was to be a party in carrying out the Bill. He then inserted the names of the Tithe Commissioners, against their express remonstrances, and merely because he believed them to be the fittest parties for carrying the measure into execution. It was only right that he should state this, because an impression had gone abroad that as the duties of the Tithe Commissioners would very soon cease, the insertion of their names in the Bill was a job on their part, in order to get their offices made perpetual. He wished, therefore, it should be known that it was his own suggestion, and, in fact, contrary to the wishes of the Tithe Commissioners, that he had mentioned them in the Bill. He should add, that he had been under the impression at first that the Tithe Commission would last. His Bill was not successful the first year, in consequence of the late period in the Session in which it had been introduced; and in the year after—1844—in consequence of the time devoted to private matters, there would have been very little chance of getting on with it. The Government then conceived that the House would not pay that attention to the question which its importance required, without having the Report of a Committee upon it. A Committee had been accordingly named; and the noble Lord opposite (the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster) could bear testimony with him to the exertions which that Committee had used to discharge the task entrusted to them in the most efficient manner. They continued their sittings for a considerable time, and collected the evidence of a great number of witnesses from different counties in England and Wales; and the result was, that, with the exception of the noble Lord (Lord Granville Somerset) alone, the Committee were unanimous in favour of a general Act. Accordingly, in the present Session, before he returned to England, he got his hon. Friend the Member for Cockermouth to give notice, in his name, that it was his intention to introduce a Bill on the subject at an early date. Shortly afterwards, he received a communication from the noble Lord opposite (Lord Lincoln), that the Government had it in contemplation to take up the question, and introduce a Bill at once in the House. It had been stated by some persons that he (Lord Worsley) was badly treated by the Government, in having the measure taken out of his hands. In this feeling he did not at all participate. He certainly thought that the Bill now before the House would require some important alterations to make it successful; but he was so sensible of the importance of having the measure brought forward on the responsibility of the Government, and of having as little time as possible lost in bringing it under the consideration of Parliament, that he could not but feel gratified at the course which had been taken. He should be exceedingly sorry if the opposition which was now offered to the Bill, were to be persevered in, and if the House were not to proceed with it in Committee. He would not detain the House with any lengthened observations on the subject at present. He could assure his hon. Friend who had moved this Amendment, that if he would take the trouble to look into the evidence that had been taken before the Committee, he would find abundant proofs in it of the advantages which it was calculated to afford to the poor in the vicinity of these commons. He would find that labourers who now found a difficulty in getting employment even for a short time, near these unenclosed lands, would be afforded an opportunity of earning a considerable amount of wages in enclosing and bringing them into a state of cultivation; and there was also abundant evidence of improvement being thus effected in the condition of these poor people, and of constant employment being afforded to them in places where now, from the unwillingness of the farmers to employ them, they were living in the most wretched condition. He trusted hon. Gentlemen would, at least, take the trouble of looking into the Report of the Committee before they came to any conclusion hostile to the measure. They would find the evidence of many men, who were most competent to judge of the question, all in favour of such a measure; and that, as he had before stated, the Committee, with the exception of the noble Lord the Chancellor for the Duchy of Lancaster alone, had come to a unanimous decision in favour of such a Bill being passed. He would not detain the House longer; but he could not avoid taking that opportunity of expressing his gratitude to his noble Friend opposite (the Earl of Lincoln), for the very complimentary terms in which he had spoken of him in his (Lord Worsley's) absence, in connection with the subject now before the House, and his gratification that a measure which had given him a great deal of trouble, and for the success of which he felt a lively interest, was likely to become the law of the land. But at the same time he should repeat that he sincerely hoped the Amendments which he suggested in the measure, would meet with the favourable consideration of the Government, as without them he believed there would be felt a want of confidence on the part of those who would be anxious to avail themselves of the provisions of the Act, and who would be deterred by an apprehension of great expense from coming before Parliament. He would propose no Amendment with regard to the Commissoners, though he had a very strong opinion that the course proposed in the Bill was not the best one that could be taken. It was said that a Commission presided over by the chief Commissioner of Woods and Forests would form a very proper board to be entrusted with the management of this law; but it should be recollected by the House that the Commissioners of Woods and Forests were the parties who had the management of all property of which the Crown was lord of the manor, both in Wales and in many parts of England; and that by the present Bill they would establish a board of commissioners over them. When they got into Committee on the Bill, he would, he thought, be able to show that the Bill proposed giving too much power to the valuers. It gave them power of adjudicating on claims; and he believed the evidence would bear him out in saying that this would open up many very great difficulties, which would require to be dealt with by men of considerable experience, and not by mere land agents. It might be supposed by some that these commons or unenclosed lands were of small extent. Such was not the fact in many instances; and the Committee had one case in particular mentioned before them, in which there were no less than 19,000 acres of unenclosed land. The valuers would thus be given very considerable authority. There were also in many cases portions of these lands occupied by squatters, who would be bringing claims before these valuers, and thus more power would be given to that description of persons, than he thought ought to be entrusted to them. He hoped, therefore, that the noble Lord would consider well before he allowed such a measure to pass unaltered. If his Bill, and that now before the House, were compared together clause by clause, there would be very little difference found as far as the mere marginal notes were concerned; but when the clauses were read through, very material differences, it would be found, had been introduced in the working of the measure. He had to express a hope that the Bill would be allowed to proceed in Committee. He was afraid that a Bill with 161 clauses would not pass through Committee as quickly as the Government seemed to expect; but he, at the same time, hoped that more hon. Members would be found to take a greater interest in having it proceeded with, than was the case on former occasions; and that at all events there would be no danger of the House being counted out during its progress.

Mr. Hume was sorry to feel it to be his duty to oppose this Bill; but he was bound to give his support to the Amendment on the same grounds on which he had resisted the measures of the noble Lord (Lord Worsley) in former years. The noble Lord might recollect that he had invariably opposed his Motions on this subject; and in adopting a similar course on the present occasion, he felt bound to express his surprise at the manner in which so important an enactment was allowed to proceed, as if it were some mere every-day occurrence, and not deserving of any particular attention from the House. He considered that, generally speaking, all lands that were worth enclosing had already been enclosed, and any which were not, ought to be interfered with only by special application to the House and on its own merits. He objected to the Bill because it was a landed proprietors' Bill, be they large or small; and because it would take away from poor men—from those who constituted the great mass of the community—the advantages which they now possessed in the enjoyment of air and exercise on these commons. He was sorry to hear from a legal Friend near him, that commonages were all private property. In his opinion, and as he interpreted the law, they comprised lands never granted to any individuals; but belonging to the Crown for the benefit of the public. He, therefore, regarded this Bill as one for taking away the little public property which still remained available for the health and enjoyment of the community, in order to divide it amongst the landed proprietors. It was true that some persons who possessed small spots of land would obtain a proportionate share of the common to be enclosed; but still the great advantage would clearly be derived by the large proprietors; while the poor, who now had the privilege of going through the lands, were to be entirely excluded, as the whole would be enclosed. He, therefore, considered the question as politically of importance; and if he had objected to it while in the hands of the noble Lord, his objection was still stronger when it was taken up by the Government. He objected to persons who would be removed with every change of Ministry, being entrusted with the property of the community at large. He had no objection that the individual who was to be placed at the head of the Crown lands should have a seat in the Cabinet, and be subject to those changes; but it did appear to him, that a public officer so circumstanced and filling such a post, ought not to be placed over two other commissioners in a board which would have the power of interfering with the property of the public. The noble Lord had stated, very properly, that the evidence given before the Committee was favourable to such a measure as the present; but he should be glad to hear what trouble had been taken by the Committee to get the evidence of the poor man and the labourer on the matter? What evidence had they from the poor who used these commons? In the absence of any such evidence, he had therefore a right to say that it was a one-sided Report in favour of the landed proprietors, large and small as they might be; and on that ground he opposed any measure founded upon it, as taking away the rights of the community at large. Even the landed proprietors themselves ought, he thought, to be cautious in passing such a measure. They ought to recollect that the effect of it would be to alter the character of the labouring population, and to reduce them to the condition of the poor inhabitants of the dirty streets and lanes of the towns. With the exception of some 50 or 100 square yards of a bit of green in the midst of a village, they proposed to grasp at the whole of the commonages of the land. The House ought, he thought, to consider seriously before they swept away at once the little independent property that remained in the country. The right hon. Baronet (Sir Robert Peel), who was not then in his place, admitted on a former occasion that it was a question whether the poor ought not to be more indentified with the land; and he would wish to put it to that right hon. Gentleman, whether getting rid altogether of the connexion of the poor with the soil, was not an evil which would affect society at large? He had no interest against this Bill. On the contrary, his individual interests would go in favour of it; but when he looked at the mass of persons who would be shut out from all the opportunities of recreation which they now enjoyed, he could not consent to the passing of such a measure. In the next place, he objected to the proposal for paying out of the Consolidated Fund the expenses of all these enclosures, undertaken for the benefit of the landed proprietors, without any benefit being obtained by the public at large. It was on that ground that he had before objected to the Tithe Commission; and in proof that he was right on that occasion, he might observe that, though the Commission had only been a few years in existence, it had already caused an expense to the country of 600,000*l.* ["No, no!"] He believed the sum to be about what he had stated. The expense of the Tithe Commission was upwards of 60,000*l.* a year, and that, in the ten years since its appointment, would give a sum of 600,000*l.* But whatever the expense might be, it was paid out of the general taxation of the country, while it benefited only those who were in possession of the tithes and advowsons. He should, therefore, if this Bill got into Committee, offer every opposition to this clause; but for the present he should express his decided disapproval of the principle of the Bill. The measure had been already postponed two Sessions, and he thought it would be better, under all the circumstances, for the House now to consent to its postponement for another year.

Mr. Trelawny said, his hon. Friend who had just sat down, had commenced by saying, that this was a landlords' Bill; and he asked, why should they not come before Parliament in every case in which it was desirable to effect enclosures of waste ground? But would the House bear in mind the great expense of getting one of these Enclosure Bills passed? They would require to have some 4,000 Enclosure Bills passed, each of which would cost the parties from 1,000*l.* to 2,000*l.* They had already evidence of the manner in which the Commissioners and attorneys engaged in these enclosure cases proceeded. It would appear that they were in the habit of meeting at ten o'clock in the morning to breakfast. They then cracked their jokes, to use the words of the witnesses, until twelve, and after dining together at three o'clock, proceeded then to the business of the day. There were, in his opinion, several faults in the present measure. For instance, it required the landlord's veto to be given in each case. That, he supposed, was intended to prevent any supposed interference with the rights of property. The hon. Member read several extracts from the evidence of some of the clergymen examined before the Committee, to show the state in which the commons were kept, and the poverty and wretchedness to be found around them. The hon. Member for Rochdale was wrong in supposing that these commons were the property of the public at large, as they were the property of a number of individuals residing in their immediate vicinity. He would not, however, trouble the House at any further length at present.

Viscount Palmerston said, he should support the general principles of the Bill; but he would reserve to himself the right of thinking that some of the details might be improved. He felt anxious, before the House came to a division on the Amendment, to say a few words on the argument of his hon. Friend. The hon. Member conceived that the Bill was a landlords' Bill—that the object of it was to take away from the people of this country lands which he seemed to think were now vested in the Crown for the use of the population at large. Now, he differed entirely from his hon. Friend as to his legal theory, as well as from his view of the Bill. Nothing, he believed, could be more indisputable in point of law, than that the common land of the country does not belong to the community at large, but to a certain number of individuals resident in the neighbourhood. There was no question, but that all the commons in the country were the property of some one, or some set of persons. As to this Bill being to the prejudice of the labouring classes, he considered that it was a Bill essentially for the interest of the agricultural labourers. There was altogether in England and Wales about 37,000,000 of acres of land, and of these 10,000,000 would come under the operation of this Bill. It was in evidence before the Committee, that, taking one description of land with another, and setting aside the temporary employment that would be afforded before the enclosures could be completed, in the draining, the fencing, the ditching the lands, and in the erection of the variety of buildings which would be consequent upon the enclosures, that there would be a permanent additional employment to the agricultural labouring classes, to the extent of one labourer and his family finding employment, for every fifty acres of land; so that under the operation of this Bill, employment would be afforded to 200,000 families of agricultural labourers. It had been stated very recently, in the course of a debate in that House, that the condition of the labourer did not so much depend on the nature of his employment on the land, as on the wages which he received; and therefore this Bill, by increasing the amount of employment for the agricultural labourers, would increase their wages, and thus prove an important boon to the labouring classes. His hon. Friend said, that the labouring classes would be deprived of the commons and waste lands, which afforded them places for air and exercise. From such language, it might be supposed that the operation of this Bill would apply to such places as Clapham-common, and Turnham-green, and similar open spaces which were surrounded with buildings. Nothing, however, was more unlike reality; for by one of the clauses of the Bill, it was provided that all open spaces, within a certain number of miles from a town, containing also a certain number of inhabitants, should be excluded from the operation of the Bill. For instance, the distance from London was to be ten miles, and a proportionate distance according to the population of a place. Thus, then, no land would be inclosed within a specified distance of a town, and in no case would the village green be enclosed. But what was the sort of air and exercise which was got upon these large open spaces? It should be remembered that the land which came under the operation of this Bill did not comprise village greens, commons in the vicinity of towns, but vast spaces of unenclosed land. And what was the character of the poorer or labouring classes in the vicinity of those large tracts of unenclosed land? They were employed by the richer classes in the neighbourhood of those places, and who possessed the right of pasturage, to hunt with wild dogs the oxen and sheep of other claimants of commonage; and it generally therefore happened that by expending money on such a description of employment, that the richer farmer, by these means, engrossed to himself the advantages of the common. Nothing could be better to the labouring classes than constant employment, where moral conduct was regarded, and where there was a strict attention to the rights of others. It had been proved before the Committee, that the class of persons living on the borders of these large unenclosed tracts of country were of the most irregular habits. Any one who lived on the borders of an unenclosed tract of country, of a forest, as he did, in Hampshire, must be well aware that the habits of the labouring classes in such districts were very different in their character and conduct from those of the agricultural labourers in other parts of the country, where they depended on the regular employment of their labour. There was another point connected with this subject, namely, the conflicting rights over unenclosed lands, which prevented all enclosure taking place. In many places one man was entitled to the pasturage, and another to the wood; and it was most difficult to bring about an agreement to enclose under such circumstances. The Bill would free lands from such evils. In some cases an individual had the right to pasture his sheep on a common from April to October; and certainly this was a great bar to the improvement of the land. The present measure would afford more ample means for promoting enclosure than now existed; and these conflicting rights would be extinguished by compensation, which now so seriously interfered with improvements. He saw with great satisfaction the introduction of this measure, and thought that it should be called a Bill for the improvement of the condition of the agricultural labouring classes, as it would tend materially to the increase of their wages; he, therefore, should give it his cordial support.

The Earl of Lincoln would not detain the House for more than a few minutes, from coming to a division; but having taken upon himself to conduct this Bill, with the concurrence of his noble Friend, he thought that the House might expect him to refer to some of the objections which had been raised against it; but, after what had fallen from the noble Lord who had just sat down, he felt that he should have very little to say. Two reasons had been stated why they should not proceed with this Bill into Committee that evening. The hon. Member for Montrose said that he objected to the principle of the Bill. If that was the case, the hon. Member must object to the enclosure of land altogether, and, therefore, to be consistent, he not only must oppose this Bill, but he should also have opposed the numerous Private Enclosure Bills which passed through that House every Session. There was nothing more objectionable in this than there was to be met with in every parish Enclosure Bill which passed that House almost without notice. By the use of such language as had been resorted to with respect to this Bill, they would be very apt to mislead popular feeling out of doors on this subject, and more especially by calling it by such a name as a landlords' bill. He would remind the hon. Member that this Bill provided in the most satisfactory manner for the maintenance of every right which now existed, or compensation in place of it. The noble Viscount had so completely refuted the speech of the hon. Member as to the commons' lands belonging to the poorer classes, that he did not feel it necessary to trouble the House at greater length on the point. The hon. Member for Rochdale had stated that the rights of the poor would be infringed on by this Bill. This was a misapprehension on the part of the hon. Member. Certainly it might be so in the case of a Private ill before the House for the purpose of an enclosure. In such case the matter was decided upon before a Committee of that House, and it was notorious that this was an expensive tribunal; and, although it might be anxious to do its duty to the poor, yet as they had not the means of coming before it, the rights of the poor might unintentionally be infringed on. Now, what was the course proposed in that Bill? That the rights of the poor should be decided on by parties quite independent of local interests, and who would be sent down to examine into the subject, and to investigate the relative claims of the various parties. Since, however, he had introduced this Bill, he had made a very important addition to it for the defence of the rights of the poorer claimants; and this he had chiefly been induced to do in consequence of the debates which had taken place in the House on the subject during the last two years. He had made this change, he repeated, in order to provide additional security, and to get rid of the objections which had continually been made on discussions of this subject during the last two Sessions. He proposed that in all cases where land was subject to indefinite common rights, that they should not be enclosed without the previous and special direction of Parliament. In such cases, also, where the parties could not appear without material expense, that they should be able to come before the House, not as formerly, when they appeared in opposition to a Private Enclosure Bill, but that the Commissioners appointed under the Bill should make a Report on every such case to the House, and that it should then be proceeded with by the House or not, as the House might decide. He also proposed that all Bills for such enclosures should be regarded as Public Bills, and taken at the time of public business, and not, as now, as Private Bills, which were passed in such a manner that hardly any of the Members knew what they were passing. By this means every opportunity would be afforded to parties to vindicate their rights, as the printed Bills would be in the hands of Members, and they would be enabled to hold ready communication with the parties interested; and if, in any case, it should be found that the Commissioners had been guilty of the blunder of infringing on the rights of parties, any hon. Member could move that provision be made accordingly. For his own part, he believed that no greater security could be afforded for the protection of rights, than were provided for under this Bill. The hon. Member for Rochdale said, that the Bill would take rights of certain lands from the poor which their ancestors had held for several generations, and which their successors hereafter would be entitled to: that under this Bill their rights, which had existed from generation to generation, could be alienated. He admitted that this was the case; but it was also the case now that parties in the possession of the right of commonage could alienate all their property in it without reference to those who might come after them. He, therefore, conceived that the objection of the hon. Member on this point amounted to nothing. In 1829, Mr. Whittle Harvey brought under the notice of Parliament, the utter insecurity of rights which existed under the system of private Enclosure Bills; and many of the evils which were then pointed out would be prevented under this Bill. The hon. Member for Rochdale alluded to allotments of land which were intended for the recreations of the people; and he complained that they did not preserve land for such recreations of towns with less than 10,000 inhabitants. But, if the hon. Member would look into the 13th Clause of this Bill, he would find that the provision respecting no enclosure taking place near places with 10,000 inhabitants, bore a different sense to that which the hon. Member attached to it. It was proposed to enact that within a certain distance of towns with 10,000 inhabitants and upwards, no enclosure should take place without special provision being made for each particular case, and the following clause enacted that no town green or village green should be enclosed, but that provision should be made for preserving the surface and fixing their boundaries. The hon. Member stated that no substantial benefit had been given to the population of the country by enclosures; and went into calculations respecting the number of enclosures during the last three centuries, with the intention of showing that no improvement had taken place in the condition of the agricultural labourers during that period, and that there had been no additional amount of employment in consequence of them. The hon. Member might as well contend that there was no greater amount of agricultural labourers employed in the present day than in the time of the Druids, when the whole country was unenclosed. Several hon. Members, in the course of the discussion, had alluded to the great expense that would attend the appointment of this Commission; and stated that, inasmuch as the measure would be solely for the benefit of the owners of the soil, that the expense of it should not be paid by the State. He did not believe that the benefits to be derived from this measure would be confined to the owners of the soil, but that it would prove to be a national benefit. In the first place, the salaries were to paid out of the Consolidated Fund. It should be recollected that of the three Commissioners, two were unpaid, and one was paid; and in addition to this, there would be a charge for Assistant Commissioners, a Secretary, and a few Clerks. If the hon. Member would refer to the 125th Clause, he would find that the expense of the Assistant Commissioners, and other persons employed on any enclosure, was made chargeable to the land so enclosed, and the amount was to be paid to the Consolidated Fund. The whole amount, therefore, would be repaid, with the exception of a very small sum. The result of the whole measure would be, that there would be an immense reduction in the expense of an enclosure. He believed, that under the proposed system, they would not be above one-tenth or one-twelfth of the present amount. The evidence annexed to the Report of the Committee showed that the expense attending enclosures under the present system was so great, that it often prevented extensive enclosures being undertaken. He would not then enter into an answer to the objections raised by his noble Friend to some of the details of the Bill, but would pos pone them until they went into Committee, where they would regularly come under consideration.

The House divided on the Question, that the words proposed to be left out should stand part of the Question:—Ayes 121; Noes 11: Majority 110.

House in Committee.

On the 1st Clause (relating to the appointment of Commissioners),

Mr. C. Buller said, that he intended to move an Amendment to the 1st Clause, although he did not object to the principle of the Bill. There was, however, a matter involved in the 1st Clause, which appeared to him to be so objectionable that, if persisted in, it would almost induce him to oppose the Bill. His opinion had always been that the greatest facilities should be given for the enclosure of the common land of the country, after the maintenance of any right or compensation in lieu of it; and he believed, that no class of persons were so much interested in carrying out a sound system of enclosure as the poorer classes. He should now endeavour to induce the House to adopt alterations in the machinery of the Bill, which, if he succeeded in doing, his main objections to the Bill would be removed. The Bill of his hon. Friend the Member for Lincolnshire proposed that the inquiries respecting enclosures should be referred to a Board of Comissioners now existing, and which was conversant with questions connected with the land of this country, and was wholly unconnected with politics. He thought, that the great objection to this Bill was, that such great powers under it should be placed in the hands of a Government Board, forming a part of the Administration of the day. He entertained no jealousy of the abuse of the powers by the noble Lord at the head of the Woods and Forests; for he believed that such powers would be as secure in his hands as in those of any person that could be named. He objected, however, to the principle, and should object as strongly if the powers were to be entrusted to political friends of his own. Now, what were the powers involved in this Bill? Powers were to be entrusted to the Commissioners by which the whole of the landed property of the country would be affected. The Commissioners were to determine whether or not commons or waste lands should be enclosed or not. Under such circumstances, it was obvious that they would have great power over the landed property of the country, and also over a large mass of the people not holders of landed property. Was it constitutional that such power should be placed in the hands of the Minister of the day, who was obliged to depend for the tenure of his office on the votes of a majority of that House? No doubt, in a question which involved the general interests of the people of this country, public attention would be called to the matter, and the infliction of injustice might be prevented; but in a question affecting individuals, he believed that every one would say that the decision should not be referred to a board dependent on party, nor on the votes of a majority of that House. By the alterations which had been made in the Bill of his noble Friend, the whole power of effecting enclosures was placed in the hands of the Woods and Forests. It appeared by the present Bill that three Commissioners were to be appointed; but that the Chief Commissioner of Woods and Forests was always to be one. It appeared also, that two of the Commissioners were to have no pay, and he doubted whether they would be able to get any but a Member of the Executive Government to act as the second Commissioner, without delay. The third Commissioner was to be paid, and was to be removable at the pleasure of the Secretary of State, and would be as much removable as a Lord of the Treasury. Without any disrepect to the Lords of the Treasury, he hoped he might say that they were apt to be swayed by party feelings, and that they were not exactly the kind of grave and judicial characters which should be appointed Commissioners under a measure of this kind. The change of the Minister of the day applied also to all the appointments, and thus the change of the head of the department depended on the fluctuations of the politics of the day. There was another objection to such a board, namely, that the chief Commissioner of Woods and Forests, who was to administer the powers under this Bill, was the administrator of the landed property of the Crown. This was most objectionable, for he was interested as a party in the questions that would come before the Board. It was necessary, under the provisions of the Bill, that lords of manors should have a proportionate interest in the enclosure of each manor. Now, how many manors were held by the Crown in England and Wales?—Not less than 579. He did not know the extent of those manors in acres, but it must be obvious that 579 manors contained a considerable proportion of the landed property of the country. He thought that a grave objection. He had never heard any valid reason for altering the machinery proposed by the noble Lord the Member for Lincolnshire. The Tithe Commissioners, in the prosecution of their duties, had to make the fullest inquiries into the nature and value of land throughout the kingdom; and he thought that with such a body as that in operation, it was most consistent with common sense to entrust to them duties of a nature altogether analogous with their own, instead of appointing a new board for the purpose. The Bill itself incidentally acknowledged the competency for the purpose of the Tithe Commission, one clause distinctly directing that for particular classes of minute local information, recourse should be had to that Commission; why not have recourse to it altogether? It was a body free from objections on the score of political or party bias; it was not removable on a change of Government, and it had ample experience and information on the subject, all which were features peculiarly adapting the Tithe Commission for the purposes of the Bill, in preference to the board proposed by the noble Lord opposite. If a new board were absolutely necessary, he should be the last man to object to its being constituted. The question of mere economy was comparatively unimportant in such cases; but with such a board as the Tithe Commission in active operation, a new board was perfectly superfluous, and worse than useless. He should, with this feeling, propose to return to the machinery of the former Bill. He was not so wedded to the Tithe Commissioners, but that if any other board were pointed out to him more adapted to the purpose, he should be ready to accede to the suggestion. At present, however, he was not aware of any body with superior qualifications, and he therefore begged to move as an Amendment, in line 13, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Clause, in order to add the words—

"The Tithe Commissioners of England and Wales shall be the Commissioners under this Act."

The Earl of Lincoln said, that the hon. and learned Member for Liskeard had stated his objections so candidly and fairly, so entirely without allusion to remarks made elsewhere, suggesting that the alterations which had been made in the Bill were of a personal nature, that he was happily relieved from the necessity himself of adverting to those absurd suggestions. He could safely say that if any other existing board could be named as eligible for carrying out the Bill, exempt from those objections which he considered applied to the Tithe Commission in the matter, he should be very glad to relieve himself from the onerous and disagreeable addition now proposed to the already onerous duties involved in the office he had the honour to fill. At the same time, he begged to point out to the House how very differently hon. Gentlemen had viewed this subject on former occasions. When the noble Member for Lincolnshire introduced his first Bill on the subject, two years since, he introduced it with this clause in blank, a most unusual course. At the same time, the hon. Member for Berkshire also introduced a Bill for the general drainage of the country; and both of these hon. Gentlemen applied to him to sanction, on the part of the Woods and Forests Department, that the Woods and Forests Board should be the board to carry into effect the duties which it was now proposed to entrust to a board, of which the Chief Commissioner of Woods and Forests was to be a member. He represented to these hon. Gentleman what he considered would be grave objections to such an arrangement, arising out of the landed property of the Crown, cases affecting which would, to a large extent, come before the Board for settlement; and he considered it clearly improper that the Commissioners of Woods and Forests should be the sole parties adjudicating in cases in which they were themselves so intimately concerned. The noble Lord and the hon. Member for Berkshire yielded to the objection so raised. The hon. Member for Liskeard urged that the Commissioners under this Bill should be wholly unconnected with the Government, so that no ground for suspecting Government influence should be left. It appeared to him that, certainly, if ever there were measures which could be considered more entirely free from the chance of political or party influence or interests than any others, they were the present measure, and the measure relating to drainage. It was altogether a misconception to suppose that the power would devolve wholly upon the Woods and Forests; the two other Commissioners, one of whom would be a paid Commissioner, would have equal powers to the Chief Commissioner of the Woods and Forests. As to the Commissioner being removable at the pleasure of the Crown, this, if it were an objection, applied alike to all other Commissions, the Tithe Commission among the rest. With reference to the noble Lord's first Bill, it was introduced at a period when the Session was too far advanced, and there was too much busines sbefore the House, to admit of proceeding with it, or of the Government paying due attention to it. In the next Session, the noble Lord had brought forward the subject at a period sufficiently early to enable the Government to give attention to it. Hon. Gentlemen asked, why had not the machinery of that Bill been adopted now? The reason was simply this—that Government did not consider it advisable to devolve upon a Commission, appointed for a specific and temporary purpose, and whose term of existence would now expire in two years, duties of a peculiar character, which for those two years in all probability occasioning a large amount of labour, would necessitate the attention of a Board for several years beyond the period assigned to the Tithe Commission, though the duties in these subsequent years would be of a very light nature, only a few applications, most likely, dribbling in during the year, after the first mass of cases had been disposed of. It would, consequently, be a clear saving to appoint the Commission suggested, instead of keeping on the Tithe Commission for the purpose, the more especially as in all probability, after the five years named in the Bill, it would be quite feasible to dispense with the paid Commissioner altogether.

Colonel Sibthorp was no friend to Commissions, and should object to keeping up the Tithe Commission, which had already cost the country 220,000*l.* without doing anything at all like commensurate service. If there must be Commissioners for this Bill, let them be Commissioners appointed by the different counties, acquainted with the localities, and with the wants and feelings of the localities, instead of a Commissioner sent down by Government, and knowing nothing about the places or persons. As to the paid Commissioner being kept on for only five years, everybody knew the value of such intimations.

Mr. Warburton agreed with the noble Lord in thinking that there was no fear that political influence would interfere with the working of the commission. But to the objection of the hon. and learned Member for Liskeard, as to the Crown lands, and the impropriety of the Woods and Forests being on the Commission, the noble Lord had given no answer. It was a general principle that no individual body should adjudicate on cases where they were interested. He objected on this ground to a Commissioner of the Woods and Forests being a Member of th Commission under this Bill. With regard to the proposition of the hon. and learned Gentleman, that the Tithe Commissioners should work this measure, he was inclined to support it, partly because of the experience they must have acquired, and partly because it would get rid of the objection to the Woods and Forests being connected with the Commission.

Mr. Henley regarded the objections stated to the appointment of the Tithe Commission as in no degree valid; but there was this very valuable difference between the Bill of the noble Lord opposite, and that before the House, that the latter allowed an appeal to the House in the more important matter of disputed enclosure cases.

Lord Worsley said, that as to the Woods and Forests being entrusted with the management of this Bill, the opinions of Mr. Frankland Lewis, as they appeared in the evidence, and which the noble Lord would probably think worthy of his attention, were entirely opposed to such a proposition. Mr. Frankland Lewis said:—

"You think it more desirable to create a new Commission? Yes; that you should create some new and appropriate power, unless you give the business to some one of the existing officers of State; I have not had time to think much upon the matter, but I have no doubt it would be far better to annex it to some such Department as that of the Woods and Forets.—Do you think it would give satisfaction in Wales, that the Board of Woods and Forests should have the control? I do not think they would feel the slightest dissatisfaction, if you could define what is to be done with the Crown manors.—Is there not some jealousy in Wales as to the Crown property? Yes; particularly in North Wales, where there are mineral rights; there is property in dispute there, and it is not known what the Crown's rights are; there are disputes of that kind: but setting apart the difficulty that arises connected with the Crown property, I should entertain the impression myself, that where the Crown's interests were not concerned, the Woods and Forests would be a very good tribunal; and wherever the Crown is concerned, I think some particular step should be taken to deal with its rights in that respect."

He had received a variety of communications from Wales, assuring him that there would be the greatest possible jealousy excited on the part of the small landowners there, if the office of Woods and Forests was connected with the measure. As to the Tithe Commission having no time for doing the work, he had been assured by them that they should be able to do all the work which they anticipated as likely to arise under the Bill. As to the Tithe Commission only lasting two years more, even supposing that such should be the case, it was to be remembered that the same Commissioners also constituted the copyhold Commission, the duties of which would certainly not be terminated for some time beyond the two years. From all parts of the country he had received assurances from well-informed persons that the Bill would not work satisfactorily if the Woods and Forests had any share in its administration.

Mr. Escott observed, that the most efficient means of any to check improper practices on the part of a Commission such as this, would be, that a Member of the House should be named on it. If the hon. Member for Liskeard, for instance, were made one of the Commissioners, he would, sitting there opposite to the Government, be a great check upon the conduct of the Board.

The Earl of Lincoln begged to remind the noble Lord opposite that the opinions which Mr. Frankland Lewis had expressed were in reply to questions put by the noble Lord, having reference, not to the proposition of the Chief Commissioner of Woods and Forests being a member of the Commission under consideration, but to the proposition that the Board of Woods and Forests should be the Commission itself. The opinions of Mr. Frankland Lewis had been referred to, but those opinions were against the appointment of the Tithe Commissioners; for that gentleman stated, that as soon as the Commissioners had discharged the particular duty for which they had been appointed, the Commission ought to be at an end. If that opinion of Mr. Lewis were true, then it was quite evident that the Tithe Commissioners would not be the proper tribunal to decide upon those questions which would arise under this Bill. It was necessary that a Commission to decide on claims of this nature would require to have the perfect confidence of those whose rights would be effected by its decisions; and, therefore, seeing how much engaged the Tithe Commissioners had been in proceedings the very nature of which necessarily caused them to be unpopular with parties who would be affected by this Bill, he did not think that they would form the best tribunal to decide upon those claims.

Viscount Palmerston fully concurred with the proposal of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Liskeard, not in consequence of any doubt which he could possibly entertain of a Board of Commissioners with the noble Lord (Lord Lincoln) at their head; for he should, with the greatest pleasure, submit any private right in which he was concerned to the decision of the noble Lord. It was not enough that a tribunal of the nature of the Commission which was to be appointed under this Bill should have the confidence of the House in the justice of its decisions, or that the House should have an opportunity of calling for explanations of its proceedings from a responsible Minister of the Government; the object was to inspire the country with confidence in that tribunal. If persons, who were ignorant and ill-informed, entertained apprehensions with regard to the constitution of the Commission, and such persons were those who would most probably entertain them, then the Bill must necessarily fail in its purpose, as applications would not be made for the exercise of the power which it was intended to create. It was true that the Tithe Commissioners had been appointed by the Executive Government; but the question was for them to consider whether a Commission so appointed, or the Government of the day, were most open to suspicion (without just ground he would admit), on the part of those whose rights would be affected by the decision of the Commissioners under this Bill. An argument which had been used by the noble Lord opposite (the Earl of Lincoln), formed, in his opinion, a strong illustration of the advantage which was to be derived from appointing the Tithe Commissioners to this duty, instead of the board which was proposed by the Bill in its present shape. The noble Lord said that he did not know the political opinions of the Tithe Commissioners, with the exception of one, who had been a Member of the House of Commons. No one could say that of the Commissioners of Woods and Forests in that House, whose political opinions were well known; and when he recollected the conflict of opinions which was caused by the claims of adverse rights in distant parts of the country, he was led to the belief that application for the exercise of the powers of the Bill would often be prevented by a dread of political bias, or that, in cases where decisions were made, those decisions would be frequently attributed, unjustly, he admitted, to the influence of political bias. It was said that the Tithe Commissioners had now nearly concluded their labours, and that a proposal to entrust to them the duties which were to be discharged under this Bill, was a proposal to make them immortal; but if hon. Members would look to the 5th Clause of the Bill, they would see that the Commissioners under this Bill were to be appointed only for five years; and supposing that, according to the statement of the noble Lord, the greater number of applications under this Bill would be disposed of in the first two or three years, it would be seen that the Tithe Commissioners might be employed in the discharge of those duties without becoming a permanent commission. The hon. and gallant Member opposite (Colonel Sibthorp) remembering how many lives the Income Tax possessed, appeared to feel a difficulty in believing that the existence of the Commission would be limited to five years; but he would remind the hon. Member that the length of time during which it was to continue was to be settled only by the consent of Parliament. He (Lord Palmerston) would put it to the House—not in a party view—but on those grounds which he would take in regarding it if he were himself a Member of the Government, whether it were right that the Commission ought to be free from all suspicion of political bias. He would put it to them whether it would not be better to adopt some machinery such as his hon. and learned Friend had suggested, than to mix up the Government of the day with decisions concerning the private rights of individuals? He perfectly agreed with his hon. and learned Friend in thinking that they ought to endeavour to establish a machinery which would prevent those imputations—unjust though they might be—which would arise from having the rights of private individuals decided by a board connected with the Government of the day.

Mr. Clive thought that, considering the important questions of property which the Commissioners would be called upon to decide, it was desirable that one of them, at least, should be a lawyer of considerable standing in his profession. He thought that there would be a great advantage in having the head of the Woods and Forests connected with the Commission; as by this arrangement a great deal of practical knowledge would be brought to the assistance of the Commission, and an additional security given for impartiality in the decisions of the Commission.

Mr. Williams said, it was proposed to saddle the country with additional and unnecessary expense in carrying out this Bill; and he was strongly opposed to that part of it. Why were the public called upon to contribute the funds to meet those expenses? He had not, for his own part, the slightest doubt as to the justice and impartiality of the Head Commissioner of Woods and Forests; but he agreed in thinking that a differently constituted tribunal would be preferred by those who would be more immediately affected by the decisions of the Commissioners; and he should, therefore, support the Motion of the hon. Member for Liskeard.

Mr. Wakley had voted against going into Committee on the Bill, because he did not believe that it had been sufficiently long before the public; and that, consequently, it was not well understood out of doors. There was a strong feeling against it outside that House; and he was perfectly satisfied it was a feeling which would not be so strong if the Bill were properly understood. He was of opinion that the principle of the Bill was good, and he looked upon it as a measure which was calculated to confer considerable advantage on the working people. He was in favour of the Motion of the hon. and learned Member for Liskeard; for he thought the appointment of new Commissioners for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of the Bill, was quite unnecessary; and he was the more inclined to have the Tithe Commissioners appointed to discharge these duties, in consequence of the satisfactory manner in which they had performed that which had already been assigned to them. What necessity existed for the appointment of new Commissioners? The noble Lord (Lord Lincoln) had replied to his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Buller), but he had not answered any of his arguments satisfactorily. He objected to the appointment of a Minister of the Crown as one of the Commissioners; for he did not conceive that real responsibility would attach to the Minister in consequence of that appointment, whilst at the same time it would give to the Government such influence as would enable it to carry any measure it pleased; and then the Minister could come down to the House, and say that it was not his individual act, but the act of the Commissioners generally. If more time were granted before the Bill were carried, it would be a very great advantage; as an erroneous impression, which very generally prevailed at present, might be removed. There was an impression abroad at present, that this Bill was an outrageous attack upon the rights of the poor; but he could say that, so far as his experience had gone in that House, when an Enclosure Bill was proceeding under the present system, a poor man had no chance in the conflict; and he never could find in the result of the proceedings of this nature, that the poor man had any rights at all. It was supposed by great numbers, that those who lived around a common were generally a happy population; but there could not be a greater mistake. They were generally very poor, and in times of unusual distress suffered very greatly from the indisposition of the farmers in the neighbourhood to employ them. If this Bill came into operation, there would be a vast increase in the amount of land which would be brought into cultivation; and there would be more employment given to the working people by the cultivation of 100 acres of land, than by 10,000 acres of land allowed to remain as a common. He hoped, therefore, that they would not attempt to carry such a valuable Bill into effect under the prejudice which existed against it from an erroneous impression which was very general with respect to it.

Mr. Newdegate thought that it was impossible there could be any well-founded suspicion of the decisions and motives of the Board on such matters as those that would come before them; and, in a constitutional point of view, he did not think that there was any danger to be apprehended from the appointment of a Minister of the Crown to the Commission.

Viscount Ebrington saw little objection to the appointment of the Tithe Commissioners for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of the Bill. Those Commissioners had at present a great deal of time on their hands, and he thought it would be well to occupy that time with some kindred work for which they were eminently fitted. He looked upon the appointment of new Commissioners as perfectly needless.

Mr. Darby did not think that the Tithe Commissioners would form a proper tribunal for the decision of the claims under this Bill.

Mr. Brotherton said, that the Bill was better calculated to preserve and defend the rights of the poor, than the existing law. It was impossible, under the present system, for a poor man to defend his rights, whilst a Commission would give him very great facilities in that regard, which he did not at present possess.

Mr. C. Buller, in reply, would ask hon. Members if the House would act with more perfect freedom as regarded a Report laid on the Table of the House, which Report was prepared by gentlemen for whom the Government were not responsible, or a Report prepared by a Commission connected with the Government of the day? He had not the least suspicion as to the honour and impartiality of the noble Lord (Lord Lincoln); but he regarded with great alarm the exertions which were every day making to place powers which affected the rights of individuals, in the hands of the Executive Government. That was a course which had a dangerous tendency; and he hoped that in the case before them, the House would pause before they agreed to a proposal to place questions of private rights at the decision of the Government of the day. It had been said that the Tithe Commissioners had nearly concluded their labours, and that at best they could continue no more than two or three years longer; but every one conversant with the subject knew that the delay was not their own fault, and that their duties could not possibly terminate at an earlier period than five years hence at the earliest; and if the House appointed the Tithe Commissioners to carry this Bill into effect, they could at the end of that period adopt a fresh machinery. The question, however, which was then before the Committee was, whether the power was to be vested in the Commissioners of Woods and Forests.

The clause to stand part of the Bill.

On Clause 6, which provides a salary for one of the Commissioners,

The Earl of Lincoln proposed to fill up the blank with the sum of 1,500*l.*

Mr. Williams wished to know whether the expense was to be permanently fixed upon the public, or whether a charge was to be levied on the enclosures which should in the course of the year pay the whole expense of the Commission and the Commissioners. If the noble Lord would not consent to the latter arrangement, he (Mr. Williams) would take the sense of the House against granting any salary to the Commissioner.

Mr. Wawn said, he should move as an Amendment that the proposed salary should be 1,000*l.* a year, instead of 1,500*l.*

The Earl of Lincoln did not intend to fix the salary on the enclosures, but that it should be defrayed, not only in the first instance, but ultimately by the public. The other expenses would fall legitimately and properly upon each particular enclosure; but he thought it was justifiable that this small sum should be defrayed by the public, looking upon the measure, as he did, not as a measure for the exelusive benefit of any class, but as one of national importance and advantage.

Colonel Sibthorp said, he observed that the Lord High Commissioner, or Commissioners, might allow to any commissioner, assistant commissioner, secretary, clerk, messenger, or other officer, such reasonable travelling and other expenses as might be incurred in the performance of their duty, in addition to his salary or allowance. He did not like this uncertainty. He hoped those persons would travel by second-class carriages; but they might travel very expensively, and he thought this was a power that ought not to be given.

Mr. B. Denison did not consider 1,500*l.* too much for an important benefit: but he wished the noble Lord would be good enough to state the amount of the expenses (the whole sum) which would fall on the different parties suing for an enclosure, and what part was to come out of the Consolidated Fund, and what from the enclosures.

The Earl of Lincoln said, the distinction was this — the expenses which properly attached to each particular enclosure, those of the assistant commissioners, surveyors, and so forth, would be repaid, under the 125th Clause, to the Consolidated Fund; but those appointments which were permanent, and were for the national benefit, and would apply to all enclosures, must come out of the Consolidated Fund. He believed, in addition to the Commissioners, a secretary, and two or three clerks, would be all that would be required for the performance of the duties; but not being able to foresee the number of enclosures, he could not say what would be the exact expense.

Mr. Wawn wished the noble Lord would state what he really meant with regard to the expenses.

The Earl of Lincoln said, he was anxious to give every information in his power, and if he could form anything like a calculation, he would give it. He would rather, however, run the risk of a division than mislead any Gentleman, and, therefore, beyond the 1,500*l.*, he could not state the expense.

Lord Worsley said, it was difficult to estimate the expense, as the circumstances of each enclosure must regulate the expense. He would suppose a case where, for the convenience of occupation, allotments had been already made, but where the parties agreed that it would be better to have different allotments, and to have the land enclosed. In such a case the expense would be but small; but the case would be different in a place where, instead of 100 acres, there was a common of 20,000 acres, of which only 1,000 acres were to be enclosed, where there were a variety of claimants, and many of those who made claims had no rights. The consequence of this would be repeated adjournments and increased expense. It was of the utmost importance that the paid Commissioner should be a man in whom all parties had confidence. He would also impress upon his noble Friend the absolute necessity of having, as one of the Commissioners, a person who was a good lawyer. Independently of other considerations, a great saving of expense would thereby be occasioned.

Mr. Wakley thought, that in every respect the public would be greatly the gainers by this Bill. They would not only thereby acquire a vast amount of additional labour for the unemployed poor, but they would also facilitate, by means of the Bill, the bringing into market of an immense additional supply of food—a consideration which, of itself, should weigh deeply with his Anti-Corn Law friends. If the machinery of the Bill could only be brought to work well, he could see nothing but benefit as about to result from it. There was one thing, however, to which they should very closely look, and that was, the condition of the people with respect to paying the salaries of the Commissioners. The House was in the habit of acting as if it thought that it was only by expending large sums that they could induce able men to undertake the tasks sought to be devolved upon them. His firm conviction was, that, in reference to the present case, they could get as good a man to act as Commissioner for 1,000*l.* as they could for 1,500*l.* a year. If, therefore, the hon. Gentleman divided upon his Motion, he would divide with him. Two Commissioners were, in fact, to be paid; but what was to become of the third Commissioner, who was to have no salary? How was it to be expected that he would attend to his business? It was recommended that one of the Commissioners should be a lawyer; but he was quite sure that there was no lawyer who would undertake the part of the unfortunate third Commissioner, who was not to be paid for his trouble. He thought that it would be found that so much business would devolve upon the Commissioners, that it would be necessary to pay this third Commissioner also, to induce him to attend; and as it was, therefore, likely that there would soon be application to Parliament for the purpose of giving him a salary also, would it not be better that, in anticipation of such a demand, they should fix the sum at present under consideration at 1,000*l.*, instead of 1,500*l.* a year?

Dr. Bowring concurred in the view taken by the hon. Gentleman as to reducing the sum. The principle on which they should act in a case of this kind was, to maximise aptitude, and to minimise expense. [Laughter.] They might laugh, but it was the duty of the Government, in cases like the present, to get the best man at the cheapest rate.

The Committee divided on the Question that the blank be filled up with 1,500*l.*—Ayes 63; Noes 13: Majority 50.

On Clause 11,

Mr. Henley wished to put a question to the noble Lord. He found in this clause eleven definitions of property liable to come under the operation of the Act; and in the clause which followed it three descriptions of property exempted from its operation, and which it was provided were not to be enclosed without the special authority of Parliament. Now it so happened that the three descriptions of property which were so exempted did not agree with the eleven descriptions of property which were to come under the operation of the Act. Why give power to do eleven things, and then proceed to exempt three, without using, as to those exempted, the same kind of language as was employed in reference to the others?

Mr. Williams would call attention to line 38 in the clause then before the Committee. In that, and in the two lines which followed, he found these words, "all lands in which the property or right of or to the vesture or herbage, or any part thereof, during the whole or any part of the year, is separated from the property of the soil." He would ask the noble Lord (as we understood) whether this was intended to mean Lammas and Michaelmas land? Parties interested in that sort of land were desirous to know whether these words included that description of property; and if not, whether the noble Lord would agree to insert it?

The Earl of Lincoln would first observe, in answer to the hon. Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley), that the difference between the two classes of land described in the clauses referred to was this, that the eleven descriptions of property alluded to property which might be enclosed without coming to Parliament for previous sanction for such enclosure. The 12th Clause defined those lands which could not be so enclosed without first coming to Parliament for sanction so to do. As to the question of the hon. Member for Coventry (Mr. Williams), the definition would not include Lammas fields. It was not proposed to exempt any class of land under this Act; but the land which the hon. Gentleman alluded to came under the 12th Clause. Lammas fields being generally in the neighbourhood of large towns, came under the provisions applicable to the neighbourhoods of such towns.

Mr. Williams said, that it was desirable to place all such lands as he had alluded to under the operation of the Act, whereas by the Bill as it at present stood some of these lands would be enclosed and some not.

The Earl of Lincoln observed, that, with a view to prevent the enclosure of lands within a certain distance of large towns, it was intended that no enclosure of such should take place without the attention of Parliament being directed to it. All lands coming under the three descriptions referred to by the hon. Member for Oxfordshire must have the previous sanction of Parliament to enclose them, otherwise they could not be enclosed; and the lands luded to by the hon. Member for Coventry came in under the clause containing these three descriptions.

Mr. Williams inquired what was the process to be observed in obtaining the sanction of Parliament?

The Earl of Lincoln said, that the process was this: Whenever an enclosure was intended to take place, the parties seeking such enclosure must, in the first instance, apply to the Commissioners, and answer certain printed forms with which they would be furnished. If the Commissioners thought that it was desirable that such enclosure should be made, they would then send down an Assistant Commissioner to make further inquiries into the matter. On the result of these inquiries being known, if favourable to the enclosure, a provisional order would be made for the enclosure. There the matter would, for the moment, stop, and the circumstances detailed in the provisional order would be embodied in an Annual Report, which Report would be laid before Parliament at the commencement of each Session; and on that Report, such enclosures as were recommended by the Commissioners would be inserted in a schedule to a Bill to be introduced and passed through that House, before any further proceedings should take place as to the proposed enclosures.

Mr. C. Buller wished to know why a distinction was made as to classes of land, some of which, it appeared, were to fall under the operation of the 11th Clause, and some under the 12th Clause? As he understood, there never was to be an enclosure made without an Act of Parliament; but why was there some inquiry not to be applicable to the three last classes of commons, which required, it appeared, a different machinery from eleven other classes? What was to be the difference between them? Suppose he wanted to have an enclosure under the 12th Clause, was there then to be a previous application to Parliament, as under the old form? What was there that should exempt those three classes of commons from the general provisions of the Bill? The exceptions seemed to him so large as to defeat the intentions of the Bill. Perhaps the noble Lord would explain the reason for making this distinction?

The Earl of Lincoln said, the hon. and learned Gentleman misunderstood the whole of the explanation he had given. By 6 and 7 William IV. he would find that provision had been made for enclosing certain lands without the consent of Parliament; these were the lands that were accurately comprised in one clause, and all these lands might be enclosed by the Commissioners. The reason why they were included in this Bill, was, that lands might now be enclosed by a private agreement, and great security of title had been found. It was intended to remedy that; and it was most desirable that facilities should be given under this Bill for remedying that defect. Parties would be enabled to enclose under this Bill, who could enclose under 6th William IV.

Then came the exception, which embraced all the commons of the country. These classes of land could not be enclosed except by Act of Parliament. This he had just explained to the hon. Member for Coventry (Mr. Williams); and he now wished to explain another thing; that the Bill to be introduced annually would be a public Bill, and would be exempt from all those fees to which private Bills were now subjected.

Mr. C. Buller observed that, by the 12th Clause, it was stated that lands should be enclosed under this Bill. He referred to line 7, Clause 12. What, then, was the meaning of the 11th Clause, as to lands that might be enclosed? Were they, too, not under the operation of this Act?

The Earl of Lincoln said, if the hon. and learned Gentleman would look to the 37th Clause, he would find the matter perfectly clear. The 37th Clause stated that the Act of Parliament by which the lands were to be enclosed should be a public Act.

Mr. C. Buller considered that it would be impossible for any one to read those two Clauses, the 11th and 12th, without falling into an error. That which the 12th Clause required, was something different from Clause 11. That now, however, seemed not to be the meaning of the Act. It seemed to him that the clauses were misplaced.

The Earl of Lincoln repeated that none of the classes in Clause 12 could be brought into operation without a public Act of Parliament.

Mr. C. Buller observed that in the Clause 12, it was said by the noble Lord that none of the classes comprised in it could be brought into operation without a public Act of Parliament. As he understood the Bill, no commons of any kind could be enclosed without the direction of Parliament. The noble Lord then said nothing of those three other kinds of commons referred to in Clause 11 (as we understood); and the ambiguity which would arise from this was, that there seemed to be some other kind of commons besides those in the 12th Clause, which might be enclosed without an application to Parliament. He took it that there was only one class of commons —that in the 11th Clause—which might be enclosed without an application to Parliament.

The Earl of Lincoln: Yes.

Colonel Sibthorp moved the omission of the clause.

TRINITY COLLEGE ESTATES.] Mr. M. J. O'Connell moved for Copies of the Reports, Valuations, and Surveys of the Estates of the Provost, Fellows and Scholars of Trinity College, Dublin, made by Maurice Collis, Esq. He stated that the Board of Trinity College had given their assent to these Returns. The hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Hamilton) had been communicated with on the subject, as well as his right hon. Colleague, the Recorder of Dublin, and he understood there would be no opposition to his Motion.

Mr. G. A. Hamilton said, as the Motion was of a peculiar nature, it was his duty to state, in confirmation of what the hon. Member had said, that it was made with the assent and concurrence of the Board of Trinity College. The information which was sought for, had already been given in substance, though not in detail, by Mr. Collis, in his evidence before the Land Commission. The details, however, were important, and the Return moved for by the hon. Member would afford some interesting information with regard to the occupation of land in Ireland. It had been obtained at a very considerable cost by the Board of Trinity College. He understood the survey, and valuation, and inquiry, had cost no less than 3,000*l.*; and certainly the Returns would show how much pains and trouble the Board of Trinity College had taken, and how strongly they had felt it their duty to make themselves acquainted with the actual condition of every person living on their extensive estates.

DRAINAGE BY TENANT FOR LIFE BILL.] The Duke of Richmond moved the Second Reading of the Bill to amend an Act of 3rd and 4th Victoria, and enable the owners of settled estates to defray the expenses of draining the same by way of mortgage. The Bill was now drawn as directed by the Committee, and related solely to draining; there were other questions, such as giving a power of leasing for nineteen or twenty years, and also a power of exchange, which was very desirable, particularly now railroads severed property, so that twenty acres might be left on one side of the rail belonging to one owner, and twenty acres belonging to another might be left on the other side: these subjects, however, might be the subject of legislative enactment hereafter. It had been thought desirable by the Committee to extend the Bill to Ireland as well as to England; and it simplified the proceedings by enacting that a Master in Chancery, on being satisfied of the outlay, should give a certificate which is to operate as a rent-charge, and as the application was to be made in the first instance to the Master, much expense would be spared.

The Marquess of Salisbury did not mean to oppose a Bill which was likely to afford employment to the poor; but he hoped his noble Friend would give them a fair opportunity of discussing the details of the Bill, particularly with regard to the part which permitted persons to raise money upon settled estates for the purposes of building.

Lord Beaumont said, that question was much discussed in the Committee, and in his opinion buildings must be included, or the Bill would not be effective. He did not intend ornamental buildings, but such as sheds for cattle, which had always been considered permanent improvements, and which must be increased if there was increased produce. He never knew a Bill on which he felt less difficulty in giving a vote in its support. It improved the position as well of the tenant for life as of the remainder-man; it would benefit the occupier as well as the holder. It was an attempt also to simplify the legal proceedings, and render unnecessary those heavy law expenses for petitions, a specimen of which was given to the Committee, which extended to two closely printed pages of items.

The Earl of Devon, as a Member of the Committee, supported the Bill, which preserved the control of the Court of Chancery, and at the same time reduced the expense. He hoped that it might be made appendant to the Bill relating to tenants' rights in Ireland. It pointed out the objects which it was the desire of the Legislature to obtain, and was of the utmost importance to the general improvement of the agriculture, not only of this country but of Ireland.

The Earl of Wicklow approved of the extension to Ireland, and hoped that powers would be given to the guardians of infants to effect these improvements.

Lord Campbell also approved of the principle of the Bill, and rejoiced that it was extended to Ireland. For more than half a century they had had such a Bill for Scotland, and in all respects as the Bill now stood he highly approved of it.

The Duke of Richmond said there was a clause in the Bill which would, he believed, have the effect of enabling guardians to drain.

The Lord Chancellor had not till now read the Bill; there were several details in it with respect to the Court of Chancery; he did not object to the second reading then; but he would communicate with his noble Friend the noble Duke any suggestions which occurred to him with regard to that part of the Bill.

Bill read 2ª.

STANDING ORDERS — RAILWAYS.] The Marquess of Clanricarde moved that there be inserted in every future Railway Bill, a Clause to enact—

"That the Directors appointed shall continue in Office until the First Ordinary Meeting to be held after the passing of the Act, and at such Meeting the Shareholders present, personally or by Proxy, may either continue in Office the Directors appointed by this Act, or any Member of them, or may elect a new Body of Directors, or Directors to supply the Places of those continued in Office; the Directors appointed by this Act being eligible as Members of such new Body."

On Question, agreed to, and ordered to be added to the Roll of Standing Orders.

COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND SELECT COMMITTEES.] The Marquess of Lansdowne said he would take that opportunity, which was not altogether irregular, of stating some circumstances connected with railways deeply affecting the interests of all their Lordships and of every man in the country, and which must call for another addition to the Standing Orders, for the purpose of affording a sufficient protection to Members of Parliament. It might be known to their Lordships, and if it were not it would appear strange, that an hon. Gentleman, now a Member of the other House of Parliament, was placed at this moment in a situation in which any of their Lordships might be placed also. This hon. Gentleman, about seven years ago, was invited to become a subscriber and director in a Company for establishing steam navigation to India by the Cape of Good Hope. After looking at the nature of the undertaking, he advisedly declined to become a subscriber or director of the Company. Of course he then dismissed the Company from his mind, and neither directly nor indirectly had he done any act as a director. Notwithstanding this, after five years had elapsed, a demand was made, in consequence of his name being inserted as a director without his knowledge or consent in the Act of Parliament obtained by the Company. The demand made on him was for the amount of all the claims for which the Company had become liable, as the other persons whose names had been mentioned had turned out mere men of straw. His name being found in the Act gave grounds for proceedings being commenced against him in a court of law; and although he could prove that he had refused to be a director of the Company, and although he had never acted as such, an opinion obtained from a high legal authority stated that, inasmuch as the Act of Parliament itself was a legal publication, he was legally represented as a director. Now he (the Marquess of Lansdowne) begged to ask their Lordships whether they were not all in the same situation? Were not all their names inserted in one form or another in all the local Acts that had passed through the Legislature? And were they not all liable to be made a subject of action? To show the extent of the impudence and the audacity of the parties engaged in getting up trading companies, he would state a fact which had come to his knowledge. A Gentleman, a Member of Parliament for one of the counties, was asked to become a director of one of these projected companies, and he refused. A short time afterwards he was told that he had attended at a meeting in the county with which he was connected, and had spoken in favour of the projected scheme. His attention being called to the Report of this meeting, he found not only that he was stated to have attended, which he did not, but he found also that many other persons were asserted to have been there, and to have made speeches, although they did not attend such meeting. The whole of the parties went to the bankers, advertised in a body, and gave notice to them not to pay any money that should be received by them on account of the said scheme after the meeting in question; and it turned out that a very large sum had been subscribed after that meeting, solely upon the belief, and in consequence of its having been publicly reported that the persons to whom he referred had attended it, and had sanctioned its objects. Now, in what a situation might not their Lordships be placed if such things as this were allowed? He could not pretend to point out what ought to be done; but he would merely say that they ought to protect themselves from being involved in such schemes. By what means he left it to their Lordships to consider. But what he did say was, that the names of the consenting individuals to any future schemes ought to be required to be set forth by a Standing Order as having given such consent. He should take an early opportunity of presenting a Standing Order for the purpose of effecting what he had pointed out as necessary.

Lord Brougham was sure that the public would be much obliged to his noble Friend for adverting to this class of cases. The difficulty would be how to afford a remedy in the particular instance. He would willingly have concurred in passing an Act in order to relieve a person in the situation described by the noble Marquess, but that in so doing there arose a difficulty which was to him insuperable; namely, that the House, having originally passed a Bill in a negligent and careless manner, could not, by any subsequent Act, reach the cheat who had beguiled them; but any such measure would only affect an industrious and honest person who might have lent his money on the strength of their Lordships' legislation. The man who sued the hon. Gentleman whose situation was described by the noble Marquess, might be, and probably was, as bonâ fide a sufferer as that honourable person himself was; and, consequently, what would relieve the one, would oppress the other. He thought, if the Houses of Legislature passed Acts so thoughtlessly, they ought each to pay their respective portions of the pecuniary losses which they inflicted thereby. This showed the caution that was necessary to be exercised by their Lordships in passing Railway Bills; and the immense consequences that might be involved by their not repressing rather than facilitating this gambling disease under which the country laboured. It was the greatest mistake to suppose that these undertakings were bonâ fide on the part of those who put them forward. All that those parties sought, was to give them an appearance of outward semblance of a bonâ fide railway project, in order that they might go and job in the railway market; and Parliament, from a very honest and conscientious feeling, wishing to give every facility possible, omitted to take any pains to inquire into the real merits of the scheme. Had they done so in the present case, they would have found that Mr. Berkeley had not given his sanction to this measure. Every day showed the ruinous consequences to which this gambling system inevitably tended. Men could not do two opposite things at once. They could not employ their capital in gambling speculations, and at the same time employ it in the legitimate course of trade. Look at your Returns of the Revenue this quarter! Within the last two or three months they would find a very great falling off in the amount of revenue derived from the Customs and Excise.

Lord Stanley: That is in consequence of the great reduction of duties. The quantities consumed are increased.

Lord Brougham was not aware that the reductions to which the noble Lord alluded had taken place. He was very glad to find that the deficiency in the revenue had not arisen from a falling off of the consumption of customs and excise articles. His observations were, however, intended to apply to the frauds practised by speculators in railways, who, as one mode of warding off opposition to their schemes, would undertake to insert clauses in their Bills which they never did insert. The whole matter was an evil which demanded their Lordships' serious consideration.

The Marquess of Lansdowne explained. He had omitted to state, which he now did distinctly, that the hon. Gentleman to whose case he alluded, had no knowledge of the Bill subsequently to the application made to him; and he did not know that it was passing through Parliament until it had received the Royal Assent.

Earl Fitzhardinge said, he had been informed by his brother (Mr. Berkeley) that when this Committee was first conceived, a proposal was made to him to join in it. After consideration he declined, and from that time he had no interference with it; he never attended any meeting of its concoctors, and knew nothing of it until he was sued by a party, who was a shipbuilder, for an amount exceeding 35,000*l.* To show the hardship of his brother's case, he was informed that the expenses already incurred amounted to 400*l.*, let the case turn out as it might.

Brazil Slave Trade Bill.] The Earl of Aberdeen said, that in moving the Second Reading of the Brazil Slave Trade Bill, he would endeavour to explain as briefly as possible, the reasons why Her Majesty's Government had thought it necessary to introduce that measure to their Lordships. Their Lordships were aware that a Treaty was concluded between this country and Brazil, in the year 1826, for the abolition of the Slave Trade. By the First Article of that Treaty, the contracting parties stipulated that—

"At the expiration of three years, to be reckoned from the exchange of the ratifications of the present Treaty, it shall not be lawful for the subjects of the Emperor of Brazil to be concerned in the carrying on of the African Slave Trade, under any pretext or in any manner whatever; and the carrying on of such trade after that period by any person, subject of his Imperial Majesty, shall be deemed and treated as piracy."

By the Second and Third Articles of the Treaty, the contracting parties mutually agreed, with a view to provide for the regulation of the said trade, till the time of its final abolition—

"To adopt and renew, as effectually as if the same were inserted, the several Articles and provisions of the Treaties concluded between His Britannic Majesty and the King of Portugal on this subject, on the 22nd of January, 1815, and on the 28th of July, 1817, and the several explanatory Articles which had been added thereto."

The last Treaty with Portugal, in the year 1817, contained a provision from which it appeared that the contracting parties contemplated the possible termination of that Convention. By a separate Article, it was agreed that as soon as the total abolition of the Slave Trade on the part of the subjects of the Crown of Portugal should have taken place, the two parties would adapt themselves to the state of circumstances contemplated by the stipulations of the Convention concluded on the 28th July, 1817; but in default of any such regulation, then the conditions of the said Convention should continue in force for fifteen years from the day when the ratifications of the Treaty should take place. The ratifications were exchanged between Brazil and this country on the 13th March, 1827; consequently in three years after that period, the Slave Trade was finally abolished in the Empire of Brazil. Fifteen years from that period had now elapsed; and the Government of Brazil, on the 12th of March last, gave notice to Her Majesty's Minister at Brazil, that on the following day, the Treaty between this country and Brazil would expire, and that the Mixed Commission, and all the instructions connected with it, would be at an end. It might admit of some doubt how far the contingency contemplated by the separate Article had arrived, to entitle the Brazilian Government to put an end to the Treaty. But in a correspondence between Her Majesty's late Government and the Government of Brazil, it appeared that there had been an anticipation of the probability of terminating the provisions within the time specified; and the present Government were, on the whole, disposed to acquiesce in the interpretation put upon the Convention by the Brazilian Government. This country was therefore reduced to the First Article of the Treaty, by which the contracting parties declared that slave trading by any subject of the Brazils should be deemed piracy. That declaration could not, of course, render the Slave Trade piracy by the law of nations; but as between Great Britain and Brazil it became illegal by virtue of that compact. If any State constituted an act illegal or criminal by its own municipal laws, other States were undoubtedly not accustomed to take notice of such act, nor would their tribunals enforce their municipal law; but an act made illegal by virtue of a mutual compact, gave a right to the State entering into such compact to consider the act illegal, and, in consequence, Her Majesty had, by the stipulation in question, acquired the right to order the seizure of all Brazilian subjects found on the high seas engaged in the Slave Trade, of punishing the parties so engaged, and of disposing of their vessels and the goods therein as bona piratorum. When the Act 7th and 8th George IV. was passed, carrying into execution this Convention, care was taken to restrict the power of the Courts of Admiralty and other courts, except the Courts of Mixed Commission appointed for the purpose of carrying the Treaty into effect. Those Mixed Courts had ceased, in consequence of the decision of the Brazilian Government, and it had now become necessary to renew the provisions of the Act of George IV., giving power of exercising jurisdiction in cases of capture. It had been, in effect, necessary to exclude the Courts of Admiralty, because otherwise they might have been called upon, and indeed it would have been necessary for them to exercise jurisdiction under the Convention; but by repealing that part of the Act which prohibited the Courts of Admiralty from taking cognizance of such matters, they would be enabled to exercise this jurisdiction as before. It appeared that the Brazilian Government itself had contemplated this act on the part of the British Government. Shortly after the conclusion of the Treaty, and when he (Lord Aberdeen) held the same office he had now the honour to fill, the Brazilian Minister made application to him that vessels should be permitted to come from the coast of Africa, having sailed before the 13th of March, 1830, without being liable to be detained and treated as pirates, notwithstanding they were met with on the high seas after the 13th of March. In that request Her Majesty's Government acquiesced, and vessels which had sailed from the African coast before that date were not detained. Again, the Brazilian Minister, after three years had elapsed from the signature of the Treaty, and the trade had been finally abolished, maintained that the Courts of Mixed Commission ought to cease, as they only provided for acts done in that trade during the time of its continuance. The Brazilian Government accordingly remonstrated against these courts, and desired that they should cease on the 13th of March, 1830. This application was made to him (the Earl of Aberdeen), but was answered by the noble Lord who succeeded him in office; and he demurred to thea bolition of the Courts of Mixed Commission, giving as a reason, that some considerable time must elapse before tribunals could be constituted for exercising jurisdiction in cases of piracy; and therefore he recommended that the Courts of Mixed Commission should continue. The Brazilian Government still seriously remonstrated against the continuance of these courts, declaring that they were of only a temporary character, instituted with a view of judging of the legality of the detention of vessels engaged in the Slave Trade; but that then (in 1830), as all traffic in slaves had ceased, the tribunals for taking cognizance of acts done in that trade, could not possibly be required for an object which was no longer in existence. The Brazilian Government, therefore, urged that these courts should cease. The British Government of that day, however, remarked that these courts might still have duties to perform, notwithstanding that the Slave Trade had become illegal, and had been declared piracy, and maintained the point that the courts should be allowed to continue. It appeared, then, that the abolition of the Mixed Commission Courts was looked upon as possible in a period of fifteen years, according to the terms specified in the Treaty with Portugal. The object of the present Bill was to remove from the Courts of Admiralty the restrictions thrown upon them by the 7th and 8th George IV. passed for carrying into execution the Treaty with Brazil. It was only recently that he (the Earl of Aberdeen) had himself called the attention of the Brazilian Government to the necessity under which Her Majesty's Government might find themselves of appealing to the First Article of the Treaty as he had described it. Their Lordships were aware that the Brazilian Government had always declined to fulfil their general engagements to co-operate with the British Government for the effectual abolition of the Slave Trade. In a note which he addressed to that Government in July, 1843, after strongly remonstrating with them, he declared that the time had arrived when it became Her Majesty's Government distinctly to declare that if the abolition which had been contracted for by the Convention should fail for want of that co-operation so continually asked for by the British at the hands of the Brazilian Government, and if the latter still declined to enter into arrangements to give effect to that Convention, it would remain for Her Majesty alone, and by Her own means, to carry into full effect the abolition imposed upon Her by the First Article of the Treaty. It had, therefore, in consequence of the Courts of Mixed Commission being put an end to, been found necessary to repeal that part of the Act which prohibited the Courts of Admiralty from taking cognizance of these cases. He did not know that it was necessary for him to allude to the course pursued since the conclusion of the Treaty by the Brazilian Government generally. With rare and short exceptions the Treaty had been by them systematically violated from the period of its conclusion to the present time. Cargoes of slaves had been landed in open day in the streets of the capital, and bought and sold like cattle, without any obstacle whatsoever being imposed upon the traffic. Our officers had been waylaid, maltreated, and even assassinated while in the execution of their duty; and justice, in such cases, if not actually denied, had never been fairly granted. No doubt much had happened in the course of the last ten or twelve years, which would have justified, and almost called for, an expression of national resentment; but Her Majesty's Government had no wish save to provide for the effectual execution of the Treaty as stipulated for by the First Article; and with that view he had brought forward the present Bill, which had been approved of by the highest authorities in such matters, and he now moved their Lordships to give it a second reading.

Bill read 2ª.

ADMINISTRATION OF CRIMINAL JUSTICE BILL.] Lord Brougham moved the Second Reading of the Administration of Criminal Justice Bill. His noble and Learned Friend on the Woolsack, and all their Lordships, were aware of the great inconvenience which arose in the trial of prisoners in different counties, in consequence of the provision of the law which required that all prisoners should be tried in the same part of the country in which the offences they were charged with had been committed. Now, it had occurred to learned persons who had considered the subject, that if certain towns were fixed upon as assize towns, to be declared by the Queen in Council, and the prisoners in each of the counties within a certain ambit were taken to be tried in those towns, the same Judge could deliver them out of gaol. The only objection he had heard urged against the proposal was, that it would be hard for prisoners to be obliged to bring their witnesses from a distance. But the treasurer of the county might be required, on receiving the certificate of the Judge, to pay the expense of conveying the witnesses of prisoners. If this measure was not adopted, more Judges must be appointed, as the present number could not deliver the gaols, and no mortal man could go four circuits in the year. Could anything be more ridiculously absurd, than that those who had committed offences within the ambit of the Central Criminal Court should not be kept in prison before trial longer than eight or ten days, whilst those who had committed the same offences, or much lighter, in Hertfordshire, or Berks, or Surrey, should be kept eight months in prison?—and they might be innocent all the while, or, if guilty, their offence might be punishable with only six months' imprisonment. There was only one of two courses to be adopted—either to pass the Bill with such alterations as might be suggested, or to appoint a greater number of Judges, to which there was always this objection—it would not be easy to devise means of employing the additional Judges during the rest of the year, after the circuits were over. He considered that, by two additional Judges, an improvement might be made in the mode of doing chamber business, which was now done in a way highly unsatisfactory to the suitor. The two Judges might sit permanently in a court, with the check and advice of a Bar. A single Judge now in chambers hardly could be said to have full possession of his faculties, during the hurry and heat of a mob of attorneys' clerks. He wished that chamber practice were brought more into public, and if the number of Judges were increased, one objection, as to the want of employment for them in some parts of the year, might thereby be obviated.

The Duke of Richmond said, that one objection to the Bill was the increase it would cause to the county rates. Why, he would ask, were the charges required for the purposes of the Bill to be imposed on the county rates, and not to be paid out of the Consolidated Fund? He liked his noble and learned Friend's latter proposition much better.

Lord Campbell was very far from being adverse to the principle of his noble and learned Friend's Bill. He was ready to agree that it might be found expedient to consolidate counties, and work on the principle of the Central Criminal Court Bill, which had been found most beneficial in its operation. He would, however, advise his noble and learned Friend to postpone the Bill for the present Session, because he doubted whether, as it now stood, it would work at all, and whether is could be framed during the present Session so as to be carried into effect. There were many parts of the present Bill —the apportionment of the expenses, the places whence the jury were to be summoned, and where the prisoner was to be tried, how the judgment was to be carried into execution—which would require the most careful consideration. He should say that the consolidation should be carried into effect rather by Act of Parliamnet than by the Sovereign in Council. If a power of removing the prisoner from one county to another for trial were to be granted, it was not difficult to see that it might prove one of a very dangerous nature in many cases, as, for instance, in Ireland, if a prisoner were removed from Cork to Monaghan; it would be well, therefore, that the boundaries of the districts to be created should be defined by Act of Parliament. He would suggest that another Commission should be issued by the Crown, to consider the whole subject, and, as part of it, the distribution of England and Ireland into circuits, and the division of the year between term and vacation. What he (Lord Campbell) anxiously desired was, that there should be a joint consideration of what should be done in England, and what should be done in Ireland. His noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack would find no difficulty in selecting a number of Irish Judges and barristers to join with English Judges and barristers for this purpose. He had on a former occasion ventured to suggest to their Lordships, that most important measure which, in his humble opinion, would do more to consolidate the Union than anything that had been done since the Act of Parliament passed—that was, as his noble Friend on the cross bench (the Duke of Richmond) remarked, in a loud whisper (he hoped it was heard all over the House, for it would not increase the county rates)—that there should be an interchange of Judges between England and Ireland. The law was the same in both countries; there was not the smallest doubt that the Irish Judges were as learned and as competent in all respects as the English to administer the law, and the people of England would be perfectly satisfied with their decisions. The English Judges, again, going into Ireland, and carrying the authority that belonged to them, he believed that their decisions would be received without suspicion, and with the most implicit reverence. A great deal had been said about additional Judges. There were two spare Judges in Ireland, who might be brought over, and sent a circuit. In Ireland there were now six circuits, several of them so short that they might be got over in three weeks. The Irish circuits, therefore, might be consolidated, and reduced to five, so that ten Judges would be quite sufficient for the administration of justice in that country, and two spare Judges would be left, who might have an English circuit assigned to them. A joint Commission would examine this point among others, and see what could be effected by the whole of the judicial staff both in England and Ireland. He (Lord Campbell) had it from undoubted authority, that that most enlightened statesman and devoted friend of Ireland, the Marquess Wellesley, had a long-deliberated plan for the purpose of amalgamating the law, and having Irishmen appointed to judicial situations in England, and Englishmen to judicial situations in Ireland. He knew from undoubted authority that that plan had occupied much of his thoughts, and that he was of opinion that it would be practicable and beneficial. If a Joint Commission of English and Irish lawyers, and intelligent country gentlemen, were appointed, he was sure the greatest benefit would be derived from their labours. The Bill was at present in an imperfect and crude state; to carry it into effect would be very difficult; the better plan would be, not to press it in the meantime, and for Government to issue such a Commission as he had suggested. With respect to the Commission lately issued to determine the circuits, it turned out that their powers were much more limited than was desirable with a view to their utility. He understood that they had consulted the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Home Department, though it might have been supposed that they would act on their own view of their powers; and Sir James Graham then intimated to them that they had no power to do more than they had done. They laid all the blame at his door; but, however that was, it was agreed on all hands that the Commission had been a miscarriage. The Report was universally condemned. It could not be acted upon, and the right course would be to issue another Commission, with extensive powers, applying to Ireland as well as England; from which he thought the most beneficial consequences might be expected.

The Lord Chancellor said, with regard to the suggestion of an interchange of Judges between England and Ireland, with which they had been favoured by his noble and learned Friend, perhaps he meant that it should also extend to an exchange of Chancellors, the judicial force of one country being substituted for the other, somewhat in the manner an exchange of militia was effected. It was a matter which would require a great deal of inquiry, examination, and reflection, before they acceded to that part of his noble and learned Friend's proposition. He was ready to admit that the Irish Judges were individuals who possessed a great knowledge of law, and who were in no respect inferior to those of this country; yet their acquaintance with the habits and manners of the persons to whom they were to administer justice was a very important consideration. He agreed in that part of his noble and learned Friend's observations which referred to the Report of the Commissioners. He was bound to say, that he thought it an unsatisfactory document. He was not exactly acquainted with the circumstances of their reference to the right hon. Gentleman to whom his noble and learned Friend had alluded. Upon some points he (the Lord Chancellor) would have thought that they might more naturally have referred to himself; but having limited their inquiries within the narrow definition given to their powers, the result undoubtedly was, that their Report was entirely unsatisfactory. He might state, therefore, that he had felt it his duty to advise Her Majesty to issue a new Commission, with fresh and extensive powers, for the purpose of reporting on the ten questions which had been submitted for the opinion of those learned Commissioners, and also on others of very great magnitude connected with them, including the subjects brought under their Lordships' notice by this very Bill. With respect to the present measure, he did not see how it would satisfactorily meet the object which his noble and learned Friend had in view. Instead of going to four or five counties in succession to hold the assizes, the Judges were to assemble in one particular county, and the prisoners were to be brought from the surrounding counties to that central point. He did not know that the time now occupied by the Judges in travelling was very important; but the only time saved by the new arrangement would be that occupied in going from the one county to the other. He had always thought it better that the Judges should go to different districts in succession, than that the jurors, witnesses, prisoners, and all other persons obliged to attend the courts, should be brought from several counties round to one central point. The Bill did not provide as to the mode of summoning the juries, nor from what quarters they were to come, nor how they were to manage with respect to grand juries. Another point, of which they should not omit the consideration, was, how the prisoners on trial were to procure the attendance of their witnesses. It was a matter of very great importance to a man, generally a very poor man, on trial, perhaps, for his life. It would be no satisfaction to them were the Bill to provide that they should have their expenses reimbursed, for they had not the means of advancing the money in the first instance; and the consequence would be, that these persons would find themselves at a distance from those acquainted with the circumstances of the case, helpless, and without defence or resources. He would suggest to his noble and learned Friend, that the best course would be to let the Bill stand over for further consideration, in order to see whether the Government could meet the difficulties to which his noble and learned Friend had adverted.

Lord Denman feared their Lordships would have a long time to wait if they waited till the Commission made a satisfactory Report on all the subjects to which their attention would be called, and more particularly if they included the proposal of any interchange of circuits between Ireland and England. With respect to that proposal of his noble and learned Friend, if the Government should think it right to call upon the Irish Judges to assist those of England in the performance of their duties, he was sure that no persons would receive a heartier welcome. But he thought that this Bill gave an opportunity of doing that with effect; and if they waited to see the Report of the Commission, no man could tell how few of their Lordships might live to see it. He entirely approved of his noble and learned Friend's measure: there was only one respect in which he would wish to see it amended, by following the example set in a Bill also introduced by his noble and learned Friend—that most useful and expedient measure, the Central Criminal Court Bill—and by giving power to form convenient districts for the trial of offences. That Bill offered a complete model by which this might be done in any part of England, and the machinery might fitly be borrowed, since it was capable of being brought into practice at the earliest possible period. He thought his noble and learned Friend, in preparing his Bill, made out a case which must find its way to every man's conviction. The time of imprisonment before trial, was already too long; it ought not to be extended in any case. In his opinion, even four months might be too long; and that not merely with a view to the feelings of the prisoners. Nothing could be more inconvenient than to bring up a man for trial, and have him acquitted by the jury, from a misplaced feeling, no doubt, but still a very natural one, in consequence of his having been so long in prison, or have him sentenced to a shorter term of imprisonment than he would otherwise have received. His opinion was, that there ought to be very frequent deliveries of jails, but that there ought not to be a third circuit. In his opinion a third winter circuit, established as a regular part of the machinery of justice in the country, would be a most enormous evil. He quite agreed that it was much more reasonable that Judges should travel, than jurors, witnesses and others connected with the administration of justice. But deliveries of jails, beyond those now provided by the regular course of procedure, ought, in his view, to be occasional, and regulated by a regard to the pressure of the particular circumstances. Suppose there was an absolute necessity, from the state of the country, for sending a Commission to deliver the jails in the county of Leicester, there might be persons from Derby, Nottingham, Lincolnshire even, who were to be tried at the same time. Would it not be an immense convenience for all parties that a Central Criminal Court should dispose of that business? This travelling of Judges was not worth thinking of; but if the Commission had to be opened at several places, a great deal of time was occupied at each, and the witnesses generally came very much farther than they would have to do under the system he recommended. The last winter circuit, was, he believed, appointed with very little consideration by his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack, and after very little consultation with the Judges. The effect was, to put a stop to some of the most important business of the country going on in Westminster Hall; the Courts of Error were obliged to suspend their business. The Court of Queen's Bench had acted on a Bill passed in the year 1838, which enabled them to dispose of their arrears, at that time amounting to considerably upwards of 400 cases. They had gone on for eight years, the Judges giving up their leisure for the purpose of getting rid of the arrears, and at the end of last year they had brought the list of arrears down to very little more than 100 cases. The whole of that was sacrificed, and the arrears had risen again. This, it could not be denied, was a most serious evil; a great improvement was prevented, and the whole system was deranged by a winter circuit interfering, and taking three of the Judges. If the power of creating new districts were to be given, the Crown might exercise it according to its discretion, and the necessities of the case, in such a way as not to interfere with any important business proceedings; and so far from persons being put to increased expense, he thought a considerable saving would be effected. If their Lordships should be of opinion that the Bill was not at present in such a state that it could be brought satisfactorily into operation, if passed before the expiring of the present Session, then they must hope that the improved state of the country, and, he was very happy to add, the great diminution of crime in every part, might make it less necessary that any particular measure should be adopted. But he (Lord Denman) thought that some further measure ought to be taken, and thus the pressure —not on the Judges, who did not care where they were, provided they were serving the public, since, as they said, they must be somewhere — but on the public interested in the administration of justice, might be prevented. A single instance would show, better than anything, the waste of time and money under the present system. If a man, convicted of stealing a faggot worth one penny, in a parish where he was perfectly well known, was taken before a magistrate, and pleaded guilty, expressing his sorrow for what he had done, the result was, that he might be sent eighty or 100 miles, if in the county of York, to the assize town, to take his trial, the whole county being summoned to hear the statement he had made before the magistrate; while, perhaps, in the absolute mockery of justice, he might be acquitted after all, when he had been detained in prison for six months, and the whole county put to enormous expense. Even the quarter sessions might impose the same penalty on him. There ought to be a simpler process for cases of this description, and many minor matters might be suggested, by which a great deal of trouble and expense would be saved.

Lord Brougham said, what his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack had stated, determined him not to press the Bill beyond a second reading until the issue of the Commission, by which, no doubt, much good would be effected. His noble and learned Friend's (Lord Denman's) opinion seemed to be to have consolidations of the counties, and that, besides the ordinary circuits, occasional Commissions should be sent, according to the exigencies of the case. He (Lord Brougham) was disposed rather in favour of permanent circuits. With respect to the Commission—he did not mean the last one, for that was deceased, and he would say nothing against the dead, it had gone the way of the Railway Board —he hoped it would be altogether a new one, for he did not like to see learned Judges employed on a Commission, and thought it much better that they should be employed in the administration of the law. As to the question of the circuits, he was decidedly against employing practising barristers who went the circuits; for he found by late Reports that all the practising barristers had voted one way, naturally enough voting according to their predilections and conscientious opinions; but he would take persons who would not have to decide upon matters affecting their own business. There could be no difficulty whatever in appointing other professional men on the Commission, not connected with the administration of justice in those districts with respect to which the questions arose. He concurred with all that had been said in praise of the manner in which the Irish Judges discharged their duties; and he must add, that what came under his own cognizance of their proceedings, confirmed his opinion as to their eminent ability. The only objection to their coming in aid of the English Judges, and the latter being occasionally transferred to Ireland, was the great apprehension with which any one must undertake the trial of a cause, when he was unacquainted with the habits, manners, and character of the people amongst whom it arose. If the Irish Judges did come, he agreed with his noble Friend (Lord Denman) that these virtuous, able men, would meet with a hearty welcome. As to the disposal of the arrear, he must say that he was not satisfied with the account given by his noble Friend (Lord Denman), of 700 cases being cleared off in seven years.

Lord Denman: But all the other business was performed at the same time.

Lord Brougham: Well, this was very creditable to the Judges of the Queen's Bench: but he though the real remedy for the evil of an excessive arrear would be the addition of two Judges. He hoped the Committee about to be appointed would turn its attention to this point, as well as to another which was really as absurd as the old notion of the choice of the jury from the vicinage—he meant depriving the plaintiff of the choice of his court. Why should not the plaintiff and defendant be exactly on the same footing in this respect, particularly as the nominal plaintiff was very often the real defendant, as in an action by the person in possession for an easement?

ADMINISTRATION OF CRIMINAL JUSTICE BILL — LORD DENMAN.] Lord Denman moved the committal of this Bill.

The Duke of Richmond said, he agreed with the principle of the Bill; but wished to suggest two Amendments—first, that persons convicted of bestial offences should be whipped as often as the Judge should direct; and also that no imprisonment should last longer than two years. As to the first, he thought that such a punishment might well be inflicted on the men who were generally found to commit such offences, and who were abandoned profligates, lost to all sense of shame. As to the second suggestion, he thought no man ought to be imprisoned for a longer period than two years.

Lord Denman promised to consider these suggestions, with the view of inserting them in the Bill on the bringing up of the Report.

Bill committed.

House adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SESSION.] Sir R. Peel said: Sir, perhaps it may be the most convenient course if, in moving the Order of the Day, I fulfil the promise which I have made, to state with respect to those legislative measures which are of the greatest importance the course which Her Majesty's Government proposes to pursue, seeing the very advanced period of the Session, and the great mass of public business yet to be discharged. Before I allude to the Bills under the consideration of the House, or likely to come from the House of Lords, I will answer a question put to me a few days since in respect to those measures connected with railway legislation which have immediate relation to the Board of Trade. It will be recollected, the Government promised that, availing ourselves of the experience of Committees on Railways in the course of the Session, we would maturely consider the relation in which that department stands to railways, and that if we had any modifications to suggest either in the constitution of the Board, or in the nature of the functions it has to perform, we would indicate them at a sufficiently early period to enable the House to adopt any proceedings that might be thought necessary. In the course of the present week, therefore, either I or my right hon. Friend the Vice President of the Board of Trade, will lay on the Table of the House a Minute of the Board of Trade, stating the alterations that we think desirable to have made in the functions that were last year suggested it should undertake with respect to Railway Bills. I believe the general purport of the Minute will be to continue the Board as the guardian of the public interests, giving it a power to report whether any particular project does affect these peculiar interests or not; but at the same time to relieve it from the task of deciding on the relative merits of competing lines. It is proposed that the several projects shall still be laid before the Board of Trade, and that Reports shall be continued to be laid before Parliament by the Board with respect to the merits of those projects as far as they affect the public interests, but without reference to the merits of the different competing plans. That, I believe, is the nature of the regulation suggested; and it is intended that a Minute of it shall be laid on the Table of the House in the course of this week. As I am speaking on the subject of railway legislation, I may as well refer to the Address to the Crown which has been agreed to on the Motion of the hon. Member for Stockport (Mr. Cobden), praying for the appointment of a Commission to inquire into the relative merits of the broad and narrow gauge. I wish to inform the House that three Commissioners have been appointed to report whether the broad or the narrow gauge has the higher merit; and they are gentlemen whose character will, I think, satisfy the House that the matter will be fully considered. They are—Sir Frederick Smith, Professor Barlow, and Professor Airey. I believe it would be hard to suggest the names of any three gentlemen which would be received with greater respect, or whose professional acquirements are calculated to give greater satisfaction. Having said this much, I will now proceed to state the course which we propose to pursue, subject to the approbation of the House, with regard to the measures now under the consideration of this House, or which will be submitted to its consideration in consequence of proceedings in another branch of the Legislature. I regret to find, on a view of these measures, several of those which yet remain to be discharged, and that must or ought to be discharged, are very important. Still, though the quantity of business to be got through is very great, I think it will be of advantage if I make a positive announcement on the part of the Government of the course which we intend to pursue respecting the measures which we feel it to be our duty to press on the consideration of the House. The entire number of Bills amounts I believe, to not less than between fifty and sixty. Of these a great number, though important to the public interests, are not, I believe, of so pressing a nature that their postponement will lead to any great public inconvenience. It is hardly necessary that I should go into details respecting the whole of these Bills; and I will, therefore, confine myself to those which are of public importance, or likely to lead to much discussion. In the first instance, we propose to proceed with the Irish Colleges Bill. That Bill has yet to undergo consideration in the House of Lords, and it is of great importance that it should be sent to that House at as early a period as possible. We propose, therefore, as far as possible, to give precedence to that Bill, and to conclude the discussion upon it before we take up any other measure. In consequence of the discussions which have already taken place on this Bill, it will not be necessary, most probably, to delay the progress of the Bill in its later stages as long as would otherwise be necessary. It stands first after the Privilege Question on this evening; and after it passes through Committee, which I hope will be on this evening, the House will then have to deal with the Motion for which the hon. Member for Wycombe (Captain Bernal) has an Amendment to the Report being received. The hon. Member was induced to postpone that Motion at the instance of my right hon. Friend (Sir J. Graham); and if the hon. Member still determines on proceeding with it on the bringing up of the Report, I shall feel it my duty, after his compliance with the request of my right hon. Friend, to give him an opportunity of doing so either then, or on the third reading of the Bill. It is for him and the House to decide, and I shall certainly feel myself called upon to accede to whatever course he wishes to adopt. If the hon. Member wishes to bring on his Motion at the first stage, I should wish to fix the bringing up of the Report for Thursday next, and the third reading for the following day. If the hon. Gentleman, however, consents to make his Motion on the third reading of the Bill, the House will probably consent to receive the Report either to-morrow or the next day, and take the third reading on Thursday. Another Bill, which I believe to be of the greatest importance, and the general principle of which has been favourably received by the House, is one relating to Scotland, and in which I do not anticipate any very protracted discussion, or any very great difficulty in passing it through the House—I mean the Poor-law Amendment Scotland Bill. Another Bill which I would wish to proceed with, and which I have been reluctantly obliged to postpone for a long time, in consequence of the discussions which have taken place on the subject of the Maynooth Bill and the Irish Colleges Bill, is the Bill for removing certain disabilities under which the Jews suffer. I would wish to fix the second reading of that Bill at an early period. There are many other Bills which must be brought under discussion, in consequence of being continuing Bills. It may be said that it was the duty of Her Majesty's Government to bring these Bills on before; but we found that to be impossible, in consequence of the time taken up with other matters. I do not complain of the discussions that have taken place on various questions; but I only refer to them as a proof that we had no opportunity of bringing forward much public business at an earlier period. Among the Bills to which I allude, and which must be continued, is the Bills of Exchange Bill, which continues the modifications of the usury laws. There are also other Bills, which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department has charge of, and which are continuous Bills. For instance, there is a Bill to continue the Act which will expire at the end of the present year, relating to the rating of stock. There is also the Turnpike Trusts Bill, and the Bill for providing for the removal of Irish and Scotch poor. This Bill will be the more necessary if my right hon. Friend (Sir James Graham) does, as he proposes, with regard to another measure, namely, relinquish for the present Session the hope of passing the Parochial Settlement Bill into a law. In addition to the Bills which I have mentioned, there are several Bills connected with Ireland, with respect to which I believe no very material differences are likely to arise. These are the Valuation Bill, the Criminal Lunatics Bill, the Bill which is called the Constables Public Works Bill, the Drainage of Land Bill, and the Joint Stock Company's Bill, which is intended to extend to Ireland the same regulations which were applied to England by the Bill of last Session. There is also, I think, a Fisheries Bill, which is likewise intended to be forwarded. In addition to this mass of business to be got through in the course of the present Session, there still remain not less than eighty Votes of Supply. There are also four Notices of Motion given by hon. Members for the first occasion of the House going into Supply. I trust, therefore, that on account of the advanced period of the Session, and the mass of business necessary to be gone through, that hon. Gentlemen will be induced to wave their Motions, and thus to give us facilities for getting through with the Votes of Supply. This will be the more necessary, as some days will elapse, after disposing of the Irish Colleges Bill, before the House can go into Committee of Supply. This day week will, I apprehend, be the very earliest day on which we can expect to get into Committee of Supply. Under these circumstances, we have thought it best to make up our minds to relinquish the following Bills. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department wishes to have an opportunity of reprinting the Bill for regulating the practice of Physic and Surgery. My right hon. Friend had flattered himself that this Bill was so far advanced that an agreement would take place between the parties interested, and that possibly a general assent would be given to the measure. If he be justified in taking this view of the question, and if, after the Bill is reprinted, it is likely to be agreed to, and that there is a probability of the House being relieved from the question next Session, then he trusts to be able to pass it; but if any very decided opposition be apparent, after it is reprinted, rather than consume the time of the House in discussions, my right hon. Friend, after reprinting the Bill with the modifications, which I believe are not great, will not press it against the decided sense of any considerable number of the Members of the House. He means also to relinquish the Justices' Clerks and Clerks of the Peace Bill; and, as I said before, the Parochial Settlement Bill. I omitted to state that there is expected from the Lords some Bill of considerable importance—one relative to the Slave Trade, which is now under consideration in that House, and has passed the second reading. Another measure, brought forward by the Board of Trade, or the Board of Admiralty, will also be persevered in. I allude to the Merchant Seamen's Bill, which I think we may fairly hope to to pass into a law. There is another Bill, called the Merchant Seamen's Fund Bill, which we propose to postpone. If it meet with the general concurrence of the House, we shall take the course that I have now mentioned. There are several other Bills for which Her Majesty's Government are not responsible; but I confine myself to the chief. I need not advert to those in charge of private Members. I have here a list of, I believe, seventeen, which are under the charge of individual Members of Parliament, such as the Coal Trade Bill, and others; and these I cannot be expected to give any opinion upon. With respect to the Charitable Trusts Bill, I believe it to be a Bill of very great importance. Her Majesty's Government, after full consideration, approved of the principle of that Bill; but still I am justified in stating that it has been brought under the consideration of Parliament at so late a period of the Session, that I scarcely think it can be persevered in with any probability of success in this Session. From the great number of persons interested in it, I think it would be sure to lead to a protracted discussion, and I think it will cause a good deal of local excitement and fruitless consumption of time if it be not dropped. With that Bill we do not therefore propose to persevere; and I will add, that the parties interested in it are entitled to a better opportunity of having their interests attended to than they could be at this period of the Session. I am not aware that there are any other measures which it is necessary for me to refer to. [An hon. Member: The Ecclesiastical Courts Bill.] That is a Bill of which the noble Lord opposite (Lord John Russell) has charge. As that Bill is founded on similar principles as the Bill which Her Majesty's Government brought in on a former occasion, I must say that I shall feel bound to vote for the second reading; but at the same time I cannot, on the part of Her Majesty's Government, pledge myself to any support of the details of the measure. If the noble Lord wishes to have an opportunity of taking the sense of the House on the second reading of the Bill, I certainly shall give my consent to the second reading; but at the same time I cannot promise any farther assistance in carrying it through the House farther than to affirm the principle of the Bill. If the noble Lord wishes me to enter into any other arrangement, on the part of Her Majesty's Government I must beg to decline. [Captain Berkeley: What of the Small Debts Bill?] I rather think that this is one of the Bills which we propose to proceed with. There are also Bills relating to the Geological Society, to the consolidation of land revenue, and other Bills which we will go on with. [Mr. Collett: The Commons' Enclosure Bill?] I will propose to assign a morning sitting to this Bill; and I do hope, after the general impression which exists of the Bill being favourable to the interests of the working classes of society, that it will be allowed to pass. There is another measure that I am anxious to have the concurrence of the House in favour of. We have recently made very important alterations in the Customs Acts, and I think that thirteen years have now elapsed since the consolidation of the Customs Laws. The consolidation of these laws has been found a great convenience to the merchants; and we are prepared to bring in a Bill on this subject, which I hope will be allowed to pass without difficulty. The Act will be found to be a great convenience to the mercantile body; and I hope it will be carried without any attempt to pass abstract Amendments, which would have the effect of substantially postponing the measure for another Session. If it meets with the unanimous concurrence of the House, I would wish to pass a Bill just to consolidate the law, and to do so in as brief a form as possible, and if even verbal changes were to be introduced, full notice should be given of it. [Mr. M. Bellew: The Lunacy Bills?] The Lunacy Bill stands on the Motion of my noble Friend for Thursday. [Mr. Shaw: What of the Irish Landlords and Tenants Bill?] That has not come down yet from the other House.

Lord John Russell: The Bill alluded to by the right hon. Baronet—the Ecclesiastical Courts Bill—is one of which I took charge, on finding that my right hon. Friend the Member for Devonport (Sir George Grey), who was far better qualified to conduct it through the House than I am, was not able to do so. I thought the right hon. Baronet would have been enabled to say, with respect to that Bill, that there was a sufficient number of Government days on which it might go through the House, either for its acceptance or its rejection. If he had done so, I should be prepared to go on with it; but I do not conceive that any purpose would be answered by proceeding to the second reading of a Bill nearly similar to that which was introduced by Her Majesty's Government in 1843, and the second reading of which was affirmed. I should hope, however, that in the course of the next Session Her Majesty's Government will undertake to bring forward such a Bill; and certainly if they do not, either I or my right hon. Friend will undertake it, and in that case I should hope that the right hon. Gentleman will give it that support which I gave his Bill for regulating controverted elections. I am not prepared, under these circumstances, to carry the Bill farther on the present occasion. The right hon. Baronet appeared rather to think that those Members who have Amendments to propose, on the House going into Committee of Supply, would be willing to forego their right. I am sorry to say that I am not prepared to hold out any hope to the right hon. Baronet of his desires in this respect being likely to meet with much support; and I have farther to inform him that another question will probably be added to them, provided no other opportunity presents itself for bringing it forward. The question is one that naturally arises in consequence of the recent proceedings that have taken place with regard to the correspondence that has been published on the subject of Spanish colonial sugar between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of Spain. My noble Friend the Member for Tiverton (Lord Palmerston) intends to draw the attention of the House to this subject; and he will, I am sure, be willing to fix it in any manner that will best suit the convenience of the House both as to time and to the exact form in which he would make it. The subject is one which now occupies much public attention; and, as the correspondence has only recently been printed, the Motion is one that could not have been brought forward earlier. With regard to the selection of Bills that the right hon. Gentleman has made, I have only to state that I am glad to find that certain Bills have been given up; and for my part, so far from exhibiting the spirit that is usually shown towards the Government on such occasions, and of considering them much to blame because Bills introduced in February should be dropped in July, I freely admit that it is almost unavoidable when measures of great importance are brought forward in the early part of the Session, that other measures must be unavoidably kept back. In conclusion, the noble Lord asked the right hon. Baronet whether the Bill respecting the duty on coals would be persevered in or otherwise?

Sir R. Peel said, the Bill was in the nature of a continuous Bill, and should therefore be brought on.

Captain B. Osborne would not oppose the bringing up of the Report on the Irish Colleges Bill, if his Motion could be taken on the third reading. As he was on his legs, he would wish to ask the right hon. Baronet whether it were the intention of Her Majesty's Government, if the Landlords and Tenants Bill came down from the Lords, to carry it through that House this Session. He was the more anxious that a distinct answer should be given on this subject, because he believed the great majority of the Irish Members were waiting in town merely to know the course which was intended to be taken with regard to that Bill.

Sir R. Peel said, the Bill had been referred to a Select Committee of the House of Lords, and until it came forth from that Committee, it was impossible that he could say what course the Government would pursue with respect to it.

Sir Robert Inglis was well satisfied that his noble Friend (Lord John Russell) had withdrawn from the further consideration of the House his Ecclesiastical Courts Bill. He trusted that the House would correctly understand his right hon. Friend (Sir Robert Peel) when he had stated that he was favourable to the principle of the noble Lord's Bill, inasmuch as he had himself introduced a similar measure to the House on a former occasion. Now he wished to remind the right hon. Baronet that the Bill which they had received, not indeed from his hand, but from his Government, was a Bill much less objectionable in its provisions than the analogous Bill of his noble Friend opposite. He hoped, therefore, that the right hon. Baronet would explain to the House that he would not adopt the noble Lord's Bill instead of his own.

Sir R. Peel said, Her Majesty's Government had very maturely considered the alterations which it would be desirable to have made in the state of the Ecclesiastical Courts; and they had accordingly brought a measure before Parliament, which had been assented to—he would not say by a very large majority, but by a majority of the House on the second reading. He should state that he preferred that Bill to the second Bill, now pending; and in stating that he was ready to vote with the noble Lord in favour of the second reading, he did not consider that he was adopting the measures of the noble Lord, in preference to the first Bill.

Mr. Redington said, he would wish to know whether it was the intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce any measure for the registration of voters in Ireland, and also for an Amendment of the Municipal Corporations Bill in that country. He thought it was somewhat extraordinary that the whole Session had been allowed to elapse without any Bills being laid on the Table of the House on these two important subjects, both of which were so much in need of alteration.

Sir Robert Peel said, it was distinctly stated by him, at a very early period of the Session, that he was anxious to introduce certain measures relating to Ireland, among which he wished that the Bill for the improvement of Maynooth, and the Irish Colleges Bill, should have precedence. A week would probably elapse before the latter Bill would leave that House, and under those circumstances, and considering how the Session had been occupied, he did not think the hon. Gentleman had a right to complain of any want of attention in the present Session to Irish measures. The right hon. Baronet was understood to add, that it was the wish of Her Majesty's Government that the Irish Municipal bodies should be placed upon the same footing as the English corporations.

Mr. Hume said, he wished to have some understanding with regard to the tax upon coals. He would be glad that the Government should fix some day for discussing that subject. He objected to the tax of one penny a ton being fixed on coals, to be expended under the control of the Commissioners of Woods and Forests.

Sir R. Peel said, he could not at present fix a day for that purpose. The House should recollect that the tax alluded to by the hon. Member was not a tax imposed by Government, but a tax for effecting local improvements in certain parts of the metropolis.

THE MAGISTRACY OF IRELAND.] Viscount Clements alluded to a letter read by the Marquis of Headfort at a meeting held in Ireland last week, of which the following was a part:—

"Dublin Castle, July 1, 1845.

"My Lord—I am directed by the Lord Lieutenant to state, for the information of your Lordship and the magistrates of the county of Cavan, in reference to the resolutions of a former meeting of the magistrates of the county, communicated to his Excellency by the Lord Farnham, that his Excellency has appointed Mr. Wilcocks to be superintending magistrate of the county of Leitrim and its borders, and that the following resident magistrates have been directed to place themselves in immediate communication with him for the purpose of more combined and effectual exertion towards the suppression of outrage; and his Excellency trusts that the local as well as the stipendiary magistrates of the county will derive much advantage from this arrangement. Mr. Wilcocks has been directed to cultivate the most confidential intercourse with the local magistracy and with the military officers in command of troops in his district; and his Excellency has no doubt, from his known character and experience, that he will carry out the views of Government with regard to the district thus placed in his charge."

He (Lord Clements) wished to know what was meant by a superintending magistrate, and what were the intentions of Government?

Sir T. Fremantle thought, that if the noble Lord would read the letter throughout deliberately, he would be able to answer his own question, both with regard to what was meant by a superintending magistrate, and the intentions of Her Majesty's Government. But he would inform the noble Lord, that the Government intended to use every exertion, and all the means which the existing law allowed them, to preserve the public peace in the disturbed districts of Ireland. An additional number of stipendiary magistrates had been appointed to those districts. Ten gentlemen had been directed to meet, in order to concert measures for effectually dealing with the state of affairs, and for dividing the districts and arranging the constabulary force for that purpose. It was thought desirable that one of the magistrates, Mr. Wilcocks, should act as the superintending magistrate of the county of Leitrim; with whom the resident magistrates, for the purpose of more combined and effectual exertion, should put themselves into communication, Mr. Wilcocks being the organ and channel of communication between them and the Government. The plan was similar to that which was adopted some years ago in reference to the county of Tipperary. It was not intended that Mr. Wilcocks should have any authority over the other magistrates. As to the intentions of Her Majesty's Government, if the noble Lord would put his question more explicitly, he should be able, perhaps, to answer it more fully. But the Government was determined to use all the power they possessed, and they hoped successfully, to restore order and tranquillity in those districts where outrages had lately taken place.

PRIVILEGE—CASE OF MR. PARROTT.] On the Question that the petition presented by Jasper Parrott, Esq., be further considered,

Sir J. Y. Buller rose to present a petition from Theodore Divett, of Totness, Devon, attorney, who stated therein that Charles Edwards was his partner, and had brought an action against Mr. Jasper Parrott, on behalf of one David Phillips, without ever having consulted the petitioner on the subject. Petitioner had never interfered in the proceedings, they being entirely conducted by the said Charles Edwards. The petitioner, therefore, prayed that he might be discharged from further attendance on the House. The hon. Baronet said, that the petitioner had assured him privately that these statements were true. He moved that the petition be laid on the Table of the House, and trusted that its prayer would be granted.

Petition to lie on the Table.

Sir J. Y. Buller also presented a petition from Charles Edwards, of Totness, and Thomas Baker, of Lime Street, attorneys, stating, that they had brought the action against Mr. Parrott on account of giving evidence before a Committee of that House, which evidence was stated in the declaration to be wilfully and maliciously false; that, in so doing, they were not aware that they were committing a breach of privilege, as they did not suppose that privilege would be extended to evidence not given bonâ fide. The petitioners also stated, that the indictment was so brought that the action would not lie unless it could be proved, in the first instance, that the evidence was known to be false at the time it was given. They trusted that the House would not deem them guilty of an infraction of its privileges; and if they had committed a breach of privilege, they had done so unintentionally; and they prayed the House to take all these circumstances into consideration.

Petition laid on the Table.

On the Motion of Mr. Divett, Mr. David Phillips was called to the bar.

In answer to questions put by Mr. Speaker, he stated that he was a surgeon, residing in the parish of Buckfastleigh, in the county of Devon, and plaintiff in the action of "Phillips v. Parrott;" that the action was brought partly for what Mr. Parrott had stated before a Committee of that House, and partly for what he had stated before the board of guardians of Totness. Had heard the declaration in this action read. Was aware that the statement in the declaration related to a question put to Mr. Parrott by an hon. Member of that House.

Are you aware that the answer given by Mr. Parrott to that question is stated in the declaration?

In reply to this question, the witness stated that he had no perfect recollection of the particular expressions. He understood them at the time he heard the declaration read. He had no intention of infringing on the privileges of the House; he knew nothing of the question of privilege: if he had done wrong he had acted unintentionally, and expressed his regret. He had pursued every means for the protection of his character, and had tried every means to get redress. All he wished for was, to defend his character; and he requested the board of guardians and Mr. Parrott to bring the matter forward, for the purpose of its being examined into, before he went to law. He had also written to the Poor Law Commissioners on the subject; but their answer was, that they could not interfere in the matter. His character had been destroyed, or attempted to be destroyed, and he was thrown out of his situation. It was twenty-four years since he had begun practice, and he was now no longer allowed to be the medical officer of the Union in which he was residing. The statement made against him in the Medical Poor Relief Committee was from beginning to end false, and he believed maliciously so. There was not one word of truth in it from beginning to end.

Sir J. Y. Buller asked the witness whether, being now aware that he had committed a breach of privilege, by calling in question evidence given before a Committee of that House, he was now willing to instruct his agents to withdraw the action?

The witness stated, that he would bow submissively to the House; but he hoped that the House would take some steps to inquire respecting his character.

By Mr. Divett: Witness gave instructions to his solicitors to commence the action, he thought, about October, November, or December last: he left to his attorney to determine in what court to bring the action. After calling on the board of guardians to inquire respecting this matter, he wrote a circular to all the guardians; and he took the liberty, on the 22nd of November, of directing one to the noble Lord (Ashley) who presided over the Medical Poor Relief Committee.

In answer to questions put by several hon. Members, the witness proceeded to state, that he felt himself aggrieved by the board of guardians collectively; he received no answer to the circular which he sent to Lord Ashley; he had been told, since he had been in town, that the best course for him to pursue was, to petition the House to inquire into the truth or falsehood of the evidence of which he complained; but he had hitherto presented no petition to that effect. He wrote the circular to Lord Ashley some time before the commencement of the action. The statement of which he complained was made before a Committee of that House. At the first meeting of the board of guardians after Mr. Parrott's return, Mr. Parrott said that the statements which he had made would shortly be printed and published, and that then would be seen what he had said.

Sir T. Wilde inquired whether there was any matter of complaint in the declaration, except the statement made by Mr. Parrott before a Committee of that House?

The witness said he had not read the declaration himself, but had heard it read, and it was perfectly in accordance with the explanation he had given. He was little acquainted with legal technicalities; but having read the statement made against him by Mr. Parrott before a Committee of that House, he declared that, from beginning to end, it was perfectly untrue; his action was brought for that matter, and the insinuation made by Mr. Parrott, in the board-room, on his return from London, to the effect that he would not then go into the statements, but that they might be seen when printed and published: not having taken a copy of the declaration, witness could not say whether anything was read to him from the declaration, except the evidence of Mr. Parrott before the Committee of that House.

By Mr. Baldwin: Witness had lost all his parish business; but could not say how far his private practice had suffered.

Mr. Phillips withdrew.

On the Question that Mr. Charles Edwards, attorney, be called to the bar, being put,

Lord J. Russell doubted whether, before going further, they ought not to take into consideration the answer of the last witness to a question put by the hon. Baronet the Member for South Devon (Sir J. Buller). The witness had stated that he was willing to withdraw his action, and submit himself to the House. If that were the case, if the witness did not wish to offend against the privileges of the House, and they should obtain from him a formal declaration in answer to a question put by the Speaker to that effect, he (Lord J. Russell) thought the House would have some grounds to proceed upon with regard to what was to be done. If such an answer should be given, he did not think it necessary, at least to-day, to examine the attorneys in the case.

Mr. Divett could not agree with his noble Friend; it was evident that the party they had had before them knew very little of the privileges of the House; but his attorneys did, and, if they advised him, were the culpable parties. He must persist in his Motion that Mr. Charles Edwards be called to the bar.

Mr. Hindley said, the House ought to consider whether the allegations contained in the statement of Mr. Phillips were correct or not, before they engaged in a contest with the attorneys in the case. He thought that gentleman had stated a case which it was incumbent on them to investigate; they ought to do their utmost to ascertain the truth, but not allow any one to make statements injurious to private character.

Sir R. Peel was inclined to agree with the suggestions of the noble Lord opposite; he thought it must be evident to every one that the witness who had appeared at the bar was not very competent to judge what was a question of privilege. He understood the witness to say that he was not cognizant of the privileges of the House, nor had he intended to infringe them. The House had sufficient evidence before it to come to the conclusion that the witness was aware he had committed an error, and was sorry for it. He thought substantial justice would be done if the witness, being apprised that this was not the way to attempt to obtain redress, should consent to withdraw the action, and the House should receive his acknowledgment that it was commenced in error; the House would afford the witness an opportunity of substantiating his case if it thought what had been stated before the Committee was false.

Mr. Roebuck admitted that the House had received reparation as far as regarded the witness himself; but he was not the only offender. The real offender was behind; the person who had really offended was the attorney. The House ought to have from him the same assurance that he had committed the offence, and was sorry for it. Unless he distinctly asked pardon of the House, it ought not to be satisfied.

Sir T. Wilde hoped he should not be thought one who disregarded the privileges of that House; he wished to keep a broad distinction between the questions, whether parties should be allowed to submit to the courts of law the privileges of that House, and what the House might think proper to do on a complaint made to it by parties thinking themselves injured by matter published under its authority; these two questions were quite distinct from each other. Considering the present state of the question of Parliamentary privilege, it struck him that it would be unbecoming in the House suddenly to take up a case with the strong hand; after the late discussion on this subject a reasonable doubt might be entertained as to what would break the privileges of the House, and what would not. The House might well be satisfied with bringing the party to the bar, and warning him that this was a case involving a breach of its privileges, accepting his apology and offer to stay proceedings, rather than at once proceed against other parties or the attorneys. He thought the witness had given a sufficient indication of his desire to submit to the decision of the House; they had a statement that at a subsequent time the House would give him an opportunity of obtaining justice with regard to his character. But at the present moment the question before the House was whether this individual was guilty of a breach of the privileges of the House, whether he had done so knowingly, and whether he was inclined now to submit respectfully to the authority of the House? He thought, from the manner in which the witness had conducted himself, that he was willing to submit to the authority of the House; he entirely gave up his action. He thought they had better accept his submission, and for the present pass the subject by, because this revival of the authority of the House might be an example to others who would come before them with much less ground for excuse than the individual then in attendance; therefore, allowing the question suggested to be put by the Speaker, would be the best course for the dignity of the House. If they thought fit, they might afterwards call in the attorney, but they had better first dispose of the individual before them. With respect to the attorney, he could not proceed after his client had given up the action; and as the late discussion had raised a doubt if the House had any privileges at all, whether this complaint might be a subject for legal investigation or not, it would be well for it to accept the apology, and, satisfied with that, to proceed no further.

Sir R. Inglis said, as he understood it, the suggestion was that the witness should be recalled, and on stating his regret for having offended the House, and his willingness to withdraw the action, he should be released. But he agreed with the hon. and learned Member for Bath, that the House was bound to proceed much further with respect to the two gentlemen who had framed the declaration. It was perfectly clear that the action was brought in respect to evidence given under the protection of that House; and such evidence was essential if they meant to discharge any functions of inquiry at all. So far he was perfectly willing to support the privileges of the House. On a repetition of the expression of regret for having violated the privileges of the House, and a formal renunciation of the action, the witness might be discharged.

Viscount Howick believed the witness was disposed to yield to the authority of the House; but he confessed he had a great objection to the suggested mode of proceeding—that of calling the witness in person to the bar, and asking him whether he was prepared to make that submission. The very fact of the House asking such a question would, in many cases, rather invite resistance. The more proper course would be, that the House should come to a Resolution declaring that the parties aggrieved by evidence given before a Committee of that House or at its bar, instead of seeking redress by an appeal to a court of law, should be bound to seek redress by applying for protection to that House. If this gentleman was aggrieved by such evidence, he ought to have petitioned the House for permission to proceed against the person giving the evidence in a court of law; or the House might have appointed a Committee to inquire into the justice of the complaint. But if they permitted legal proceedings to be instituted in the first instance, inquiry before a Committee would be nugatory. Having come to such a Resolution, they could adjourn further proceedings with respect to this party till he thought proper to petition them, withdrawing his action, and appealing to the House for redress. The moment such a petition was presented, he should approve of his discharge from custody; but he would not consent that Mr. Phillips should be called to the bar and invited to make concessions, which he might possibly refuse, and by the refusal of which he would increase the difficulties and lower the dignity of the House. He had drawn up a Resolution on the subject to this effect:—"That the House does not allow any person aggrieved by statements made by witnesses before Committees or at the bar of the House, to institute legal proceedings against such witness for evidence so given, without previous permission from the House; and persons so aggrieved are bound in the first instance to appeal for redress to that House."

Mr. Hume had no objection to this being done; but they should first ascertain who had brought the action. The witness seemed to know very little about it.

Sir R. Peel said, there was one case so much in point, that the House ought to be aware of it. It occurred in the reign of William III., when a person named Gee prosecuted certain individuals for petitioning the House, and in their petition making allegations against his character. The matter was heard, and Gee alleged by his counsel that what he had done he had done in ignorance; when he found the question was taken notice of by the House, he ceased his action; but, notwithstanding that submission, the House voted it a breach of its privileges, and gave him in custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Sir G. Grey said, that as the witness submitted to the House, there was no doubt he would consent to present such a petition; and he suggested the question should be adjourned till to-morrow, to enable such a petition to be prepared.

Mr. D. Dundas had more than once felt that they were proceeding against the rules of natural justice. Here was a man standing without counsel or help before an assembly of this kind; in the case cited by the right hon. Baronet, that of "Gee and Kemp," the party rebelling against the authority of the House was furnished with counsel. In the present case they were not acting according to justice; they called on this unlearned person at the bar to explain the meaning of legal declarations, and asked him other questions which many learned Gentlemen in that House would find it difficult to answer. In the case cited, the question was referred to a Committee of that House. He believed that Committee was attended by counsel, and on the Report of the Committee the House acted. In the case of Gee, the petitioners were a number of hackney coachmen, who alleged several grievances; among them that Gee, as a commissioner of hackney coaches, had received bribes for licensing, and had acted harshly towards them; and prayed the House to remove him from his office. Gee brought an action against the petitioners, calling the allegations scandalous libels. But it was held that such a course was a breach of privilege, tending to discourage people from seeking redress of grievances in the form of petition. The case was referred to a Committee on the 9th of February, 1696, which made a Report. Gee said that what he had done was entirely in ignorance of the privileges of the House; this witness said the same. Gee said he did it to save his reputation and character; so did this gentleman. Unless the House showed itself firm, they would have a plentiful crop of actions; they would have small attorneys, and perhaps large ones, bringing actions against witnesses for what they stated before Committees of that House. He hoped, before the House took any step that would shut the door against further inquiry, it would refer the matter to a Committee, and when the parties had been heard by themselves or their counsel, take such steps on the Report of the Committee as would maintain the dignity of the House, and prevent actions from being brought which were not only harassing to the parties, but, if successful, destructive to the authority of the House.

Lord J. Russell, after what had been said, thought there was little doubt except as to the mode of proceeding. If it was more regular that a petition should be presented to the House, he thought it better they should not proceed further without deliberation. He would move as an Amendment, that "to-morrow" be inserted in the Motion instead of "to-day."

The Speaker having put the Question,

Mr. Divett said, if it was the wish of the House that he should give way, he had no objection; but if he did so, it would be with the reservation of the right to call the attorney and the other parties to the bar.

Sir T. Wilde said, he would be prepared to move a Resolution to the effect that it was made apparent to the House that Mr. Phillips had brought an action on evidence given before a Committee of that House, and that his having done so was a breach of privilege. He believed that a petition from Mr. Phillips was already in the hands of an hon. Member.

Sir J. Y. Buller said, he had such a petition. It expressed the petitioner's regret that the action should have been brought. It stated, that at the time of commencing the action, he was not aware that he was committing a breach of the privileges of the House, but that he had since been informed that it was; and he now expressed his humble regret and contrition, and assured the House that no further proceedings should be taken in the said action.

Sir R. Inglis thought that it would be better, if the House determined to release Mr. Phillips, that he should be brought to the bar for that purpose immediately, as his detention till to-morrow would cause him considerable inconvenience and injury. At the same time, he doubted whether they ought to terminate their inquiry on the mere expression of Mr. Phillips's regret, and without being prepared to act with respect to the other parties also.

Mr. Warburton hoped the hon. Member for Exeter would withdraw his Motion, so as to enable the House to dispose of Mr. Phillips's case, leaving that of Mr. Edwards and the other parties to be dealt with afterwards.

Lord J. Russell said, that in moving his Amendment, his object was to enable the House to come to some arrangement with respect to Mr. Phillips, before dealing with the case of Mr. Edwards and the others. He would withdraw his Amendment, if the hon. Member for Exeter would withdraw his Motion, the question as to the other parties being still left open.

Amendment and Original Motion withdrawn.

Sir T. Wilde then moved—

"That it appears to this House that the Action brought by David Phillips against Jaspar Parrott, Esq. is brought in respect of the Evidence given by Mr. Parrott before a Committee of this House."

Motion agreed to.

The hon. and learned Member then mov—

"That the commencement of the said Action was a Breach of the Privilege of this House."

Also agreed to.

Sir J. Y. Buller presented the petition of Mr. Phillips, expressing his regret that he had unknowingly violated the privileges of the House, etc., which was read.

Sir R. Peel moved the following Resolution:—

"That in consideration that David Phillips has in his Petition, presented to this House, disclaimed all intention to violate its Privileges in the commencement of the said Action; and has expressed his contrition for his offence, and prayed the lenient consideration of the House for the same, and declared his intention not to proceed further in the said Action, this House does not deem it to be necessary to take any further steps for the punishment of the said offence."

Resolution agreed to, and it was ordered that David Phillips be discharged from any further attendance on the House.

Mr. Divett moved that Charles Edwards be brought to the bar.

Sir T. Wilde suggested the expediency of allowing the attorney until to-morrow to present a petition, if he thought fit. At all events, whether he came prepared to make his peace or not, the House would be in a better position to-morrow to deal with the case. He moved an Amendment accordingly.

Mr. Roebuck said, he could not see any use in delay. The whole matter might be got through in half an hour.

Viscount Howick was in favour of postponing any further proceedings until to-morrow. It would, in his opinion, be exceedingly impolitic to call the parties to the bar before they knew whether they were prepared to make concessions or not.

Mr. Hume was for proceeding immediately. It appeared to him that they would be lowering their own dignity by delay.

Mr. Divett would be very sorry to divide the House on a minor point of this description. If he could gather the general feeling of the House, it was in favour of postponement until to-morrow. ["No, no."] Some hon. Members, at all events, were opposed to proceeding that evening; and with the consent of the House, therefore, he would withdraw his Motion, and move instead, that the parties should be ordered to attend at the bar to-morrow.

Mr. Wakley said, they had settled the matter with the principal; but the lawyer, who was the real sinner, was then in the lobby. The unfortunate Phillips had acted, no doubt, under the advice of his solicitor. With regard to him the proceeding was at an end, he having declared that he would abandon his action. All that the attorney could do was to show his contempt for their authority. If Edwards were called in that evening, he would probably tell them under whose advice he had acted, and what counsel it was who drew up the declaration.

Mr. Granger said, that he could not agree with the noble Lord the Member for Sunderland, who said that it was inexpedient to call the attorney to the bar until he was prepared to state that he would make a submission to the House. There was no doubt that bringing an action, under the circumstances of this case, was a breach of the privileges of this House, and as they had already dealt with the principal in the action, he did not see why they should not have the attorney at the bar. He thought the most dignified course to pursue was to call in the attorney at once, and if he were prepared for submission, then they might postpone any further proceedings till to-morrow.

Viscount Howick stated that he had not said one word bearing the remotest approach to what the hon. Member (Mr. Granger) had attributed to him. What he said was, that the true mode of proceeding was, for the party to present a petition, expressing his submission, as, by asking him if he would submit, the House would invite refusal.

Sir R. Peel said, that they had received the declaration of the plaintiff, to the effect that he would not go on with the action; and after that declaration, it was quite clear the attorney could not proceed. All that the attorney could do in the case was to express his contrition for having undertaken the action, and after that expression of contrition, the question for the House to entertain was, whether or not the expression of his contrition was to be received as sufficient. He thought they had properly disposed of the case of the principal; but he was not so clear in his opinion as to the course recommended of entering into a contest with the attorney, as the case could not now go on, the principal having expressed his intention of not proceeding further with it.

Mr. Hume hoped the right hon. Baronet would, under those circumstances, either move that the order for the attendance of the parties be discharged, or that they should be summoned to appear without delay.

Sir T. Wilde said, that in this case the attorney could not go on without the consent of the plaintiff. There were cases in which the attorney might proceed to save his costs, when there was collusion between the plaintiff and defendant, to prevent the attorney from getting his costs; but in the present case there was a bonâ fide cessation of the action, and the attorney could not proceed with it even though he should lose his costs.

Mr. Borthwick said he was authorized to say, on the behalf of the parties who were the subjects of the Motion before the House, that if they had committed any breach of the privileges of the House, they were sorry for having done so.

Sir Robert Peel said, that what those parties were prepared to do could not for a moment enter into his mind so as to influence the course which he should recommend to the House; and he, therefore, could not feel the more inclined to call them to the bar, because the House had an assurance that they were sorry. It would be a shabby course, if they called in those parties, because, forsooth, they knew that they would express their sorrow at the bar for the course which they had adopted with respect to this action.

Mr. T. Duncombe said, that the right hon. Baronet ought to bring the parties to the bar at once, or to discharge them altogether. If they gave the parties time until to-morrow to consider what course they should pursue, there might be many learned Gentlemen in this town who would advise them not to present a petition to the House expressing their submission. The question might then arise what redress an individual was to have who was slandered or defamed before a Committee of that House. If a witness gave false evidence before an Election Committee, he was likely to be indicted for perjury; and he did not see why witnesses before other Parliamentary Committees ought not to be equally amenable to the law. It would appear as if the House must in the end allow an action, if a witness gave false and slanderous evidence. In the present case the plaintiff stated, that by the evidence of Parrott, he had been ruined in his profession, in his purse, and in his prospects; and what redress could he obtain? He thought it would be better to discharge the order for attendance, and he should have been pleased if all the parties had been mentioned in the Resolution discharging Mr. Phillips.

Sir T. Wilde said, that the Resolution discharging Phillips was directed only to him, because no other parties were then before them. There was a very great difference between the evidence of an individual before a Committee of that House, and the evidence in a court of law; for before the Committee of that House there was no particular issue to be tried, and the witness had his mind ransacked by every question which the Committee pleased, being left no option. So that where questions were put at large to a witness, and in such a manner, it would be monstrous to confine him to the technical rules of evidence. When a man volunteered evidence of a defamatory character, the person so defamed would be in a very different position as regarded reparation; but where a witness was compelled to give evidence, it would be monstrous to allow the common law means of punishment to be brought against him, as if he had volunteered it. They should not come to a side-wind decision as to what was to be done for a person who had slanderous evidence given against him before a Committee of the House. The question as to what justice should be rendered to a person in such a situation should not be gone into at present, because it would not facilitate the decision of the present question, which was, what was to be done with the attorney in the action? He agreed with his hon. Friend that the other question was an important one; and if his hon. Friend should bring it before the House, he should be ready to render him all the assistance in his power. At the present it was expedient that the House should confine their attention to the question, whether it were proper that they should call the attorney to the bar to answer for his conduct, or whether, instead of calling him immediately forward, they should postpone calling him before them till to-morrow? He hoped the House was prepared to maintain its privileges; but he hoped also, that as it was not necessary to do so, they would not embark at present on the question raised by his hon. Friend. He thought that all that was expedient now was, that the parties who had violated the privileges of the House should be called forward to-morrow.

Mr. Roebuck observed that the noble Lord had suggested that the matter should rest where it was until to-morrow, and that the parties should, in the meantime, find out what the House had resolved upon. Now the dignified, straightforward, simple, and manly course was to bring them forward to the bar immediately, and to say to them that they (the House) had read their petition, and had resolved that the action which they had brought was a breach of privilege. Thereupon he had no doubt what would follow. Knowing the will and determination of the House in the matter, the parties would bow in submission to them, and would say that they had been wrongly advised in the step which they had taken; that they were mistaken in what they did; that they were sorry for it; and that now, upon being informed what was the determination of this House, they were ready to submit. That was the simple course to adopt. The noble Lord virtually proposed to shut up the whole matter. Could they do the parties any injury by calling them in? Could they risk the dignity of the House by calling them in? He was desirous that they should be immediately called to the bar, and that the proposal to postpone their appearance till to morrow should be rejected.

Sir T. Wilde apprehended that the noble Lord was quite right in suggesting that the other party should not be called immediately in. They had resolved that the commencement of the action was a breach of privilege. They had also an acknowledgment by the attorney, who presented a petition, that he was the party who had brought the action, and he stated his reasons for bringing it. Therefore there was no doubt but that he was guilty of a breach of privilege. The only thing in which he differed from the noble Lord was, that they should now come to a resolution that their privileges had been infringed, and then adjourn the matter over till to-morrow. In order to avoid placing themselves in a situation of being compelled to act, they should give the parties an opportunity of presenting a petition, and making their peace with the House. [An hon. Member: If called now, they might apologize.] Apologize! How are they to apologize? The House could not accept an apology at the bar. The Parliamentary mode of apologizing was by petition. That was the only mode in which the House could entertain an apology. The more dignified course would be to adjourn the consideration of the subject till to-morrow. If they called the offending parties to the bar to-night, they would, he apprehended, be compelled to come to-night to some sort of resolution or another. If they must commit Mr. Edwards and Mr. Baker, as for breach of privilege, unless in the Parliamentary mode they made an apology to the House, and if the House thought fit to sit still whilst the parties prepared their petition, all he could say was, that such was neither the usual nor the dignified course of proceeding. By adjourning the matter till to-morrow there would be no difficulty, as they might then vote that the parties had broken the privileges of the House, and then, if they thought fit to accept the apology, which the parties might make in the proper form, they might resolve that such apology was sufficient. It was not expedient to call them forward to-night, when, by their so doing, the parties would not have the opportunity of conciliating the House, and confessing their error.

Mr. Greene wished to ask the Speaker a question in reference to the point, as to whether a verbal apology at the bar was or was not sufficient to entitle a party to the indulgence of the House. He apprehended that a party standing at the bar, and there stating, in the presence of the House, that he regretted the course which he had taken, and praying the indulgence of the House, would adopt a course sufficient to maintain the privileges of the House, and that the House might act upon such a statement. If the parties were called to the bar, and were disposed to make such statement and application to the House, he apprehended that such would, in the present instance, be sufficient, without calling upon the parties to petition. Such a course would be quite sufficient to maintain the privileges of the House.

Sir James Graham wished, before the Speaker answered the question put to him, to remind him of what the right hon. Gentleman had most likely not forgotten, that on the first appearance of Howard at the bar of the House, submission was made verbally, and not by petition.

Mr. Speaker observed that the right hon. Baronet had reminded him of a case which supported the views which he had originally entertained of the matter, that it was not absolutely necessary that the parties should petition the House. If the parties should appear and submit themselves verbally at the bar of the House, that, he apprehended, would be sufficient. In this case it was necessary that the House should come to some determination as to what he should address to the parties when they were called to the bar.

Mr. Bernal said, that although he was disposed to concur in what the hon. Member for Finsbury had said, he was also disposed to agree with the hon. and learned Gentleman (Sir Thomas Wilde), who suggested that that question could not properly be brought forward on the present occasion. Unless they were prepared to say that the parties should be at once discharged, he was not disposed to have their attendance at the bar immediately.

Sir R. Inglis did not feel satisfied with the statement of the parties that they had acted in ignorance, because he saw in their declarations a most studied avoidance of any reference to the source whence they obtained their information.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer observed, that in the first petition which they had presented that evening, these gentlemen stated that they apprehended that the state of the law was that a witness was protected, except when he maliciously and slanderously stated facts which were not true, in giving his evidence; and that, as a witness was not protected, under such circumstances, in a court of justice, they had argued that the protection of the House of Commons extended no further than that afforded to witnesses by a court of justice, and that it was under that impression that they had brought the action against the defendant. He had himself looked into the law on this matter, and found that there were strong opinions on the one side as well as on the other, as to whether witnesses were or were not to be protected who gave evidence in a court of justice of matters not true, with a slanderous and malicious intent.

Sir R. Peel would repeat that he thought they were entering into a very unworthy contest with the attorneys in the cause, as they had got a sufficient apology from the principal; and if any inducement were wanting to desist from proceeding further in the matter, it now appeared that an apology in a proper form was to be given immediately by the attorneys.

Mr. Granger observed, that to him the debate had been very unsatisfactory. He feared that their course to-night would teach the public that if a man were bold enough to stand at their bar and defy them, the House would shrink from proceeding against him.

Motion and Amendment withdrawn.

Sir John Yarde Buller presented a petition from Charles Edwards, Thomas Baker, and the other parties summoned to appear before the House, stating that they were not aware, in bringing the action complained of, that they were guilty of a breach of the privileges of the House, expressing their contrition at having violated its privileges, and throwing themselves upon the indulgence of the House.

Viscount Howick observed that all that now remained to be done was that the House should come to the same resolution as it had come to in the case of Mr. Phillips, and state that, in consideration that Charles Edwards, Thomas Baker, and others, had, in the petition presented by them, disclaimed all intention of violating the privileges of that House, and had expressed their contrition for their offence, and prayed for the lenient consideration of the House; on account of the same, the House did not deem it necessary to take any further steps for the punishment of the said offence. He begged, therefore, to move that Resolution; and he would not prolong the discussion further, except to state, that nothing could be a more complete misapprehension of his views than what was stated by the hon. Member for Durham (Mr. Granger) when he observed that he (Lord Howick) and others were disposed to shrink from asserting the privileges of the House. He was disposed to maintain the privileges of the House.

A Resolution similar to that agreed to in the case of Phillips was adopted, and all the parties ordered to be discharged from further attendance on the House.

COLLEGES (IRELAND) BILL.] House in Committee on the Colleges (Ireland) Bill.

On Clause 14,

Mr. Borthwick wished that the students should be required to attend divine service in their respective churches and chapels daily; and also that the following clause be inserted after Clause 14:—

"And for the better securing the due attendance of the students in the said Colleges for divine worship, according to the creeds which they severally profess to hold, be it enacted, that it shall be lawful for the president and professors, or other governing body of each of the said Colleges which shall be constituted in and by the said letters patent, to assign chapels within the precincts of each College for the use of chaplains, to be endowed in the same manner and by the same authority as the professors; and that within such chapels prayers shall be said, and divine worship celebrated twice every day, according to the forms required by such religious creeds as shall be recognised by such governing body; and that regulations shall be made for the due attendance of the students on divine worship at such of the said chapels as shall be approved by their parents or guardians respectively."

He should likewise propose the omission of Clause 14. Having given his silent support to the principle of the Bill, he should not now avail himself of this opportunity of reopening that discussion which occupied the House on the second reading; but should state briefly the grounds on which he sought to introduce into the measure what he believed to be no change of principle, but an important provision for carrying into effect the objects Her Majesty's Government had in view. It was admitted on both sides of the House that no education could be sound that was not based on religion. Under whatever circumstances man was found, whether in savage or civilized life, the one motive which especially governed all his actions, and shaped his social and civil existence, was a religious motive. That was a principle in human nature which the Legislature was bound to recognise in bringing forward a measure for the education and improvement of the people. In fact, no legislation could be sound which did not recognise, and endeavour as far as possible to control and guide, the religious principle in man. The great difficulty in the present instance arose from the religious hostility among the professors of rival creeds. If, for example, Dr. Higgins, who had been elevated to the episcopal bench in his Church, the Bishop of Cashel, and Dr. Cooke of Belfast—a man who held a high rank in the Presbyterian Church—were appointed to fill the chairs of the Professors of Theology in the new Colleges, he thought the dogmatic lectures of those men (eminent and talented as he admitted them to be) would be anything but calculated to promote religious charity among the students. The object of the proposition he made was to change the character of the religious instruction altogether—to make it, not didactic, but liturgic—to instruct the students, not by lectures delivered ex cathedra, but by means of the liturgy provided by their respective Churches. His object was to place religious instruction in the Colleges about to be established in Ireland, on a footing similar to that of Oxford and Cambridge. The hon. Member for Liskeard said he received no religious instruction at Oxford, except what he received at chapel; and that there was less religious instruction provided there for the students than at the College at Edinburgh. The hon. Gentleman, in saying so, was dealing with those unknown quantities with which he had become so well acquainted at Trinity. He himself (Mr. Borthwick) had had opportunities of knowing that in the College of Edinburgh the students were asked no questions about religion, unless they were intended for the Church of Scotland; and in that case, they were required to attend the prelections of the Divinity Professor. But at Oxford and Cambridge, if a student attended chapel regularly during three years, he would have had an opportunity of hearing the whole of the Old Testament read three times, and the whole of the New Testament nine times, independently of the selections of the Liturgy. By this means, an entire system of Christian theology, from the first Sunday in Advent till the last Sunday in Trinity, was brought before the minds of the students. He could not conceive a more complete system of religious instruction than that afforded to the students at Oxford and Cambridge. It was told of Mr. Pitt, that while in Pembroke College, he never missed attended chapel morning or evening for a single day. If the provision which he had proposed were adopted, the tenets of the Church of England, and also those of the Roman Catholic Church, could be taught without bringing sectarian points before the minds of the students. As the Presbyterian Church had no liturgy, they might meet for daily prayer. The reason why it was not necessary to teach dogmatic theology to every student in Oxford and Cambridge was, because in the former there were seventeen chapels, and in the latter twenty-four, open twice every day. He saw no necessity for the appointment of professors of dogmatic theology. There was no sectarian mathematics, no Roman Catholic geology, no Protestant anatomy. All that was necessary on the subject of general learning and science might be communicated without interfering with or encouraging the sectarian prejudices of any body. But if professors' chairs of theology were instituted, religious rancour and uncharitable feeling among the students would be the inevitable result. He believed the Bill before the House was calculated to effect the greatest good in Ireland; and that the only impediment to that good would be the 14th Clause as it then stood. He believed the proposition he made, if adopted, would communicate far more religious instruction, while it would be free from the disadvantage of intermixing that instruction with anything of a sectarian or uncharitable nature.

Colonel Sibthorp wished it to be understood that in opposing this Bill he was influenced by no uncharitable feeling towards the Roman Catholics of Ireland. He entertained great respect for the talent of the Government, but deeply regretted their inconsistency. Consistency was the strongest and greatest virtue of a Government. But the present Government had exhibited a subservient expediency, and a strong desire to go to the opposite side. He regretted to see such Bills as this and the Maynooth Bill emanating from parties professing the Protestant religion. He could not place much reliance on the professions of men who acted so inconsistently; for he judged of men by their conduct and not by their professions. There were times when he could not believe that the right hon. the First Lord of the Treasury and the right hon. the Secretrary of State for the Home Department could be capable of bringing forward such measures; but now those Gentlemen were playing the cards in a manner that no one had expected. He had opposed this Bill at its introduction; he should oppose it at the bringing up of the Report, and also at the third reading, and no modification of it would reconcile him to it. He regretted very much that the Government were acting with two faces under a hood, and not in the manner which they had led the country to believe they would act.

Sir J. Graham regretted that the course which he and his Colleagues thought it their duty to pursue, did not meet with the approbation of the hon. and gallant Gentleman. The Bill, however, was one of great importance, and not brought forward without a strong sense of its necessity. He thanked the hon. Gentleman for curtailing the observations he had intended to make, and for abstaining from a discussion of the general principles of the measure, though at the same time he (Sir J. Graham) must say the speech of the hon. Member was somewhat discursive. The hon. Gentleman must see that he was raising a question quite distinct from that contained in the clause before the House. The question of catechetical or liturgical instruction was provided for in other clauses of the Bill. With respect to religious worship in the boarding-houses to be licensed under this Bill, his hon. Friend the Member for the West Riding of York (Mr. S. Wortley) had given notice of an Amendment, namely, an addition to this clause with respect to the religious instruction to be given in those halls, and to that Amendment it was not his intention to offer the least obstruction. With respect to the halls, he had no objection to the employment of religious instruction. With respect to the third case, namely, the case of students living with their parents or guardians, he thought that in such a case as that the parents and guardians ought to be the best judges of what was necessary for the religious instruction of the students under their care and control. Neither would he consent to omit the words which his hon. Friend proposed to omit. His hon. Friend proposed that without the consent of the Crown the governing body of each of those Colleges should be competent to make regulations for the religious instruction of the students and pupils within the College itself. Now, the words used in this clause were—

"And that religious teachers recognised by the governing body, may, with the consent of the governing body, and the consent of the Crown having been previously obtained, have the use of such rooms, &c."

The question had already been raised that in those Colleges chaplains should be appointed. The sense of the Committee had decided against that proposition, and, à fortiori, he must suppose that the sense of the Committee would be adverse to the establishment of chapels in these Colleges, As he understood the proposition of his noble Friend, it was, that chaplains should be appointed, and that chapels should be built within the walls of those Colleges; and that the attendance of the students should be compulsorily enforced in those places of religious teaching and worship. Now, it seemed to him (Sir J. Graham) that any such forced attendance, whether of pupils under the control of their parents and guardians, or of pupils emancipated from parental control—it seemed to him that to make the attendance of those pupils forced and compulsory, would be a great stretch of authority. His hon. Friend had said, that the great basis of all knowledge should be religous instruction. From that proposition he (Sir J. Graham) was not disposed to dissent. But they must see that the case of Ireland was a very peculiar case, and it was necessary to consider the present measure strictly applicable to the peculiar circumstances of Ireland. Now, for instance, if they were to attempt to enforce any system of religious instruction according, for instance, exclusively with the tenets of the Protestant religion, the effect of such a measure would be practically to exclude seven-eighths of the population of Ireland. Effects equally objectionable would follow if they were to set up exclusively the tenets of any particular sect. If they were to confound religious with secular instruction, they must adopt some plan in which all might participate; and if they were to adopt a plan in which all might participate, they must exclude all points of religious difference. There remained then only one course open, and that was now under discussion, namely, that religious instruction should be provided for in the manner in which it was provided for in this Bill. He would not consent to this Amendment, which he considered to be at variance with the principle of the Bill.

Mr. Wyse had no doubt that, with the marked zeal which the Catholic hierarchy and clergy had in the worst of times provided for the spiritual wants of their flocks—a zeal which he could not so far wrong them as to suppose for an instant could be abated—they would be eager to make immediate provision, with the generous co-operation of the laity, which could not be better given than in such a cause, not only for chaplains in their respective halls, but for those professorships of religion in that ample sense to which he had just referred, embracing not doctrine only, and its important scriptural and traditional evidences, but its history and historic influences upon every age and generation. He believed, that at no period were the Catholic clergy more animated by the deep and sacred convictions of the necessity of religious instruction and teaching. It was, he knew, the fashion in other places, he was sorry to add at times also in that House, to represent the Catholic hierarchy as adverse to the religious teaching of their flocks, and affected by a dread of the results of a free circulation of the holy word of God amongst the people. He was glad to have an opportunity afforded him, here in face of other religious communions, and in the midst of the Commons of England, on unequivocal authority, to repudiate the calumny. He held in his hands a passage purporting to be an extract from a speech stated to have been made by the Protestant Bishop of Cashel and Waterford, at the Sixth Annual Meeting of the Church Education Society, March 27, 1845. He quoted from the Dublin Evening Post of the same date. At that meeting, which was numerously attended, he is reported to have said—

"That they were assembled, not alone upon a subject of pounds, shillings, and pence, but upon one of principle—upon the principle upon which the Church was based at the time of the Reformation, when they separated from the Romish Church — the principle of giving to all classes a free access to the word of God, which their Society would diffuse, and which it was necessary to the existence of the Church of Rome to suppress."

Now, to this assertion—he would characterize it by no harsher term—of the right rev. Prelate, he could only oppose facts —facts vouched for by an authority at least not inferior to his own for veracity or any other Christian quality, he referred to the venerated Dr. Denvir. That most respectable prelate stated that previously to 1839, Mr. Smyth published 11,000 copies, Messrs. Simmons and M'Intyre, 18,000, Mr. Mairs, 9,000, and Mr. Archer, 2,000. From that period, Simmons and M'Intyre have published 22,000 copies, Mr. Archer 3,000 Testaments and 600 Bibles, in all, 72,600 copies of the Catholic Scriptures in one town, at the lowest price; giving no evidence, certainly, of a desire on the part of the venerable prelate, under whose authority they appeared, of the desire mentioned by the Bishop of Cashel to suppress the Holy Scriptures. But was this all? He had another document still more striking to refer to. In the number of the Nation, Feb. 8, 1845, the Bishop of Cashel, if he ever referred to such paper, would find the following advertisement :—

"The cheapest Catholic Bible of the size ever published. Richard Coyne, 4, Capel-street, has published in twelve parts, at 6*d.* each, a stereotype edition of the Holy Bible, octavo, containing 1,226 pages of letter press, double columns. Each part contains ninety-six pages."

And to this is subjoined the following recommendation, signed so early as 1829 by twenty-four Catholic bishops, headed by the Most Rev. Dr. Murray :—

"This new edition of the English Version of the Bible, printed, with our permission, by Richard Coyne, 4, Capel-street, collated by our direction, with the Clementine Vulgate; likewise, with the Douay Version of the Old Testament of 1609, and with the Rhemish Version of the New Testament of 1582, and with the other approved English Versions, we, by our authority, approve. And we declare that the same may be used with great spiritual profit by the faithful; provided it be read with the due reverence and the proper dispositions. —Given at Dublin, 2nd September, 1829."

Nor was this an idle letter; the Rev. Theobald Mathew, a name not to be mentioned in any assembly of Christians without gratitude and respect, was not less zealous for the dissemination of the sacred volume than the prelates themselves. He would take the liberty to read to the House the short Address which he directed to the Temperance Societies :—

"My dear Friends—As the united Catholic bishops of Ireland have especially recommended the faithful under their jurisdiction, 'to read with due reverence and proper dispositions the Holy Bible published by R. Coyne,' and as he now proposes to issue the Divine Volume under the same authority, in twelve parts, at 6*d.* each, so as to suit the means and circumstances of all classes—in order to assist in carrying into practical effect the recommendation of the venerable prelates, I humbly, but most earnestly, entreat all the members of the various Total Abstinence Societies, who, I trust, by being members of societies which have produced order, peace, and tranquillity, are prepared to read the Holy Scriptures with 'due reverence and proper dispositions.'"

It will be remarked in this, that the condition is, 'with due reverence and proper dispositions,' and from a version authorized by the Catholic Church, and with the commentaries consonant to her belief and interpretation. If the Catholic objects to a copy of the Scriptures, or rather to its being forced upon him, it is not on the ground (far from it) of its being the Scriptures, but of its being a version which he does not consider authentic, and its being unaccompanied with, in his belief, accurate and faithful interpretation.

Viscount Bernard said, that it was notorious that the Roman Catholic clergy, in their chapels, denounced the reading of the Sacred Scriptures. Would any hon. Member deny that? Would the hon. Member for Kerry deny that in the western part of the county of Kerry, where a great number of converts had been made by the reading of the Scriptures, those converts could not publicly appear in those districts where they resided without meeting offence? It was useless to deny that the Roman Catholic clergy were opposed to the use of the Scriptures by those whom they guided.

Mr. Redington denied that the Roman clergy were opposed to the use of the Scriptures. With respect to the present clause, although it was not framed altogether in the way in which he wished, yet he would oppose the Amendment, and give his support to the clause.

Mr. Wyse must again assert that the Roman Catholic clergy took pains in circulating the Scriptures. In proof of this, he need only refer to the advertisement, which he had just read to the House, from R. Coyne, a Roman Catholic bookseller, advertising "the cheapest Bible ever published," the circulation of which was recommended by several Roman Catholic bishops.

Mr. Borthwick replied: He had endeavoured, on opening this subject, to confine himself as closely as possible to the subject of debate. He regretted to perceive that that House seemed unfitted to the discussion of a religious question—not that a religious question was unfitted for the House, but the House seemed unfitted to the discussion of a religious question. His single object was to substitute liturgical for didactical instruction. Now let them suppose the case of Bishop Daly, of Dr. Higgins, and Dr. Cooke, three clergymen of strong opinions, inculcating those opinions each upon the pupils of his own creed. He could conceive nothing more calculated to lead to religious dissension amongst the students at those Colleges. He regretted deeply that the right hon. Gentleman had determined to oppose his Amendment. However, as he saw no chance of carrying it, against the right hon. Gentleman's opposition, he considered it would be only a waste of time to put the Committee to the trouble of dividing. The hon. Gentleman stated that he withdrew his Amendment.

Amendment withdrawn.

Sir T. Acland moved after the words "or to hold office therein," the insertion of the words "except as hereinafter provided;" and he moved that addition for the purpose of introducing a clause to the following effect:—

"Provided always that any person appointed to be president, vice-president, or member of the governing body of each of such Colleges, shall, before he enter upon the duties of any of the said offices, make and subscribe the following declaration:—'I, A. B., do solemnly and sincerely declare that I acknowledge and receive the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testament as containing the revealed will of Almighty God.'"

He had paid the deepest attention to this Bill, and had given it throughout a zealous, but he must confess at first a reluctant support. He had followed his right hon. Friend in the difficulties which encompassed him on this subject. They all felt that Christianity should be the basis of any measure on the subject of education; but then came the question of sect and religious difference. He had at first hoped, that religious education might have been provided for each of the three great sects in Ireland; but every day since he had more and more felt the impossibility of doing this. He made these statements to show that he felt the difficulties of this subject, and had no unfriendly feeling towards the present Bill. He made these statements also, because they made out his case. He wished to procure such securities as might be provided for the proper performance of their duties on the part of those in whose hands they were about to leave the education of Irish youth. His right hon. Friend had said that any attempt on the part of a professor to sap the religion of any student would be succeeded by instant dismissal. But the Parliament should not leave such a matter in the hands of the Government. The Legislature, on the face of the Bill, should declare their object and intention. For this purpose he had determined to propose some test or declaration to be made by the professors and governing body of the College. If any better mode of meeting the difficulty could be suggested, he should be most happy to adopt it in the place of his own; but in the absence of any such suggestion, he begged to press his own proposal upon the attention of the House. His inclination would have been to have applied the test or declaration contained in his clause to all the professors of the Colleges, though doubtless it was more important with regard to some than others; but wishing to imitate the liberal and generous spirit which had been manifested towards the Government by the other side of the House, he was willing to leave that question to the decision of the governing body, placing confidence in them and the Government by whom they would be appointed. In preparing the declaration which he intended to propose, his object was to place a bar against infidelity; but at the same time not to introduce a word which could give the least pain to any class of persons believing in Divine Revelation. In support of the form of declaration which he proposed he might quote from the third volume of the Reminiscences of Dr. Arnold, a passage, in which Dr. Arnold, speaking of most different religious sects, said, "We all believe that the books of the Old and New Testament contain God's revealed will to man." He was willing to take his full share of the responsibility of this measure as it stood; but he felt that it wanted this conclusion, in order to secure it against abuse, and in order to render that homage to the religious feelings of both countries, of the value of which he was sure they were not insensible. The hon. Baronet concluded by moving, after the words "or to hold office therein," to add "except as hereinafter provided."

Sir J. Graham said, that he rose to address the House with great pain; but he could assure his hon. Friend that the Government were quite sensible that he was actuated by no unkindness to them; but that, on the contrary, they felt bound to acknowledge the support which he had given them on that Bill—a support which, for many reasons, it must have been painful for him to give. His affectionate regard for his hon. Friend personally, and his respect for his principles, rendered it painful to him to resist his proposition; and if he were not convinced that he could not, consistently with the principle of the Bill, assent to it, nothing would have induced him to offer the opposition which he was compelled to give to the Motion. No man more deeply regretted the discussion of such subjects in that House; but it had been his unfortunate lot, in proposing measures for the last few years, to have given more frequent rise to discussions of that nature than perhaps any other man. He was most anxious to treat the subject with the utmost reverence and respect. His own temper and feelings inclined him to do so. His hon. Friend had said that it was only in the absence of all general security for religious teaching that he had felt himself driven to propose the particular test contained in his clause; but he (Sir J. Graham) must say that he agreed with the hon. Member for Dundalk, that the safety of this measure rested on the weight of public opinion, and of responsibility brought to bear upon the present and all future Administrations; and he certainly could not have sanctioned the absence of all religious test as to the principals and professors of these Colleges, if the nomination of them and a power of removal also had not been vested in the Crown. He considered that security infinitely preferable to the one now proposed. He admitted the weight of Dr. Arnold's authority; but he was bound to point out to the Committee that the words of the proposed test would be no sufficient security against the evil which they were intended to provide against. The professor would at once, when required to make this declaration, put the question, "To what version of the Scriptures do you allude?" Were Protestants all agreed upon one version? Had not Unitarians an entirely different version from that of the Established Church? Would not the Unitarian take the test in a different sense from the members of the Established Church? And as to the books of the Old Testament, were there not very material differences between the Protestant and Roman Catholic versions? He was grieved to enter into such a discussion; but it was forced upon him. He could point out other reasons why the proposed test was insufficient for its object, but he abstained from pursuing a subject of that kind. He thought he had shown that the words—open on other grounds to great objections—would give no security for the promotion of sound religious instruction; whilst, on the other hand, the Bill provided ample security against any attempts to sap the religious principles of the students. So far from discouraging religious education, they had supplied every inducement to provide religious instruction out of the walls of the College, and within the walls they had afforded facilities for giving such instruction. It was not from any doubt in his mind, therefore, that religion was the basis of all human knowledge, that he opposed the Motion; he believed that religious knowledge was that which purified the leaven of secular knowledge, and if this Bill should discourage religious instruction, he should greatly regret it; but he did not believe that any such result would follow. He believed the Roman Catholics could, by private endowment, secure religious teaching; and that lectures would be delivered in the Colleges in conformity with the leading creeds of that country, the Roman Catholic, the Presbyterian, and the Established Church. No test was required; but the responsibility of the Government in the selection of the officers of these Colleges was, after all, the best security against any abuse; and, therefore, reluctantly, but decidedly, he must oppose the Motion.

Sir R. Inglis was surprised that, with the sentiments which had been so well expressed by the right hon. Baronet, he did not come to the same conclusion with his hon. Friend (Sir T. Acland). He was happy to find before the House a proposition which he could support, as he did that of his hon. Friend, involving at least some improvement in the present measure.

Mr. Cowper rejoiced in having an opportunity of supporting the Amendment of the hon. Baronet, as it comprehended a principle in which he thought that all who deserved the name of Christians might agree.

Lord J. Manners said, that the closing observations of the right hon. Baronet brought him to a different conclusion from that at which the right hon. Baronet had arrived. In referring to the responsibility of the Ministers of the Crown upon this subject, he must add, without wishing to say anything which might cast suspicion upon the present, or upon any Government, that he could not help reflecting upon what was taking place in France upon questions of this sort, where a system of education which was upheld by the whole weight of a Government, of which M. Guizot was a leading member, was stigmatized as an infidel system. From the best investigation which he had been able to give to this question, and the statements which had been made upon it, he must say, that when they were about to introduce a similar system in this country, it behoved them to weigh with the greatest care every proposition which was brought forward of so dangerous a tendency. With reference to the proposition of the hon. Baronet (Sir T. Acland), he was willing to accept it, though it might not go to the extent of doing more than partially mitigating the evils of this system. Having listened to the discussions which had taken place on other clauses of this Bill, too, he could not change the opinion he had hitherto entertained upon it, viz., that it was not a Bill which ought to meet with the support of that House. That opinion he entertained religiously; and, in repeating his objections to it for the last time, he must add, that he did not believe this Bill would produce any good effect; and his only hope was, that it would produce no effect whatever.

Sir R. Peel said, that the proposition of the hon. Baronet was simply a precaution against infidelity. But was infidelity an evil in Ireland, against which it was necessary for them to legislate? He did not believe there was a country in the world in which the charge of infidelity would expose a man to such reprobation as in Ireland. But take the case of England. Was infidelity an evil in England at the present day? He did not believe that in England, or in Ireland, infidelity was an evil against which it was necessary that Parliament should legislate. There could not be a doubt that the Crown would grossly neglect its duty in first appointing any person to an office in these Colleges against whom the charge of propagating infidel doctrines could be brought, or, if appointed, in continuing him in his office. It appeared to him, then, that the security it was proposed to give under this Amendment, was a perfectly delusive one, and that the state of religion in these kingdoms was such as to render it unnecessary to take such ground against this measure as that proposed.

Mr. Philip Howard opposed the Motion of the hon. Baronet (Sir T. Acland); as a Catholic, he feared, if adopted, it might lead to the inference, that tradition was not a necessary part of the groundwork of faith. It would also be better in a new measure not to revive the system of tests, where no imperative and cogent necessity required it. It would be well to reserve the power of naming a Jew to the chair of Hebrew, in the same manner as it would be natural to appoint a German, or a Frenchman, to the Professorships of their respective languages. If inclined to criticise the terms of the proposed test, he should say, it would be more correct to affirm the Scriptures to be the word than the "will of Almighty God;" as the will "could be only known by the interpretation given to Holy Writ." Upon the whole, he (Mr. Howard) deemed it unadvisable to insist on the adoption of this or any other test; for, with all respect to the motives of the Mover, and, above all, with all reverence to the written word of God, he did not think the cause of religion would be a gainer by its adoption.

Mr. Adderley said, that if the Colleges to be established were to be confined to the teaching of the natural sciences, the religious tests would be unnecessary; but as they would trench on this field of moral duty, the case became altered. He had voted for the Maynooth Bill because it recognised the duty of the State to provide for the religious instruction of the majority of the people; and he should vote for the Amendment, because the Government proposition was a retreat from that principle.

Lord C. Hamilton did not think there was any country in which there was so much religion and so little infidelity as in Ireland.

Mr. Gladstone said, that the high character of the hon. Baronet who had proposed this Amendment, and of those Gentlemen who supported it, was such as to render it incumbent upon those who entertained objections to his proposition, and who yet had a sincere regard for religion, to say something in support of their reasons for disagreeing with it. He must say, then, that he thought there was much force in the objections which had been advanced by the right hon. Baronet (Sir J. Graham) as to the ambiguity of this test. His hon. Friend must be aware that between Protestants of different sects, and certainly between the Church and the Unitarians, there were many differences with respect to the original version of many portions of the Holy Scriptures. Now, as to matters of general principle, he must say, that it was undesirable for parties engaged in the selection of a test to choose words which they not merely suspected, but which they knew must be used by different classes of persons in a different sense. It was difficult to secure perfect bona fides as to tests; such had been hitherto the case; and what hope was there of maintaining a defined and single interpretation of such tests in future times? He was not fond of adopting new theological propositions, and he could not consent to adopt a solemn proposition like this without seriously looking to the terms in which it was couched. The Motion of his hon. Friend called upon them to adopt a pre-enunciation of a positive theological principle, couched in language partly resting upon the authority of a Member of Parliament, and partly on that of Dr. Arnold. The proposition was a new proposition—it was not one adopted in turns by the Church of England; and he was afraid that if the House were to adopt it, his hon. Friend would find a difficulty in regard to it, on the part of the Roman Catholics of Ireland themselves. He considered that it was at once open to the charge of being too exclusive, and too lax. His right hon. Friend (Sir R. Peel) had adverted to the case of a large class of theologians in Germany connected with what was called the rationalizing school. He (Mr. Gladstone) did not think any member of that school would feel any greater objection to the terms of the hon. Baronet's (Sir T. D. Acland's) proposition than might be felt by some members of our own church. Indeed, he did not know whether even Dr. Strauss himself, who had acquired an unhappy notoriety in connexion with the school to which he referred, might not be prepared to subscribe the test proposed by his hon. Friend. He held that in certain cases the objections to such a test were entirely outweighed by the advantages which might attend it, and the necessity which rendered it advisable. But he did not entertain that opinion in the present case, for he did not think any advantage could accrue from the application of such a test; but that, on the contrary, great evil might result from holding out a delusive promise which could not be realized. He considered, therefore, that the Amendment of his hon. Friend, far from being an improvement on the Bill, would be entirely the reverse. Believing, then, that this was an ambiguous and equivocal proposition—that it could attain none of the purposes for which such a test ought to be employed, while it was open to strong objections, and that it was a positive evil to make a provision for attaining a religious character by means which they knew to be insufficient, he hoped the Committee would not adopt the Amendment.

Mr. Redington was satisfied the hon. Baronet, in bringing forward this Amendment, did not wish to throw any aspersion upon the religious creed of Catholics; but that he was merely introducing what he considered an essential safeguard in a measure of this nature. He must say, however, that if this Amendment went to a division, he would feel it his duty to vote against it; for the introduction of such a test as that proposed by the hon. Gentleman would excite great dissatisfaction among the Roman Catholics of Ireland.

The Committee divided on the Question that the words be inserted—Ayes 36; Noes 105: Majority 69.

On the Question that the clause stand part of the Bill,

Mr. Hindley contended it involved a violation of liberty of conscience, for it precluded students from resorting for instruction to tutors of their own religious creed, while it compelled them to receive the tuition of professors appointed by the Government. He had, therefore, to move that the clause be omitted.

Clause agreed to, as was Clause 15.

On Clause 16,

Mr. John S. Wortley moved the Amendment of which he had given notice, with a view to connect the Colleges with religious instruction as much as possible—

"To insert after the words, 'lodged and boarded therein,' the words, 'and also the provisions and regulations proposed to be made for securing to the said student the means of due attendance upon such religious instruction and divine worship as may be approved by his parents and guardians, and recognised by the governing body of the College.'"

Amendment agreed to.

Clause agreed to.

On the 19th Clause,

Mr. Spooner objected to the clause as giving an endowment to any teacher of whatever form of belief he might be. It was not even restricted to the endowment of Christian ministers. Such a conflict of religions would tend to infidelity among the pupils.

Mr. Philip Howard contended that no great evil could arise from the retention of the 14th Clause, which gave a power to the different religious communities, by private contribution, to endow chairs of theology. It was a well known truth that, in other affairs of life, opposition prevented imposition. In the case, then, before the House, the rivalry of different creeds would give an impulse to talent, and prove an incentive to exertion; the religious zeal of individuals should be allowed to supply what was unavoidably wanting in the Government measure. Should an appeal be made to the Catholics of England, he (Mr. Howard) doubted not that he would come forward in aid of his Irish co-religionists, and would strive to procure for the youth of Ireland the blessings of a religious education in the faith of their forefathers. Some years must necessarily elapse before the Colleges in question could be built and opened; ample time would, therefore, be given to organize a subscription in furtherance of the great object they had in view, so dear to that House and the country — namely, the combining religious tuition with literature and scientific attainments.

Mr. Hindley opposed the clause, as contrary to the spirit of the Mortmain Acts in this country.

Clause agreed to, as were the remaining clauses of the Bill.

House resumed. Report to be received.

EXCISE AND CUSTOMS.] House in Committee on the Excise and Customs Act.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, he wished to move certain Resolutions to be embodied in the Bill. The object of the first was to place grocers who were dealers in spirits in Ireland under the same supervision of the police authorities as other dealers were subject to. The other Resolution had reference to the importation of spirits from Guernsey and Jersey into this country. At the present time those islands enjoyed advantages which were not allowed to any other part of the United Kingdom. The introduction of compound spirits from Scotland and Ireland was prohibited, and that prohibition ought to be extended to Jersey and Guernsey. He, therefore, proposed, that a duty of 9*s.* a gallon should be put upon spirits imported into England from those islands, and a proportionate amount on spirits imported into Scotland and Ireland, with a prohibition altogether of compound spirits.

Resolutions agreed to. House resumed, and adjourned at a quarter before 2 o'clock.

PETITIONS PRESENTED. By Earl of Clancarty, from Guardians of Ballinasloe Union, for Inquiry into the Powers and Conduct of Poor Law Commissioners, and also for the Adoption of a Measure for the Better Relief of the Sick Poor (Ireland); and from Guardians of Balrothery Union, for Inquiry into the Operation of the Poor Law Act (Ireland).

THE ADVOCATE GENERAL OF BENGAL.] Lord Brougham wished to know whether the office of Advocate General of Bengal, an office which he held to be of the greatest possible importance amongst the Colonial appointments of this Empire, and second only to the office of the Governor General of India himself, had been yet filled up?

The Earl of Ripon could not say certainly whether it had been yet filled up, but he believed it had. There was no doubt of the high importance of the office alluded to, but it was not very easy to induce persons properly qualified for it to accept it.

Lord Brougham condemned the last appointment, which, he said, was clearly owing to the connexion between the party and the Board of Directors.

The Earl of Ellenborough said, the office was one of great importance, and the emoluments were very considerable. The salary attached to it was 5,000*l.*; and if the individual appointed to it was a competent person, and of experience in his profession, he might make, in addition to that salary, about 6,000*l.* a year more by private practice. With such prospects to hold out, he really thought, if due diligence and discretion were exercised in the selection of a person to fill the office, fit and competent persons might be found. He fully agreed with his noble and learned Friend opposite (Lord Brougham) as to the importance of the office of Advocate General of Bengal, as the Governor General of India had no other legal authority whatever to refer to for advice in matters relating to questions of international law, or the interpretation of Treaties. Interests of the greatest importance might depend upon the proper exercise of the office; and the efficient discharge of its functions, too, in courts of justice was most essential. As to the appointment to which allusion had been made, he agreed in the condemnation passed upon it. The juries at Calcutta were willing enough to find verdicts against the Government, and it required the best advocate to conduct a case before them. Not only was this gentleman not the best advocate, but he was perhaps the very worst in the court; and, for his own part, he (the Earl of Ellenborough) had never heard any reason alleged for his appointment, but that he was the son of the chairman of the Board of Directors. Now, he would ask, what would be the opinion of the people of this country, if a Prime Minister thought fit to appoint his son to be Attorney General, merely because he happened to be a lawyer, and was, from standing or practice, in no other way qualified for the office? Would not the Administration of such a Minister be put an end to within twenty-four hours, by the public scorn and indignation which such an appointment would excite? And yet it really was of less importance that the Attorney General should be chosen for his eligibility for his office, than that the Advocate General of India should be a person really and truly qualified for that most important office. He had, however, on the present occasion only to express a wish that on this matter in future all former precedents, but not the last one, would be followed, and persons so well qualified as Sir Laurence Peel and Mr. Serjeant Spankie selected for the office. In making the appointment, above all things, care should be taken to have the party selected in no manner whatsoever mixed up with local interests, otherwise the result must necessarily be that every advice which he gave the Governor General would be looked upon with mistrust and suspicion.

Lord Campbell knew of no office under the Crown which had been filled by persons of greater competence; whether there was an exception in the last case he did not know. He was astounded, however, to hear that the office was going begging in Westminster Hall; for he had always considered it a prize for a young lawyer of great eminence; and he had no doubt that men of the highest honour—the brightest ornaments, without local connexion, would accept it.

The Earl of Ripon begged to correct an error into which the noble Earl had fallen with respect to the salary attached to the office—it was only 3,500*l.* a year, though the emoluments from private practice might make it reach 10,000*l.* Certain it was that this office had, upon this occasion, been offered to eight or ten individuals of very distinguished talents, with respect to whose competency every means had been taken to ascertain the truth, and that it had been declined by them one after another, as not being consistent with their professional views.

Lord Brougham said, nothing was so easy as to make the offer to those by whom it was certain to be refused, that under the cover of these refusals an incompetent, though a worthy and well-meaning man, might be appointed.

Lord Denman said, the office had been very properly offered to many gentlemen of ability, whose situation at the Bar of this country could not make it a safe speculation that they would be sure to refuse this appointment; they were gentlemen of moderate business, though of high expectations, and of great talents and learning. With regard to the last person who had held the office, he had the slightest possible acquaintance with him, and had no evidence to bear of his position at the Bar; but many persons who well knew him had formed the highest opinion of his ability: they would hear with pain the observations now made, and their opinion was, that he was overcoming his difficulties, and was getting into a position in which, by his application and his industry, he would in time have removed the objections to him. He had heard this from several individuals for whose opinion he entertained a high respect.

The Earl of Ellenborough would very willingly do justice to the good intentions of that gentleman, but he did not enjoy the public confidence; and the strongest evidence was, that he had no private business whatever.

Subject dropped.

MEDICAL CHARITIES IN IRELAND.] The Earl of Clancarty said: My Lords, I beg to present to your Lordships, from the Board of Guardians of the Poor Law Union of Ballinasloe, a petition of which I lately gave notice, upon the subject of Medical Charities in Ireland. The petitioners pray for the speedy establishment of a sound system of relief for the sick poor of Ireland. The subject is one of great and urgent importance, and in reference to which it has been admitted by Parliament and by the Government that the laws require great alteration and amendment. If, my Lords, an improved and enlarged system of medical charities would involve (which I do not think it would, at least to any sensible extent) an increased taxation, it is those who now approach your Lordships as petitioners that will have to pay the tax; nor are they singular as poor law guardians in their desire to see the medical charities of the country placed upon a proper and efficient footing. I hold in my hand a copy of an address of the Ballina board of guardians, unanimously agreed to at a meeting with twenty-six guardians present, praying the attention of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland to that important subject. Those whose petition I have now the honour of presenting to your Lordships, did also address the Irish Government in the first instance: I regret to say, however, without any effect—that no prospect whatever was held out that Her Majesty's Government would take any steps whatever in the matter. It is, therefore, that they now approach your Lordships; and I cannot do better than read to your Lordships a portion of their petition, as placing the subject clearly and in a few words before you:—

"Petitioners represent that the present system of medical charities is most unsatisfactory, and inadequate to the wants of the country, and oppressive to a numerous portion of the ratepayers, who can derive no advantage whatever from the medical institutions for which they are taxed. That, under the existing law, a want of due economy prevails, and many and great abuses are practised, as must necessarily be the case in the absence of uniformity of system and of efficient inspection. That the present county infirmaries, though most useful in their several vicinities, are, from their inadequacy in point of number, necessarily too far apart to be of any benefit to the great majority of the population, who are equally taxed for their support. That the same objection applies to the fever hospitals. That the law only authorizing the establishment of dispensaries, where private subscriptions can be obtained, it follows that the poorer the district, and, consequently, the more needy the population, the more unattainable is medical aid, although such district is taxed in common with all others for the support of medical charities. That Her Majesty's Government, to whom, in the opinion of your petitioners, it properly belongs to bring subjects of this nature before Parliament, did, above two years ago, fully recognise the inadequacy of the existing law, by introducing into the House of Commons a Bill for putting the whole system of medical charities upon an entirely new footing; but, nevertheless, now refuses all assistance upon this very important matter, not because there is less necessity for it, but because a Committee of that hon. House did not then agree as to the details of the Bill before them. Your petitioners further submit, that the whole case loudly calls for immediate attention, and requires to be met by such a comprehensive measure as shall bring medical and surgical aid within a moderate distance of every poor man's dwelling, relieving distress the most revolting to humanity."

It is not, I think, necessary that I should add anything to what is here stated, to give the subject a stronger claim to your Lordships' attention. I only regret that, your Lordships and Her Majesty's Government being in general little acquainted with the circumstances of those on whose behalf this petition is presented, precedence should have been given to any other acts of legislation in reference to Ireland. You have lately evinced an anxious interest in the comforts of the inmates of Maynooth College, and in upholding the Roman Catholic religion in Ireland: I would pray your Lordships and the Government now to give some attention to the physical wants of the more humble professors of that faith. The long-neglected consideration of the interests of the sick poor ought to have had precedence of the endowment of Maynooth, that has occupied so much of your attention. In this observation I mean no direspect to the Roman Catholic priests, many of whom, I am sure, would agree with me in opinion upon this subject; for, as far as I have had opportunity of observing, I am happy to bear my testimony to the fact, that the Roman Catholic clergy, as well as the clergy of the Established Church, have been always forward as contributors, according to their means, to the medical relief of the poor. Before I put any question to Her Majesty's Government with reference to this subject, I will present to your Lordships another petition, of which I likewise gave notice, from the same board of guardians, on the subject of the Poor Law. The petitioners express great dissatisfaction at the powers conferred by the Act upon the Commissioners, and at the manner in which those powers have been exercised; and pray for an inquiry into the conduct of the Commissioners, and into the whole system and working of the Poor Law. At this late period of the Session, I, of course, could not support the prayer for a Committee; and I may observe, that I should feel at any time very reluctant to press upon Parliament to undertake the duty and responsibility that I think properly belongs to the Government —I mean, that of originating inquiry, now, certainly, become very necessary, for the purpose of amending and duly carrying out the principle and objects of the Poor Law. The Government, I think, is, and ought to be, held responsible not only for the proper administration of the law, but also for the duty of proposing to Parliament such amendments as may be necessary to promote its success. And whether such amendments result from the suggestions of evidence taken before a Parliamentary Committee, or before a Commission specially appointed for the purpose, or from the unaided judgment of the Members themselves of the Government, I trust that another Session will not be allowed to pass over without the Poor Law being amended, improved, and carried out to its legitimate extent. I the more anxiously press this upon Her Majesty's Government; as I think that much of the ill success that has hitherto attended the measure, has arisen from their refusal, in 1842, to comply with the general desire of the people of Ireland, of the gentry of all parties and denominations, for an inquiry into the working of the law—not proposed for the purpose of repealing the Act, but for the purpose of placing it upon a satisfactory and effective footing. Had that inquiry been granted, its present unpopularity would have been obviated. I also press the subject upon the attention of Government, because the dissatisfaction of the public has been of late much aggravated by the responsibility of the measure having been in a manner disowned by two of Her Majesty's Ministers, whose positions render their opinions upon the subject of the Irish Poor Law of the greatest weight. I allude to the speech of Sir Robert Peel in the debate on the state of Ireland last Session, when he is reported to have taunted Lord John Russell with having supported and perfected the Poor Law Act, which he described as having in its operation occasioned great dissatisfaction, and been among the causes of the Repeal agitation. I allude also to expressions of a like tendency that have more recently fallen from the Secretary for the Home Department. The Times newspaper of April 3, reports Sir James Graham to have said, in answer to Mr. French, that the Government, although they did not intend themselves to institute an inquiry into the Poor Law, would not oppose such a Motion if it had the general concurrence of the House; that "he must observe, however, that Her Majesty's present Government were not responsible for the application of the Poor Law to Ireland, and he had himself expressed great doubts when it was introduced, whether it would be found to answer." I do not suppose that those Ministers feel themselves, or intended to convey an opinion, that they really were exempt from a responsibility with which they are peculiarly invested by the offices they respectively have accepted; indeed, the fact that they have since their accession to office introduced an amendment of the Poor Law, shows that they do not; but unpopular as the Poor Law has been in Ireland from the very commencement, the poor rates requiring even now, notwithstanding the exemption of the poorer classes from payment of the tax, to be collected in many instances with the military aid—anything said by those in authority at all reflecting upon the soundness or good policy of the measure, is calculated to compromise its success by increasing and sanctioning its unpopularity. An experiment such as the Poor Law, involving of necessity a compulsory assessment, could not but be unpopular, unless compensated by some corresponding advantage to those upon whom the tax falls. These advantages were originally promised to the great body of the ratepayers, and great reliance was placed by the framers of the measure upon the benefit it would be to the shopkeepers and to the farmers, as well as to the peace of the country, and the general interests of society, by the relief of the country from mendicants and vagrants. This was put forward as one of the chief objects of the introduction of Poor Laws into Ireland. I will, with your Lordships' permission, read, in reference to this subject, an extract I have made from the speech of Lord John Russell, on proposing the law:—

"It appears, from the testimony both of theory and experience, that when a country is in such a state that it is overrun by numbers both of marauders and of mendicants, having no proper means of subsistence, a prey on the industry of the country, and relying on the indulgent charity of others, the introduction of Poor Laws serves several important objects. In the first place, a Poor Law acts as a measure of peace, enabling the country to prohibit vagrancy, and to prohibit those vagrant occupations which are so often connected with outrage. It is an injustice to the common sense of mankind, when a single person or family are unable to obtain the means of subsistence—when they are altogether without the means of livelihood from day to day—to say they shall not go about the country to endeavour to obtain, from the charity of those who are affluent, that which circumstances have denied to them. But when once you can say to such persons, here are the means of subsistence, as far as subsistence is concerned—that is offered to you—when you can say this on the one hand, you can say on the other hand, you are not entitled to demand charity—you shall no longer infest the country in a manner injurious to its peace, and which is favourable to imposition and outrage."

Lord John Russell then lays much stress upon the fact, that outrage and disturbance are the common results of able-bodied vagrants and mendicants being permitted to infest the country, and gives it as his opinion that these results have been exemplified; and, I think I may add, they are daily exemplified in Ireland; and then proceeds, with respect to the relief of the ratepayers, to observe—

"There is no doubt whatever of this, that a large portion of the people of Ireland, especially those not having land, do practise mendicancy for a great portion of the year. I have made inquiry with respect to the amount and extent of the relief afforded to that mendicancy; for it is to be remembered that a very considerable tax is now raised on the farmers of that country by mendicants, and which, I may say, is now raised as a compulsory rate. With this view, I asked of my noble Friend, the Secretary for Ireland, to obtain as accurate an account as possible of the amount paid in this way from two or three farmers, in ten or twelve districts, the amount that was paid for rent—the amount paid for tithes—the amount paid to the Roman Catholic priests, and the amount paid to mendicants. The result is, I should say, that in most cases a shilling an acre is paid in the course of a year by the farmers for the support of mendicants. In some cases it has been 6*d.* an acre, in others 9*d.*; but in one case, where a person had a farm, not very considerable in extent, it was more than 2*s.* an acre. That person paid 10*l.*, not in money, certainly, but in food. There was more than 2s. an acre paid for mendicity. Now, this in itself is a very heavy tax, and which cannot be assumed, upon the whole, to amount to less than between 700,000*l.* and 800,000*l.*, perhaps a million in the year; and, let it be observed, that this practice of mendicancy, which raises so vast a sum in the country, is not like a well-constituted Poor Law, which affords relief to the really indigent. It is the practice in Ireland for the farmer to give relief to the mendicant who asks for it: the potatoes are there ready for him; there is no inquiry into the circumstances of the mendicant—he begs at a distance from home, where he is not known."

Now, my Lords, what is the state of things after a lapse of seven years since this Poor Law, so pregnant, as it was supposed, with great benefits to the peace and welfare of the Irish people, has been enacted? The workhouses, good, substantial and salubrious buildings, have been erected at considerable expense, and prepared for the reception of three times the number that now occupy them, and the staffs requisite for their entire complement are paid for; but Ireland still presents the same disgraceful exhibition of vagrancy and beggary, with the superadded evil of general dissatisfaction with a law which was intended, but has hitherto failed, to remove it. The promise implied in Lord John Russell's speech to the middle and lower classes of occupiers not having been fulfilled, they feel that they have been deceived, and only recognise in the poor rates a new grievance—in the enactment of the Poor Law a new ground of objection to legislation by the Imperial Parliament—a new argument for the Repeal of the Union; and thus a law, conceived in a spirit of charity and benevolence, intended for the relief of the industrious poor, as well as to provide a refuge for the helpless and destitute, and calculated in its operation to cement the bonds of society, by uniting all classes in the interest and endeavour to promote the general improvement and development of the industrial resources of the country, has only added to the embarrassments of the country, and to the feelings of discontent that pervade it. It is often objected that a law of settlement would be necessary for a Vagrancy Act, and that this difficulty would be a bar against its enactment; I think this is a mistake in speaking of Ireland. There already exists a law partially of settlement; for which, I think, the country is much indebted to the noble Duke (Wellington)—I mean the clause in the Poor Law for charging to electoral divisions or parishes those paupers respectively belonging to them, and thereby creating a local interest in the diminution of pauperism. The effect of this clause, since more exactly defined by the Irish Poor Law Amendment Act of 1842, would probably be found quite a sufficient law of settlement for carrying out the principle of a good and effective Poor Law. If uniformity of poor law administration be duly maintained—and it should be one of the first duties of the Commissioners to preserve uniformity as far as practicable in every workhouse—if efficient workhouse inspection be provided for, the regulations for the government and discipline of every workhouse being the same, and the dietary in all upon the same scale of economy, a pauper would not find any temptation to resort to one workhouse more than to another. Except, however, in very peculiar cases it would be necessary that the application for relief should be taken as the test of destitution; and, from my experience, as a member for some years of a board of guardians, I do not think it would be often an untrue view to take of such applications. The existing workhouse accommodation, it might, in the absence of more exact information, be assumed, would be sufficient to do what it was originally designed to do; and I think there is the more probability of the original calculation being correct, from the fact that less than one-third, in some Unions less than a fourth, is the amount of accommodation actually in use. The present occupants are, certainly, the first objects of compassion, namely, the aged, the helpless, and the orphan; and, rather than that the law should be repealed, I would, upon the ground of humanity alone, continue it even in its present very imperfect state. It is no trifling consideration that those really destitute and helpless objects, who now alone seek admission, should feel that they are cared for by the State, which they formerly were not—that a refuge should be afforded to them where they can receive, with the necessaries of life, that medical aid and religious consolation which is scarcely enjoyed, and could certainly not be imparted, by those upon whose kind sympathies and charity they before for the most part relied for subsistence; and it is in the highest degree important to the interests of the community, that orphan and otherwise destitute children, in place of being, as formerly, brought up in ignorance, vice, and habitual vagrancy, and often prematurely cut off by want and disease, the consequence of neglect, should be trained to early habits of discipline and industry, and receive such an education as may fit them to become afterwards useful and good members of society. Such an education, I am happy to say, they now do receive in every well-regulated workhouse in Ireland. But, great as these advantages must be viewed by every friend to humanity, equal consideration is also due to the interests of the industrious poor —to those who seek not to be relieved in the workhouse, but who look to the Poor Law to relieve them from the sturdy beggar and the idle vagrant—but who are still compelled, although subject to a poor rate, to give them food and shelter in their own dwellings, and from their scanty earnings. The addition to the poor rate, by the enactment of a law against vagrancy, would be as nothing compared with the benefit to these ratepayers and to the community. It would, indeed, be a gratifying circumstance if the absence of the able-bodied, in general, from the workhouses, were owing to their earning their bread by honest industry; but this cannot be said to be the case where mendicancy prevails to so great an extent, and where outrages, for which non-employment and consequent destitution are pleaded as the excuse, are almost of daily occurrence, and systematically perpetrated. So generally have the able-bodied mendicant, unless in sickness, abstained from applying for workhouse relief, that in many establishments it is scarcely possible to have even the necessary work performed without hired assistance, in consequence of the present pauper inmates consisting almost entirely of the bedridden, the feeble, the crippled, the blind, the sick, and children of tender years. There would, therefore, be little difficulty in finding work as well as workhouse accommodation for such as are really destitute of any other resource, thus ridding the country of the continued exhibition of a state of destitution that cannot be said to be real, where such a provision has been made for it. It is very observable that there is a reluctance in some Unions to bring the Poor Law at all into operation. I would say, my Lords, that in such Unions as have not their union houses open for the reception of the destitute, the law against vagrancy should not be enforced; or rather it should be proclaimed and enforced only where the guardians perform the duty of carrying out the objects of the Poor Law. Such a measure, the details of which are perfectly practicable, but would of course require much attention, would, I am convinced, bring the Poor Law into speedy and beneficial operation all over the country; and for statistical purposes, and to arrive at an exact knowledge of the real surplus or unemployed population of Ireland, would be of the greatest importance, especially at the present time, when a disposition to review the laws relating to the occupation and management of land is manifested by the Legislature, and a desire for the improvement of the circumstances and prospects of the population has become so general. Some addition to the workhouse classification would, indeed, be rendered necessary, in order to let in persons of either sex of doubtful or blemished characters: this, however, would be easily provided for by some slight alterations in the idiot and lunatic wards, which, both on the male and female sides of the poor houses, are at present almost invariably vacant, and, I may add, an act suitable for their original purposes. It would not be fair by the destitute poor of unblemished character to be, upon their admission to the workhouse, necessarily associated with persons whose destitution may have resulted from their very habits of vice and profligacy; and, on the other hand, it is practically driving such persons to desperation and crime, and denying them a locus pœnitentiæ, if, while you afford them no out-door relief, you, at the same time, refuse them admission to the workhouses. Relief given in classes thus separate from the other inmates of the workhouses, there would be an incentive to good behaviour, as a new character might be earned by good conduct, and the paupers, from time to time, promoted to those classes in which they would have been at once placed had their characters before admission justified it. I have observed, in reference to the introduction of a Vagrancy Act, that an efficient system of workhouse inspection would be necessary to maintain that uniformity of discipline and general management which should place the workhouses all upon a footing of equality in respect to the comforts of the inmates. If your Lordships were to require returns of the inspections given to those institutions, either by the Commissioners or by the Poor Law Guardians, you might be surprised to find that in many houses weeks, and in others whole months, pass over without any inspection having taken place. I do not, in saying this, mean to cast any reflection either upon the Poor Law Commissioners or upon the guardians of the poor—the duties of both are sufficiently onerous. I cannot join with those who think the Poor Law Commissioners are sinecurists, although I have not been slow to find fault with acts of their administration: it would, however, be impossible to charge upon them the duty of regular workhouse inspection; and, as to the guardians, they are in general persons whose avocations leave them little time to give up more than the duty of ordinary attendance at the meetings of the board. It is, therefore, necessary to look elsewhere for the machinery of inspection. When my noble Friend (Lord St. Germans) was Secretary for Ireland, I took the liberty of urging upon the Government, through him, the propriety of imposing the same duties of inspection upon the workhouse chaplains as are performed by chaplains of gaols. In doing so, I was certainly animated by the desire of also having them placed, Protestant and Roman Catholic, upon the same footing of equality in respect of salary as under the Gaol Act, which had been so generally satisfactory; for I felt, and still feel, that it was a most impolitic act, as well as an injustice, and an uncalled for insult to the clergy of the Established Church, to place them upon a footing of inferiority, in any respect, to the ministers of any other denomination. I am sensible that in the present disposition of Her Majesty's Government, no alteration could be made in this respect; and I, therefore, do not press it, but simply suggest, that as the chaplains do visit, and certainly ought to visit the workhouses with regularity, whatever the amount of remuneration allowed to them, they should be required, Protestant and Roman Catholic, alternately to make reports of their observations upon the obedience given to the workhouse orders and discipline—upon the quality of the provisions, and of any complaint of any inmate of the House. This would involve little or no additional trouble, and need not be accompanied with any controlling power whatever, nor should it supersede the necessity of occasional inspection by visiting committees of the guardians. There are other improvements in the Poor Law much needed, and defects in it that call loudly for a remedy. I agree with the petitioners in thinking that the powers of the Commissioners ought to be reviewed, and that they ought not to have greater powers than are clearly necessary for carrying the Act into execution. It would relieve the ratepayers from the vexation of frequent and minute collections, to have but one rate imposed in the year; and I think that rate should be collected simultaneously, and by the same officers as the grand jury rate. The advantage to the ratepayers of having but one call upon them in the course of the year, is noticed in the Report of the Land Commission. From that Report, it also appears, that the injustice has sometimes been done to tenants at will of not allowing them the portion of the poor rate they were intended to stop from their landlords' rent. Such cases are, I trust, of rare occurrence; but where they do occur, they are most unjust and illegal, and must necessarily impede the success of the Poor Law, as does also the practice, which is very general, of making valuations too low, by which means it often happens that the whole burden is shifted from the tenant upon the landlord, in place of both having an equal interest in the economical management of the Poor Law. I have adverted to these points, and more particularly to the want of a Vagrancy Act, as they appear to me to require the prompt and serious consideration of the Government, and because Members of Parliament are sometimes reproached for finding fault with the measures of Government, without pointing out how they should be amended. I do not think that any more important subject with reference to Ireland could engage the attention of the Government than the Poor Law; and I am satisfied that if it be properly carried out, it would tend more than any other measure to improve the social condition of the country, and possibly to hasten the development of its agricultural resources. Having stated so much, it only remains for me to ask, on behalf of the many who are interested in the subject, whether—as no inquiry is to take place, or Bill to be brought forward in this Session, for the amendment either of the laws relating to medical charities, or of the Poor Law—it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to take the subject into their consideration during the recess, with a view to amending or altering those laws in the ensuing Session of Parliament?

Lord Stanley said, there was no doubt now of the maintenance of the Poor Law in Ireland; but if the noble Lord was of opinion that an inquiry should take place with reference to it at the commencement of the next Session of Parliament, he (Lord Stanley) was authorized to say that there would be no objection on the part of Her Majesty's Government to such an inquiry, and that the subject of the Irish Poor Law, involving the important question of medical relief, should be submitted to the consideration of a Committee in this or the other House of Parliament. The Government were not prepared to recommend the introduction of any Vagrant Act, considering the impossibility of putting down mendicancy in Ireland, and the expense of attempting to do so; nor, as at present advised, were they prepared to legislate on the question of medical relief. He did not deny that the present law might be, in some respects, deficient; but, till the fullest inquiry should be made into the working of the whole law next Session, they were not prepared to advise any further amendment of the existing law.

The Marquess of Londonderry said, he had opposed the introduction of a Poor Law into Ireland; but it having been introduced, he hoped their Lordships would give it a fair trial, and he was convinced it would prove in the end a beneficial law. If their Lordships would pass a Bill for leaving Ireland alone for three or five years, it would be one of the best measures ever introduced.

The Marquess of Clanricarde had had no reason to change the opinion he entertained from the first, that a Poor Law would be productive of no good for Ireland. He had petitions from all parts of Ireland—one from the extreme west, and another from the extreme east—all stating that mendicancy had increased since its introduction, and he had himself been a witness to the increase of mendicancy in the streets. The Poor Law had failed in every respect, and disappointed those who had brought it in.

Petitions read, and ordered to lie on the Table.

House adjourned.

COMMONS' ENCLOSURE BILL.] The House met this day at twelve o'clock, and devoted the morning to consider the Commons' Enclosure Bill in Committee; which, with some conversational discussion on the separate clauses, was carried through as far as the 70th Clause, when it being four o'clock, the House resumed, and the Committee was ordered to sit again.

The House adjourned till five o'clock, and then met again.

SOUTH WALES RAILWAY.] Mr. E. Buller brought up the Report on the South Wales Railway, and the Monmouth and Hereford Railway Bills.

Mr. J. H. Vivian moved that the Report be considered on Friday next.

Captain Berkeley thought that they should not depart from the usual course of proceeding, namely, of taking the Reports on Railway Bills into consideration on Tuesdays.

Mr. Greene said, it was most necessary that the rules of the House should be observed, because if they were departed from in one instance, they would be interfered with in others.

Lord Granville Somerset said, any delay in Railway Bills was most material at this advanced period of the Session; and in the present instance if the Motion of the hon. Member were not acceded to, the effect would be that a most important railway would be delayed for another Session.

Mr. Labouchere said, he had only a general knowledge on the subject of the Railway Bill under consideration, and he did not wish to do anything which would have the effect of preventing the Bill from passing this Session. It was, however, very well known that the project for the South Wales Railway was supported by powerful interests having much influence in that House; and he would ask, were they, under such circumstances, to depart from the Standing Orders in favour of a Bill so supported, while they declined doing so in other cases.

Mr. Vivian said, his Motion went no further than that the Report should be taken into consideration on Friday instead of on Tuesday; and he did not think, therefore, that it could be seriously objected to at the present advanced period of the Session.

Mr. Sheil said, he had no personal connexion with the measure, but as an Irish Member connected more particularly with the south of Ireland, he felt a very great interest in the advancement of his country generally, and more especially with that portion of it to which he more immediately belonged. He believed the interests of Ireland would be materially promoted by the proposed railway; and he could assure the House that this was the opinion of the Representatives of the south of Ireland generally; and he should, therefore, give his support to the Motion of his hon. Friend. He believed, from the position of the districts through which the proposed railway would pass, and the south of Ireland, that they would be reciprocally benefited by it—that what was for the benefit of South Wales was for the benefit also of Ireland; and, on the other hand, that whatever would benefit Ireland, would, at the same time, benefit South Wales. He would beg to remind Members of Her Majesty's Government that the First Minister of the Crown had stated with reference to an Irish railway, that he would not consent to allow small obstructions to lie in the way of it; and that the interests of Ireland were so deeply involved in the passing of the measure that the Government should exert itself to promote it. He did not mean to say that the Bill now under the consideration of the House was of equal importance with the Irish Bill to which he had alluded; but still he thought it belonged to the same class, and he should, therefore, give it his support.

Viscount Howick said, he was exceedingly averse to applying favours to one Railway Bill which were not extended to others; but though he knew nothing of the particular merits of the South Wales line, he would say generally, that he thought railways ought to get particular indulgence this Session. The House required the promoters of all lines to lay their plans in the first instance before the Railway Department of the Board of Trade, and suspended all proceedings upon the Bills until the Reports of the Board were made. They thus threw back all the railway schemes for a full month of the Session later than they might otherwise have been brought forward, and he thought that circumstance ought to induce them now to show some indulgence to the promoters of these schemes in enabling them to have their Bills passed. He did not think that any substantial injury or injustice would be done by acceding to the Motion before the House, and he was, therefore, disposed to vote in favour of it. He should, however do so only on the understanding that a similar indulgence would be extended to other Railway Bills.

Motion agreed to.

PETITION OF CAPTAIN BERKELEY.] Mr. Warburton moved that the Order of the Day be read for the consideration of the petition of Captain Craven Berkeley relative to the East India Steam Ship Company Bill, and the action brought against him by Mr. Scott. The hon. Member presented the petition from the gallant Captain, praying that the House would allow its officers to attend a trial, in which he was defendant, in the Court of Common Pleas, and moved that the prayer of the petition be complied with.

Mr. Baine was understood to say that he had been requested by Messrs. Scott, the plaintiffs in the action to which the petition referred, to state to the House the facts of this case. In 1840 Messrs. Scott had entered into a contract with the company in question to furnish them with a ship for India, at an expense of 35,000*l*. The manner in which the ship was built increased the expense to 40,000*l*. Messrs. Scott, in entering upon this contract, had had before them the prospectus of this company, containing the name of the hon. Member for Cheltenham. That prospectus had been extensively circulated, with the name of the hon. Member in it. In addition to this they had had before them an Act of Parliament authorizing the formation of the company, and also including amongst its original subscribers the name of the hon. and gallant Member. They had all along, therefore, thought that they might come upon him as a partner in the contract, if the other contractors failed to perform their part of their contract. The contract had not been fulfilled, and the Messrs. Scott had lost 50,000*l.* by it. Under these circumstances they had brought an action against the Secretary of the Company, and had got judgment against him. They had since brought an action against the hon. and gallant Member for Cheltenham, as the only director within their reach. On the former trial, the evidence of the officers of the House had been requested, but the House had thought fit to refuse it. The defendant now, however, said, that their absence would be prejudicial to his cause. He did not know how this might be; but whether so or not, Messrs. Scott had no desire that the evidence of the officers should be withheld.

Lord G. Somerset said, when the petition was presented the other night, he was opposed to it, only because he thought that what was sought to be proved could be proved by other means than the attendance of the officers of the House. As the hon. Member for Cheltenham, however, feared that the withholding these witnesses might prejudice his case, he saw no reason why the House should not alter its decision.

Mr. C. Berkeley said, he was now, as he had been when the petition of the plaintiffs was presented, only anxious for the fullest inquiry. He desired the attendance of the parties in question, only because he thought that the plaintiffs' counsel would be able to prejudice the case in the eyes of the jury, if the powerful shield of that House appeared to be thrown over one of its Members. With regard to the case itself, he could assure the House that he was no more conscious of his name having been inserted in the Act of Parliament as a director of the company, than any other hon. Member of that House. As the question was now a judicial one, he would, however, add no more upon it.

Sir R. Inglis took the opportunity of suggesting that it would be desirable to make an addition to the Standing Orders, that no Company proposing to include, in the act of its incorporation, a list of the directors, should be permitted to do so, till the Standing Orders' Committee should have received a list of such directors. And no Company should be permitted to use the name of any director, unless such director should have given his written consent, which should be registered in a book accessible to all the world. This was an act of a public nature, that was to say, it might be pleaded as a public act; and if all men were bound to know the laws, more especially were they bound to know the laws who had a voice in passing them; therefore they ought to know what names were inserted in every Bill.

Motion agreed to.

RIGHT OF SEARCHING AMERICAN VESSELS.] Mr. Sheil inquired of the right hon. Baronet at the head of the Government what was the number of American vessels over which we had exercised the right of visiting since the Treaty of Washington was signed?

Sir R. Peel said, that the number of vessels visited had been very considerable. He trusted, however, that the right hon. Gentleman would not require a specification of the exact number, when he informed him that the right of visiting had been exercised in every case where a vessel had excited a reasonable suspicion. He was happy to be able to add, that the exercise of that right had hitherto not led to any injurious consequences, nor had it provoked any ill-feeling on the part of any portion of the American squadron which had acted in co-operation with us. Perhaps the House would allow him to read the two latest communications received by the Government from the coast of Africa; one as to a case where the Right of Search was exercised by a British cruiser alone, after the signing of the Treaty of Washington, and the other where there was a co-operation between the combined English and American squadrons. The first letter was as follows:—

"ENCLOSURE OF A LETTER TO THE SECRETARY OF THE ADMIRALTY, OF THE 20TH OF MAY, 1845.

"Her Majesty's Brig Heroine, at sea, April 22. 1845.

"Sir—In obedience to the orders contained in the general instructions for commanders of Her Majesty's vessels employed in the suppression of the Slave Trade, I beg leave to inform you that on the 22nd ultimo, I visited in Mayamba Bay an American schooner, the Henry, and on the 21st of February the American brig Starling, of Beverley, in order to ascertain their nationality, and, no objections having been made to the visit, I found them to be bonâ fide Americans, and left them as soon as possible.—I have the honour to be, Sir, your most obedient humble servant,

"HENRY R. FOOTE,
Lieutenant and Commander, commanding on the West Coast of Africa."

The next was where there was a conjoint operation. It ran as follows:—

"Her Majesty's Ship Penelope, Ascension, May 6.

"Sir—I have the honour to enclose a Report from Commander Russell, of the Ardent, reporting operations in the Rio Pongas, in which he was cordially assisted by Commander Bruce, of the United States sloop, the Truxton. The result was successful, and highly satisfactory in all respects, two slavers having been surprised, and taken in one of their inner haunts; one vessel under Spanish colours was seized by the Ardent's boats, while at the same moment the officers of the Truxton took possession of another schooner, under American colours. The latter vessel has since been sent to Boston for adjudication. This incident, and other indications of sincerity on the part of the American officers now serving on this station, lead me to hope for a degree of future co-operation which cannot but have desirable effects.—I have the honour to be, &c.

"W. JONES,
Commodore and Senior Officer commanding.
"The Right Hon. H. T. L. Corry, &c., Admiralty."

Commander Russell writes—

"Lieutenant Johnson mentions the cordial good feeling that existed between the officers and men of the two nations, in the highest terms; and the zeal, energy, and activity that prevailed among them, which is gratifying for me to record."

He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would rest satisfied that the right of visiting had been exercised in every case where it was desirable, and that it had, as far as he was aware, been exercised with forbearance and caution, and without any interruption of the good understanding between the two squadrons.

Sir C. Napier would be glad to know whether any British vessels had been searched by the Americans?

Sir R. Peel was not aware of any instance in which that had occurred; no doubt if suspicious circumstances arose, the Right of Search would be exercised.

THE SLAVE TRADE.] Viscount Palmerston then rose to move—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, that She will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this House a Return of the Names and Description of the Witnesses examined before the Mixed British and French Commission, appointed to inquire into the best means for suppressing the Slave Trade; and Extracts of such parts of their Evidence as relate to the value of a mutual Right of Search as a means for the Suppression of the Slave Trade."

The noble Lord said: Sir, in rising to make the Motion of which I have given notice, and to call the attention of the House for a short time to the subject of the Slave Trade, I feel that the House will not require from me any apology for such an encroachment upon their time. The subject is one which has, for many years past, excited the deepest interest both in Parliament and the country. It relates to one of the greatest and most flagitious, the most atrocious, and the most widely-extended crimes which have ever yet afflicted mankind. It relates to a crime which barbarizes and desolates Africa—which degrades and demoralizes the nations of America—I may say, from north to south;—which debases and brutalizes Asia—and which, I regret to say, still stains some of the nations of Europe with what I must hold to be unpardonable guilt. Sir, the frightful number of the victims of this crime cannot with any precision be ascertained. My hon. Friend the Member for Gateshead (Mr. Hutt) the other night told us, that the number of human beings carried off annually from Africa to America, including those who were landed and those who died in consequence of the passage, amounted, according to his calculation, to no less than 200,000. You will remember, too, that whatever the number may be, an equal number must be reckoned as having been the previous victims of the violence used in their capture, and of the sufferings endured on the march; and whether the number be, as the right hon. Baronet (Sir R. Peel) has supposed, greatly exaggerated, or whether it be near the truth, at any rate the Christian share in the Slave Trade, is, in its extent, most appalling. Now, Sir, every man, be his country what it may, whose mind has not been contaminated by participation in this atrocity, must feel the most ardent desire that this great offence should cease; and I am sure there cannot be an Englishman who would not glory in the idea that his country had had the honour of taking a leading part in the accomplishment of so great a purpose. But we are told, and in some degree I think truly, that of late a change has taken place in the opinion of many men in this country who feel the deepest interest in this important matter; not a change indicating the slightest abatement in the horror and detestation which they feel for this practice—not a change consisting in the slightest diminution of their ardent desire to employ every practicable means of putting an end to it—but the change to which I allude consists in this, that many men whose good intentions I respect, and whose judgment in general is entitled to great weight, but who, I think, have looked only superficially at this matter, seeing on the one hand that the efforts which we have made since the year 1814 to put an end to the practice have not entirely effected the object—seeing that the Slave Trade still continues, have begun to despair of obtaining their object by the suppression of the Slave Trade, have adopted the opinion that our efforts are fruitless, have directed their efforts to another object; and thinking that they could best succeed by labouring for the abolition of slavery, have slackened in some degree in their efforts for the suppression of the Slave Trade itself. Now, with all respect for those persons, I differ entirely from the opinions which they entertain. I regard their despair of suppressing the Slave Trade as without reason, and I think the conclusion to which they have come quite erroneous. It is undoubtedly and obviously true that slavery is the cause, and object, and purpose, of the Slave Trade; and that if we could, by possibility, abolish all over the world the condition of slavery, the Slave Trade would, of itself, necessarily cease. But it is also equally true, that the Slave Trade is the root which gives life, and spirit, and stability to the condition of slavery. Seek to upheave a vast living tree, whose mighty roots are strongly, vigorously, and deeply imbedded in the soil, it will baffle the utmost exertions of your strength; but lay your axe to the root, cut off the supply of nourishment, and the tree will sicken and decay, and you will no longer find any difficulty in bringing it to the ground. It is on this principle I hold that, looking at the matter in a practical point of view, we ought to apply our great efforts to the suppression of the Slave Trade: cut off the supply of slaves, and I apprehend you will have achieved the best and shortest mode of destroying slavery. When you ask people to put an end to slavery, to emancipate their slaves, you ask them, almost in so many words, to give up their property—to give up that on which, perhaps, their existence depends; and you can, therefore, hardly expect them to assent to your proposal. But when you ask them to concur with you in the abolition of the Slave Trade, all you require of them is, that they should combine with you to prevent other persons from committing the crime; and you are much more likely to succeed in this object with them: the same motives which operate with them against your proposition in the one case, influences them in your favour in the other; for you would very frequently find the same owners who would struggle against you to the last for the preservation to them of the means by which they cultivate their slave-worked lands, eager to aid you in preventing the introduction, on the part of others, of fresh negroes, the employment of whom would be bringing into cultivation fresh tracts of land, whose produce would enter into injurious competition with that of their own existing estates. Do not, then, be persuaded to turn your attention from the Slave Trade to the condition of slavery. But it is urged that our efforts for the suppression of the trade have been fruitless. Now, I take upon myself to deny that proposition. It is said that we have not diminished the Slave Trade; that we have not reduced, by all our exertions for the last thirty years, the number of slaves transported from Africa; and that we have not succeeded in mitigating in any degree, but have, on the contrary, aggravated the sufferings of the negroes on the passage. I will take the last point first; I admit that we have not succeeded in mitigating those sufferings; but I altogether dispute the assertion that the means we have taken to prevent, have aggravated them. Any man who will dispassionately review the evidence given at various times during the last half century, before Committees of the House, and otherwise, must see that it would be absolutely impossible for the evils of the passage to the wretched captives to be aggravated beyond what they have been.

The miseries endured by the negroes on their voyage across the Atlantic, all past evidence proves to have been greater almost than human imagination could conceive, and, in practice, impossible to be increased; and, in point of fact, all we learn of the state of things on the passage now, shows us, that while, most unhappily, the evils are not lessened, at all events, they are not aggravated. Again, when it is said that our efforts have not diminished the number of Africans who are annually the victims of this traffic, I cannot assent to that statement. If the Government had given me that Return which I moved for about this time last year, I should have been in a condition to have brought forward this matter on more detailed and correct data. A Return, no doubt, was given; but prepared in so careless—in, I must say, so slovenly a manner, as to be really good for nothing; and I accordingly returned it, privately, to the right hon. Baronet, with an observation to that effect. However, this clearly appeared, that in the years 1840, 1841, 1842, the number of Africans who were victims to the Slave Trade was greatly less than on the average of the preceding forty years; so that, at all events, it cannot be said that our efforts have been wholly unsuccessful in diminishing the number of victims to that traffic. In looking at this question, and narrowly, we are not to measure the value of the methods employed for the suppression of the Slave Trade, by the mere test of whether the number of negroes actually transported had, within recent years, not actually diminished; because, if it can be shown that the measures which we took have had the effect of preventing an increase, as compared with what might otherwise have taken place; then, it is evident that a great and important good has been effected. In the first place, what is the presumptive proof of this good having been effected? Among the Papers laid on the Table of the House in this year, and in former years, is a statement of the number of vessels which had returned from the coast of Africa to Cuba, or Brazil, empty, in consequence of having been prevented by your cruisers from getting cargoes; and that number was considerable. It frequently appears that, in consequence of the blockade of rivers and bays, vessels were prevented from executing their orders, and obliged to return home empty, not being able to procure negroes. Further, in the Returns moved for by my hon. and gallant Friend (Captain Pechell) behind me, it appears that since 1819, no less than 158 vessels were taken and condemned as slavers by the Mixed Commission Court of Sierra Leone, before they had received any negroes on board. Now each of those vessels would not have returned with less than 300 negroes on board, which would make an aggregate amount of no less than 50,000 or 60,000 negroes, all of which had been saved from the sufferings of the passage, and from slavery, by the exertions which were adopted to prevent these vessels from taking cargoes on board according to their orders. Then there were upwards of 60,000 negroes emancipated at Sierra Leone, and many others nominally, and only nominally, emancipated elsewhere. But if more positive proofs are required of the effects which have followed the methods which have been adopted to put an end to the Slave Trade, we have only to look to the vast extent of uncultivated land in Cuba and Brazil, and to recollect the increasing demand in Europe for the productions of slave labour of tropical climates; from both of which circumstances it may be fairly concluded that if the traffic in negroes were not restricted by the measures which were adopted, there would have been an immense increase in the number of negroes exported from the coast of Africa. It is stated in a Paper which was laid on the Table of the House, with respect to slave dealing in Brazil and Cuba, that a slavedealer would consider himself very well off if one vessel out of every six returned from Africa with a cargo of negroes; and that in consequence of the difficulty of procuring slaves the price of negroes had greatly risen, as the supply was infinitely short of the real demand for slaves. I am, therefore, looking at these things, entitled to affirm that the efforts which have been made, though not successful in putting an end altogether to the Slave Trade, have not been altogether fruitless; and that the evil has been very much restrained in its extent, though it has not been removed. But let me ask, what efforts have been really made to put an end to the Slave Trade? What has been the system which, it has been maintained, has been tried, since 1814, to this period, to accomplish this object? Why,

Sir, I am enabled, I think, to show that so far from its having been tried, and having failed, it has, on the contrary, never yet been fully tried up to the present time; that since 1814 it never yet has been brought into full operation, according to the principles on which it was founded. In the first place, this country contracted various Treaties with other Powers, the subjects of which were in the habit of carrying on the Slave Trade; by which Treaties, those Powers were bound to pass laws to prevent their subjects from carrying on the Slave Trade, either directly or indirectly, and to undertake to prevent their subjects from committing any infraction of those laws. The countries with which this country formed such Treaties are Denmark, Sweden, Holland, Spain, Portugal, and Brazil; and if those Treaties were faithfully and honourably executed, if the Powers which entered into them promulgated the laws enacted in accordance with them, as they bound themselves to promulgate them, and if they put those laws in force as they had bound themselves, there would, in my opinion, have been an end of the Slave Trade before this time. I know, that it may be said in answer to this statement, that the laws promulgated by those countries to prevent slave trading might be evaded by their subjects in the same manner as the laws to prevent smuggling are evaded. I hold, however, that such an offence as smuggling a cargo of human beings is easily prevented; for you cannot take negroes as smugglers take kegs of brandy, and sink them a mile from the shore, with buoys to mark the place where they have been sunk, in order that they may return and carry them away at the next tide, and bring them ashore. Nor can you hide a cargo of human beings, as smugglers hide bales of tobacco, or silks in a cavern in a gentleman's lawn, and carry them away one by one to different parts of the country to sell them. Even on a smaller scale, there is no difficulty so great as that which the murderer has in getting rid of the body of his victim in such a manner as to prevent it from turning up in some way or another to become evidence of his crime. I hold it, therefore, to be utterly impossible that a large number of men, women, and children could be landed on the coast of a civilized and well-organized country, and then sold and distributed to the estates of the owners, if the Government of that country chose to enforce laws which had been framed to suppress the practice. Sweden, Denmark, and Holland have fulfilled their engagements; and there is no reproach to them for neglecting to observe them. France can of her own accord, and without the Treaty of 1831, abolish the Slave Trade; and, generally speaking, the Slave Trade, so far as France is concerned, is at an end. I am afraid, I cannot say universally, because not only is it reported that a large number of slaves are brought annually from Madagascar and the East Coast of Africa to the Isle of Bourbon, but there is in these Papers an account of a Treaty recently concluded between the French Government and the Imaum of Muscat, which, under the pretence of being a Treaty to enable the French to have free negroes for the cultivation of the Isle of Bourbon, is, in fact, a Treaty for the legalization of the Slave Trade. With regard to Sweden, Denmark, and Holland, the engagements entered into with them, with a view of putting an end to the Slave Trade, have been honourably fulfilled. With respect to Spain, Portugal, and Brazil, I must say that the engagements entered into by those Powers have been perseveringly, systematically, scandalously, and dishonourably violated. We are told that the conduct of the Government of Portugal has of late undergone alteration. What I said with regard to Portugal applies to its conduct up to 1839 or 1840. The Government tells us that Portugal has of late begun to be awake to a sense of their obligations to act according to the Treaty. Sir, I am glad to hear this statement on the part of the Government. I regret to say that the Papers and Correspondence of the year 1844, do not bear out so fully as I could wish the entire absolution of the Portuguese Government. At the same time, the exceptions to which I allude, appear to have been exceptions consisting of the misconduct of Colonial authorities, who, I believe, have since been removed by the Portuguese Government; and I have no doubt that at the time at which I am speaking, Portugal is fairly, and honourably, and, if so, I am sure she is advantageously to herself, fulfilling the obligations which she has contracted. But, Sir, if Portugal has so altered her conduct, what is the occasion of that change? Has it been any spontaneous sense of duty which suddenly came upon the Portuguese Government as the result of their own reflection? Not in the least. If the Government of Portugal are now fulfilling the obligations under which they have, for seven-and-twenty years at least, been lying in relation to this country, it is not owing to any honourable feeling on the part of that Government; it is solely owing to the measure of coercion which we proposed to Parliament in the year 1839, and which Parliament, most honourably, I may say, to parties in both Houses, agreed to adopt; those who were then the opposers of Government most magnanimously forgetting any advantage which, in a party point of view, they might for the moment have reaped from embarrassing our measure, in order to secure to the measure that character which rightly belonged to it—the character of a general determination of Parliament to assert the rights of the country established by Treaty, and put an end to the atrocious Slave Trade. Sir, I say it was that which brought Portugal to her senses; it was that which brought her to a sense, not of the duty which she owed us—of that she was aware before—but to a sense of her inability to resist us when she was in the wrong. She appealed in vain to the Powers of Europe. She had trifled with us for a long course of years, and when she found that we were no longer to be trifled with — when she thought it would not be prudent to brave us any longer, she submitted. She signed the Treaty in 1842, after the present Government had assumed office, and we admit that she is now honourably fulfilling the obligations which she had incurred. That is the ground of the alteration which has taken place in the policy of Portugal —it affords a good example of the effect which may be produced by such a course of conduct as that which we adopted towards her, and which, I rejoice to find, is to be followed up in analogous measures with other Powers. I say this the more assuredly, because, the advantages of this alteration in her conduct have not been confined to Portugal, or to the seizure of a large number of vessels carrying the Portuguese flag, which were engaged in the Slave Trade; for it is a remarkable coincidence that Brazil and Spain, the Governments of Rio de Janeiro and Cuba, which had trifled with England, and had met her remonstrances with false assertions, or vexatious and frivolous excuses, showed also that they were ready to fulfil their Treaties when England showed she was in earnest, as she did by the measure of 1839. It is a remarkable coincidence, but a very happy and agreeable one, that the veil appeared at once to have dropped from the eyes of the Government of Brazil, who became, accordingly, very earnest in the execution of their own laws, and in fulfilling our Treaties. By another most fortunate coincidence, that immediately after that measure had been determined on, and announced by us, there came to Cuba, as had been noticed by the right hon. Baronet, on a former occasion, for the first time, a Governor who repudiated the practices of his predecessors, and refused to accept of those fees on the importation of negroes which had been received by former Governors, and who set himself fairly and honourably to the work of carrying out the spirit of the Treaty. In consequence of this there occurred in 1840, 1841, and 1842, a singular and sudden diminution in the number of slaves introduced into Cuba; and that, as we have ascertained from the right hon. Baronet, Brazil and Cuba, for the first time, showed a disposition to act in accordance with the Treaties into which they had entered. It will thus be seen that the vigorous measures which we rightfully took with regard to Portugal, were not only followed by successful results in Portugal, but were accompanied (I will say no more than accompanied) by a most beneficial change in the conduct of Brazil and Spain. Sir, I repeat, that the true way of putting an end to slavery is by putting an end to the Slave Trade; there can be no doubt, that to abolish that trade, will put an end to much of the suffering now endured by slaves. It is manifest that this must be the case. In the first place, when the slave owner feels that he can work out his slaves as he pleases, and make them go through the greatest amount of labour with the smallest supply of food, and by such means, and by saving all care and expense about them during sickness, and buying fresh negroes when these are expended, can work his estate more beneficially and cheaply, the consequence is, that the demand for slaves in the market is extended, and the facilities and rewards for importation are higher. But, when the Slave Trade is prevented—when the supply of slaves is cut off, and the owner knows if one of his slaves dies, he cannot buy another in the market, the view of the slave owner becomes immediately altered, and he sees the expediency of treating his slaves in the same way in which a sensible man would treat his horses or his oxen, or any other animals that were useful to him. He gives the slave good food, the better to enable him to labour for his master; he takes care of him in sickness, that he may prolong his life, which is profitable; he spares the female slave while she is breeding, in order that she may bring forth her offspring alive, as he wishes the offspring to be born for his future use; and, in fine, his whole conduct as regards his slaves is altered. It is quite clear, therefore, that by accomplishing, if we could, the termination of the Slave Trade, we should at once divest slavery of a great number of its horrors; for the master would have a stronger interest in preserving the health and the life of his slave, than if an unrestricted traffic were permitted. I do not mean to say that a feeling of mutual interest would be so strong as to extinguish the bad passions of human nature altogether—those passions which are more violent in the heart of the slave owner than of others, as the system of slavery has the effect of demoralizing not only the slave, but the master—yet the interest of the owner would induce him to improve the treatment of his slaves if he could obtain no other supply in the market. If that good effect would arise, as it undoubtedly would, from the abolition of the Slave Trade, its effect on the condition of another class—of the native Indians of Brazil—would not be less important. It is stated in the Papers which have been laid on the Table of the House, that when the supply of negroes had been for a time cut off, the effect was very soon perceptible in the treatment of the Indians of the northern provinces of Brazil, as the Brazilian proprietors altered their treatment of the native Indians, in order to induce them to labour and settle in the neighbourhood of their establishments; and those efforts were made to bring a wild and savage population into closer connexion with civilization, and an initiation into its usages. The course which we took with regard to Portugal had, as I have shown, a very good effect with regard to Cuba and Brazil; and if the means were applied which we possess to compel Spain and Brazil to conform to and fulfil the obligations which they have contracted with us, the Slave Trade would oon almost cease to exist. That would be, in my opinion, the effect of those States fulfilling the conditions of their Treaties with us; and I, therefore, say, that under these circumstances, it is not fair to tell us that our method has failed; for, in that particular regard, namely, binding other countries to fulfil their obligations, our system has never been brought fully into operation. I know that Spain and Brazil still violate their duties, and Portugal has only recently commenced fulfilling her obligations sincerely and earnestly. Our method of dealing with this trade hitherto has been threefold: the first part of it was to make Treaties compelling Foreign Powers to put a stop to the trade with the markets in their dominions; the second was to intercept the trade in the passage to those markets; and for this purpose we have established a naval police. But it is evident that the establishment of a naval police, consisting of cruisers off the coast of Africa, could have no effect unless our cruisers were armed with the power to search vessels that they might have reason to consider were engaged in the Slave Trade; but it is manifest that this could only be done by consent of the nations with which we had Treaties. We have obtained an agreement to a mutual Right of Search. But how long is it since we obtained that? Had we that Right of Search agreed to ever since 1814? Has it been established during those thirty years during which it has been said that our system was tried? It was hardly tried at all during a great portion of that time, and until the Treaties of 1817—the Treaties with Spain and Portugal—it was not effectual as regarded vessels south of the line, or vessels which had no slaves on board; and it was not until the Treaty of 1831 that we obtained that power over vessels engaged in the Slave Trade, and sailing under the flag of France. In 1835, similar powers were given over vessels with the flag of Spain; and it was not until 1839 or 1840, that adequate powers were obtained as regarded the vessels carrying on the Slave Ttrade under the flag of Portugal. Therefore, it is not just to say that we had a trial of our system for thirty years, as it was not until 1839 or 1840 that we could be said to have adequate powers to make our naval police effectual, and as regards France the power is now entirely taken from us. In 1841 and 1842, however, when that power of naval police was in full effect, the Slave Trade was materially diminished, and our method did so far perfectly succeed. I have mentioned two courses which are essential in putting an end to slavery, and I shall now come to the third. I have mentioned the effect which would be produced by preventing a supply in the market, as that immediately affected the cultivator of the ground by slave labour; and in the second place, I described the advantages which are derived from preventing the transport of slaves; and I now come to a third course, which tends most effectually to put an end to slavery, namely, interfering with the market at which slaves are bought for exportation on the coast of Africa. It was not until 1838 or 1839 that we had recourse to that part of the system which consists in entering into Treaties with some of the native chiefs, in order to induce them to abandon the Slave Trade, and with others to allow us to land on the part of the coast in their possession, and destroy the baracoons which are used by the slave dealers. That part of the system has had a great effect. To it was attributed, in Sierra Leone, the diminution of the Slave Trade in 1841 and 1842. The Commissioners in their Report last year say, that this circumstance had caused some forty or fifty chiefs to decline the Slave Trade. I do not mean to say that it was the only cause; but it was one of the causes; and therefore I say, that part of the plan was successful as far as it went, and did constitute, so far as it went, a fair trial of the principle on which the method we adopted was founded. But on this part of the subject, when I say that the method had not got into full operation as regards the naval police, I may state the reason why it had not got into full operation, which was, because various events compelled the Government to remove some of the cruisers which were employed as their naval police; they were obliged to remove at one time some of the cruisers on the West Indian station; at another time some of those on the American station; at another time some of those on the African station; and complaints were made to the Government by the Commissioners from time to time that the removal of the cruisers would give a fresh impulse to the Slave Trade, and they entreated that other cruisers might be sent to blockade the coast in the room of those that had been removed. In adverting to the causes which had the effect of removing our cruisers from those stations, I may advert to the operations of 1839 and 1840 in China, which compelled the Government to remove a portion of the squadron from the coast of Africa; in the next place, to the disputes with New Grenada, which, for a time, drew away a portion of our squadron from the West Indian station; and, thirdly, to the necessity of sending a squadron to the River Plate, which took away a portion of the squadron on the Brazilian coast. All these causes of the removal of a portion of our ships, show that our system of naval police was not allowed a fair trial, and that consequently our whole system has never been allowed for any considerable period to be in full operation; that it has not been tried and found wanting: and I am afraid that unless the Government alter all their arrangements of the present system of naval police, it will not be likely to be effectual in accomplishing the object for which it was intended. In the Papers on this subject which have been laid on the Table of the House during this Session, and in the portion marked Class A, there is a Report on our cruisers on the coast of Africa, which is well worthy of attention, as showing the trial which the system of naval police has had. The Report is dated Sierra Leone, 31st December, 1843—it is a curious paper, and one which my hon. and gallant Friend near me (Sir C. Napier) says fully supports the position which he took in this House on the subject of the efficiency of those vessels for the purpose for which they were sent out. It states—

"To the very inferior sailing qualities of several of our cruisers must be attributed the escape of so many slavers, particularly from the coast between Gambia and Cape Coast Castle. Her Majesty's steamer Soudan, owing to her inefficient state, has lain at anchor nearly the whole of the year 1843, in the river Sierra Leone. Her Majesty's steamer Albert, whose sailing qualities are so bad, that with both sails and steam at their full power cannot exceed five knots an hour, has been cruising in this quarter, but without succeeding in making a single capture. Had these vessels been anchored in the Gallinas and Pongas, they must have prevented a large export of slaves in those two places, and proved a great protection to British traders."

Sir, the fact is, that we have on the African station Kites and Racers, and Lightnings and Comets, and various other names expressive of speed—but which are vessels that, nevertheless, can catch nothing. We have Growlers, and Ardents, and Thunderers, and other formidable titles, lying in the harbours of Sierra Leone, in the most profound tranquillity. Unless we have an efficient naval police, our system cannot be tried—unless the coasts are guarded by constables that can run, instead of the old Charlies, we cannot expect to succeed, for the old watchmen cannot be expected to succeed, and we ought, therefore, to have recourse to the new police. The system has not been fairly tried; and it is, consequently, most unjust to say it has been found ineffectual. It is a system, which consists, as I have said, in the first place, of Treaties with Foreign Powers, by which they agree to prevent the Slave Trade within their dominions; secondly, of Treaties provided for the interception of the slave traders off the coast of Africa; thirdly, Treaties with the native chiefs, by which they agreed that they would not sell slaves themselves, and that they would permit us to land and destroy the baracoons on their coast. But here comes a Treaty by which the Right of Search in respect to one of the greatest Powers has been entirely abolished. This has been the result of the late negotiations which led to the appointment of Commissioners on both sides, who should examine evidence respecting the practical working of the Right of Search; and who were to find, from naval officers, I presume, whether the Right of Search, which this House has so often addressed the Crown to uphold, was, in the apprehension of the officers examined, essentially useful for the purpose to which it was intended. Sir, that Commission was appointed, and they did examine certain naval officers, as I am informed, both English officers and French officers—I am informed such officers were examined; but who they were, or what they said, I know no more than any other person who knows merely what he hears in the street, or in any room that he may go into; but I have heard, and I believe it, that those officers did state that they considered the Right of Search was indispensable to render the naval police effective; and it was most natural that they should say so. I cannot tell how any man could come to a different conclusion; and if the Commissioners declared that the Right of Search was not necessary to render the operations of the naval police of any use, then I say that the evidence which has been taken before them, to say the least of it, is in direct contradiction and variance with the result they have come to. I do not see why we should not be informed as to what that evidence was. I do not see any reason satisfactory to the House which the Government could give for refusing to furnish that evidence; and whether they offer a reason for refusing it or not, it is my intention to take the sense of the House on the matter, if they should be inclined to refuse to lay that evidence on the Table. Perhaps the Ministerial answer may be given, that the production of that evidence would be injurious to the public service. I hope the Government will not give such an answer as that; for if such an answer be given, it will not, it cannot, be believed by any living man. What does the evidence contain? In the first place, it may contain a description of the tricks and stratagems of the slave dealers by which they avoid detection: would it be any harm to publish that? Would any man say that the slave dealers do not know their own tricks, as well as the officers who describe them? Can we give them any information on that head? Can any man read the statements on the subject of the Slave Trade, and not see that the officers and surveyors are constantly reporting new shifts and new evasions on the part of the slave dealers, from time to time. No possible inconvenience could arise from laying before us that evidence; on the contrary, it would be a most useful publicity. It would add nothing to the knowledge already possessed by the slave traders, whilst it would put the public at large, and our officers and merchants, in possession of the stratagems of the slave traders, and thus be an assistance to those who would be likely to aid our exertions in counteracting those tricks and devices. It may be that there were certain suggestions given by our officers with respect to the counteraction of the tricks and stratagems of the slave traders; but I deny that laying before us in the evidence any such suggestion could be injurious to the public service. It may be said that the slave traders would be put upon their guard; but I ask will not the slave traders in time find out the plans for counteracting their stratagems in the same way in which our officers discovered those stratagems? They would clearly find them out without having this evidence; and so far from evil arising from making those suggestions public, I think it would be a public good if it would act as a warning to the slave traders, by showing them that you were acquainted with their shifts, and knew how to prevent them. The third reason which may be assigned is, that portions of the evidence might create personal feelings amongst the officers of the British and French Navies. It is possible, but I think it very unlikely, that officers, from a spirit of nationality, would in their evidence as to the officers and the naval proceedings of another State, make statements which would lead to irritation on the part of those to whom they referred—I think it unlikely that officers, gentlemen who knew they spoke before the Commissioners of both nations—that English and French officers would use unbecoming expressions, or say anything calculated to give unnecessary offence. If the statements made were only facts which would show that, directly or indirectly, any other countries were connected with the Slave Trade—if they tended to show that, directly or indirectly, any British subject was concerned in the Slave Trade, they ought to get every publicity, as that publicity, instead of doing harm, would do a great deal of good; I think this House has a right to know what were the opinions of the officers examined, touching the usefulness of the Right of Search. Here we have a Treaty which abolishes the Right of Search; that Treaty was preceded by the examination of persons knowing the practical bearing of the Right of Search, and we have a right to know whether their evidence and opinions bear out the Treaty or not. And, although it may not bear out the Treaty, and the Government may on that account be somewhat reluctant to produce the evidence which may go to their own condemnation, still I am sure that they will not shrink from the responsibility of their own decision, and that they will feel it to be their duty, on the one hand, to give up that evidence; and on the other hand, to state the reasons, if there are good ones—though I much fear there are not—the reasons which, in spite of, and notwithstanding that evidence, led them to think it right to take the step which they have taken. This Treaty virtually abolishes, now and for ever, the mutual Right of Search between England and France. By so doing, I say that it gives up the most useful arrangement for the accomplishment of that purpose which both England and France professed to desire to accomplish—namely, the abolition of the Slave Trade. I contend that that right has been given up, without our having obtained, as a substitute, any equivalent whatever. I presume that it will not be disputed that the Right of Search is now permanently given up. The new Treaty goes to this—that the Treaties of 1831 and 1832 are suspended for ten years, and that in the fifth year the two parties may concert together, and decide whether these Treaties shall again be put in force or not; that is to say, that, at the end of the fifth year, the parties may consider whether or not they will negotiate a new Treaty, because the putting again in force the Treaties of 1831 and 1832 will, at that period, be exactly tantamount to concluding these Treaties afresh. The Convention further goes on to say that, if at the end of ten years, these Treaties are not again put in force, they will from that time be considered as abandoned. It is very curious to observe how, by an ingenious arrangement of words, of suspension, concert, and Heaven knows what, the French negotiator has so contrived that, at the end of ten years, his country will be wound out of all engagements entered into by the Treaties of 1831 and 1832. I am bound to say that the skill and address of the French negotiator are much deserving of admiration. I only regret that the skill, the address, the dexterity, and the ability which he has shown, were employed in so bad a cause; and one reason why I the more regret this is, that the name of the Duc de Broglie is identified with the efforts made by the two countries to suppress the Slave Trade; because, it was the Duc de Broglie who signed the Treaties which he has been now instrumental in putting an end to. At the end of ten years, unless the opinion of France is entirely changed, and unless France comes back to a desire to engage in a mutual Right of Search, France is entirely out of all her former engagements. I really must say, that it is too much for any man to ask us to believe him serious when he says, as is said in France, that this Right of Search indicates a desire on the part of England to exercise undue authority on the seas, or that it is an instrument by which we are to exercise some advantage over the commerce and over the maritime force of France. We were no more desirous that our merchantmen should be stopped, visited, searched, and overhauled by French ships, than the French were that their merchantmen should be subject to the same interruption by our cruisers. Inconvenience must have been, and was, anticipated on both sides, and to that inconvenience we submitted, because we deemed it conducive to the great object which humanity had in view. As to its being by any possibility conducive in any way to England's interest, as contradistinguished from the interest which she had in promoting the main purpose which she had in view—the abolishing of the Slave Trade—the assertion is so palpably absurd, that I cannot give credit, even to a slave trader himself, who may affirm that we have been acting upon such a principle. The clamour to which Her Majesty's Government have yielded, in abolishing the Right of Search, is a clamour arising from a conspiracy of slave traders, not only in France, but also in Cuba, Brazil, and elsewhere. We have, in the Papers of last year, a statement that the slave traders of Cuba were raising a subscription to get England abused in the French newspapers. And abroad, many persons were engaged, more or less, in that trade; and the clamour raised is not, I think, a clamour arising out of any real national jealousy entertained by France of England; it is not the result of any abusive exercise by us, of the right which these Treaties gave us—it is a clamour raised for interested purposes, and adopted by a party who made it at one time an instrument against the French Government, and yielded to, through entire weakness, on the part of Her Majesty's Advisers. Weakness, I certainly call it. What is the history of the transaction? The right hon. Baronet said, on a former occasion, that it was the result of a national irritation, occasioned by transactions in the year 1840, in which it was my lot to bear a share. He has been pleased to do me more honour than I deserve, by representing these transactions as mine, and endeavouring to separate me from the Government of which I had the honour of being a Member. Sir, I cannot accept the compliment which the right hon. Baronet has thus tendered me. These measures, it was my duty, from the office which I then held, to be instrumental in proposing and executing; but the measures themselves were the measures of the Government; and the merit of them, if any merit is due to them, is due equally to every Member of that Government. The right hon. Baronet may say again, that the irritation to which he has yielded, was owing, he will not say to my fault, nor will he inquire whether I am to blame, or where the blame is to attach. I have good authority for saying, and so has the right hon. Baronet, that no blame, arising from these measures, can attach to the Government of England of that day. Why, Sir, who approved of these measures? Who approved of the policy pursued by England in continuing, with Austria, Russia, Prussia, and with Turkey, arrangements for establishing an order of things consistent with the maintenance of the peace of the world, and with the preservation of the balance of power in Europe? Who approved of these measures? The right hon. Baronet himself. His Colleague, too—that great and illustrious man, and such I may be allowed to call him in his lifetime without flattery—the Duke of Wellington, openly declared his approval, in the discussion on the Address in 1841, of these transactions, and stated that he entirely approved of the policy which the Government of that day had pursued, and that no one fault had been committed in carrying that policy into execution. The right hon. Baronet was not quite so prodigal in his declarations; but, in the speech which he made on the Address, and which I looked over this morning, there was a studious avoidance of anything like blame—there was, indirectly, an acknowledgment that we had acted rightly; and the only point on which he reserved his opinion was the point as to whether we had sufficiently communicated or not with M. Guizot on the 13th and 14th of July. But, with respect to the policy pursued by the Government, I maintain that it had his approval. It had the approval also of the noble Lord now at the head of the Foreign Department, the approval of the Duke of Wellington, and, I believe, the approval of the rest of his Colleagues. If that be so, is it fair, by insinuation, by question, by disclaiming all intention to inquire—is it fair, I say, to lead other people to suppose that he thinks we were to blame? He says, he won't inquire where the blame rests; but, by thus hesitating, does he not imply an opinion which he does not entertain? The policy which is thus impugned by implication might, and did, create for a moment a very unnecessary irritation in the public mind of France. I most deeply regretted that such should have been its result. But, nevertheless, the object obtained was so important, its importance was so great, in reference to permanent, peaceful relations between England and France, that I thought the temporary irritation in France not too dear a price to pay for the solid and permanent advantages of that policy. That policy was not the cause of the abandonment of the Right of Search, because, after the irritation spoken of had subsided, after the operations under the Treaty had been completed, it was frequently declared in the French Chambers that, in the course of these transactions, we did not give offence to France; and after the Government of that day had gone out, and their more conciliatory successors had come into office, the French Government signed the additional Treaty of 1841. When I say that weakness was shown by Her Majesty's Government, in submitting quietly to the refusal of the French Government to ratify the Treaty of 1841, I am ready to prove my assertion. When it was found that the Government submitted quietly to such a breach of obligation, the opposition in the French Chambers urged the French Government to go a step further, and to require the abrogation of the Treaties of 1831 and 1832. What was, then, M. Guizot's reply? He refused, and I will tell you why. He said—

"If I made such a proposal to England, it would be one which I have no right to make, and which would be met with a peremptory denial: to be so met would be a humiliation, and I will not expose myself and the French Government to be so humbled by a Foreign Government."

The Chambers took that answer for the time, and there is no denying that it is a good one. In the course of the following year, the Chambers and the Government found that Her Majesty's Government was not so denying and peremptory as M. Guizot had at first imagined. Many transactions, which I will not detail, of that year, showed him that, if sufficiently pressed, it was possible to find them more yielding. Next year, when he was again pressed to make the same proposal, as he saw his way, he determined to do it. He did not then, as before, anticipate a peremptory refusal. From that time negotiations followed, and they have ended in the entire abrogation of the Treaties of 1831 and 1833; and, as I contend, without any equivalent having been given in their stead. But I shall be told that there is an equivalent—that the equivalent, substituted for the mutual Right of Search, is the employment of two squadrons, of twenty-six vessels each, the one French, the other English, on a certain portion of the west coast of Africa. The Right of Search was more extensive than this. It extended to wherever the Slave Trade was carried on, or nearly so. It embraced the West Indies—the coast of Brazil—the western coast of Africa; it extended around the island of Madagascar, and applied, therefore, to a certain degree, to the east coast of Africa also. The operations of the substitute are to be limited to one portion of the west coast of Africa. Therefore, in territorial extent, I say, you (the Ministers) have not got an equivalent for what you have given up. But we may be told to look at the number of vessels to be employed, and find in that an equivalent. The two countries are to have twenty-six vessels a piece, making fifty-two in all. Now, I called for a return to show what was the number of vessels which, in each half year for some time past, were armed with warrants for the suppression of the Slave Trade—of French vessels armed with English warrants; and English vessels armed with French warrants; and it seems, taking an average of the number of warrants outstanding from the 1st of January to the 1st of July, from 1840 to 1845, that is to say, for ten half years, that there were fifty-two French vessels in possession of English warrants, and fifty-four English vessels in possession of French warrants. ["Hear!"] The right hon. Baronet may say that some of them belonged to vessels which had just returned, and which had not yet given up the warrants. I will, therefore, make an abatement of some of them. There is room to do so, because whereas by the present Treaty there are fifty-two vessels to be employed, 106 warrants were outstanding under the former arrangement. That is, double the number of vessels stipulated to be employed by the present Treaty; so that if I give him half, which is much more than a proper allowance, still the result will be that we have not gained by the new arrangement any additional force for the purpose in view. But the fifty-two vessels now to be employed, will not be worth fifty-two vessels under the old plan. These fifty-two vessels will be mutually powerless, to a certain extent, with regard to the English and French flags, only one-half of them being invested with any power. Your French cruiser cannot examine anything but French ships, except, perhaps, those of Denmark and Sweden: it is perfectly powerless with regard to England, Spain, Portugal, and Brazil. None of these four flags will it be able to stop, even if it finds the ship crowded and crammed with slaves. The French have no Treaty with Brazil, Spain, and Portugal; and I should like to know whether the French Government, after having got us to abrogate the Right of Search, will now go and propose entering into such a Treaty with Spain, Portugal, or Brazil? If they do not, their cruisers are of no use, except for the French flag. What, then, will happen? Slavers, as is stated in the Papers on the Table, are in the habit of providing themselves with the flags and papers of different countries. These flags and papers may be had for a few dollars, in various parts of the world. What then, I repeat, will happen? A slaver comes out of a river or a bay on the coast of Africa—she meets a French cruiser, and thereupon hoists the English flag—the cruiser sends a boat to board and examine her; an Englishman is on board, who acts as captain, and produces the papers. They are, apparently, in perfect order—there may be slaves on board, but the French cruiser can do nothing—the officer wishes the captain good morning, and a fine passage, and goes back to his cruiser, and the slaver proceeds on her voyage. She next comes in contact with a British cruiser. By that time she has hauled down her colours, which she does not show again until a shot is fired ahead of her. Under these circumstances, when that compliment is paid her, she hoists the French flag. An English officer goes on board, and, with all that politeness which he is properly instructed to use, requests the captain to show his papers; and—like the show box, which puts forth a man or a woman, or like the barrel which furnishes a glass of ratafia or brandy, as may be desired—this time a Frenchman makes his appearance, as captain, and French papers are produced. The ship, for the time, is French. There are slaves on board; but the English officer, in his turn, wishes the captain good morning and a fine passage, returns to his ship, and away goes the slaver unmolested as before. She then arrives upon the coast of Brazil, and acts the same part. If she chances to meet one of the French cruisers she is again a Brazilian, a Portuguese, a Spanish, or an English ship, just as she pleases, for she has her choice. She cannot, therefore, be molested, and in she goes and lands her cargo. I say, then, that even within that portion of the coast of Africa to which your new Treaty is limited, that Treaty is inefficient as compared with the system which was previously adopted, and which is now given up; and, unless your cruisers can go about chained together, like the Siamese twins, hunting in couples, it is impossible that, under the new system, many ships will not escape, which, under the former arrangement, must necessarily have been captured. But then, why, I should like to know, if the French Government is as sincere as it professes to be, are its engagements limited to the west coast of Africa? Why are they not extended to the West Indies? Why not to the coast of Brazil? Is it that the late alliance between the royal families of France and Brazil has rendered more deference desirable on the part of the French Government towards the Government of Brazil? Is that the reason why the Brazilian coast is not included in the recent arrangements? Why, again, do these engagements not extend to the east coast of Africa? There are upwards of 2,000 miles on the west coast, along which the Slave Trade is carried on; but there are also about 1,700 miles on the east coast along which the same trade is now carried on; and I lay my life that if the Treaty be successful as to that part of the coast to which it applies—if you drive the Slave Trade altogether from the 2,000 miles on the west coast, which I do not think you will, though I hope you may, you will only drive it to the east coast, where it will flourish along the extent to which I have alluded; thus succeeding in merely transferring it from one point to the other, by which its horrors will be multiplied, the voyage will be lengthened, and the sufferings of the captive slaves greatly increased. Why do I say this? Because we have evidence now, that the Slave Trade is, and in former years has been, to a great extent, carried on along the east coast of Africa. I say it, moreover, because it appears from these Papers, as I have already stated, that the French Government have lately concluded a Treaty with the Imaum of Muscat, by which they are to be enabled to engage, as it is said, free labourers, but really to hire slaves to carry to the island of Bourbon for the purpose of cultivating the soil there. It is said that these slaves are to be employed as free labourers in a Colony in which slavery exists by law. It is also said, that after a certain period of time, they are to return to their native country, and to carry back with them the earnings of their labour, and the benefits of the civilization and the knowledge which they have acquired. This pretence is, fortunately, too palpable to deceive any man. Free negroes you may call them; but when they are carried to a slave Colony, they will be as much slaves as any of the slaves existing there before: by law, they will be just as much slaves as those already in the Colony, as much slaves—and more I cannot say—as the unhappy Emancipados in Cuba and Brazil. As to their going back again to their native country, it is possible, for aught I know, that their spirits, when they are once freed by the merciful hand of death from their sufferings, may be permitted, in passing to their future destiny, to cast a passing glance at the place of their birth—at what was once their home; but as to the idea that in the body they are ever to go back alive to their native country, the notion is too absurd for the most credulous to believe it. I should like, now, to know how you are to reconcile that Treaty of the French Government with the Imaum of Muscat, with the Treaty which we have entered into with the same personage, by which he bound himself not to permit his subjects to deal, within certain limits, in slaves with any Christian Power? I hold that those two Treaties are completely at variance. I am sure Her Majesty's Government will not take their stand on the quibble that the negroes to be imported into the French Colonies are to be engaged as free labourers. The mere stipulation that the French are to hire slaves, intimates that those negroes will still retain the character of slaves after they have reached the Isle of Bourbon. But does the House know what is the character of the Slave Trade which this Treaty of the French with the Imaum of Muscat is calculated to encourage? The French will buy their slaves at the Island of Zanzibar; and the slaves are taken to that island in small coasting vessels. We have heard a great deal of the horrors of the middle passage; we have heard of the sufferings of the negroes carried from Africa to America, and of the horrible tortures they endure in the slave ships; but does the House know what are the sufferings of those wretched negroes who are carried to the slave market at Zanzibar? Sir T. F. Buxton tells us that the Arab dows, or vessels, which carry these slaves coastwise to Zanzibar, are "Large unwieldy boats, without a deck. In these temporary platforms are erected, leaving a narrow passage in the centre. The negroes are then stowed in bulk, the first tier being laid along the floor of the vessel, two adults, side by side, with a boy or girl resting between and upon them, until the tier is complete. Over them the first platform is laid, separated—"

We have often heard of the interval between decks in slave ships, being small; but what will the House think of this method of stowing human beings?

"Over them (Sir T. Buxton proceeds) the first platform is laid separated but an inch or two from their bodies, when the second tier is stowed in the same manner, and so on, until they reach the gunwale of the vessel. They calculate that the voyage will not exceed twenty-four, or, at the farthest, forty-eight hours."

Such was the description; and let the House conceive the sufferings, even for twenty-four hours, of human beings, placed in a hot climate in this position? But the description proceeds:—

"It often happens that a calm, or unexpected land-breeze, delays their progress; in this case a few hours are sufficient to decide the fate of the cargo; those of the lower portion of the cargo that die cannot be removed They remain until the upper part are dead and thrown over, and, from a cargo of from 200 to to 400 stowed in this way, it has been known that not a dozen, at the expiration of ten days, have reached Zanzibar."

This is the trade which the Treaty of the French Government with the Imaum of Muscat is about to encourage and increase. This is the trade which a Government professing to co-operate with us in an anxious desire to suppress the Slave Trade, will, by that Treaty, encourage and promote on the eastern coast of Africa. I need not ask you why it was that the French Government did not extend the operations of their suppressive squadron to that coast. By the stipulations of the Treaty we concluded with the Imaum of Muscat, he bound himself not to permit his subjects to sell slaves to any Christian Power; and we obtained additional powers for searching his vessels found at sea and engaged in the Slave Trade. In one of his letters, contained in the Papers laid before the House, the Imaum says—

"I agree to that; I make a great sacrifice of revenue by consenting to abolish the Slave Trade with the countries bordering on the Red Sea; but do not ask me to give up the Slave Trade that comes coastwise along the shore."

That is, the Slave Trade of which I have just read a description. The Imaum says—

"To give up that trade would be more than, with my pecuniary losses, I could bear; and I pray you not to press the request."

There is in the Papers laid on the Table last year a very curious and diverting letter from the Imaum, in answer to a communication from Lord Leveson, pressing him to abandon the Slave Trade, in which the Imaum says, "It is the angel of death that has appeared to me; but I submit to my fate. It is the will of God, and I have no choice." [Sir R. Peel: Will you show me that in the Papers?] Here it is, [said the noble Lord, handing the Papers over to the right hon. Baronet, pointing out the passage to which he referred:]—The Imaum sent over to this country a Minister, who was most kindly received by the present Government; and, in a subsequent communication, the Imaum says that the manner in which the representations of that Minister were received, had greatly relieved his mind, and had brought him to life again. The Imaum, in answer to the application to abandon the Slave Trade altogether, expresses his readiness to give up—though at a great pecuniary sacrifice—his Slave Trade to the Red Sea and Egypt; but he begs and entreats that he may not be compelled to give up the Slave Trade along the coast, from which he derives a large portion of his revenue. His request was complied with; but he was told—and it appears in these Papers—that it would look better if that exception in favour of his coastwise Slave Trade were to appear to be a reservation made by him, rather than by the direct sanction and permission of the British Government. I quite agree in that opinion; although, after all, there is but little difference between the cases; but I really do wonder how it happened that with these Papers before them, and with the statements I have read, of which they might have a knowledge, Her Majesty's Government should have thought it right not to persist in requiring the abandonment of this coasting Slave Trade. I cannot imagine how it happened that they did not insist that the Imaum should, at all events, make certain regulations for the conduct of this Slave Trade. Why did they not insist that he should make a law, fixing the number of negroes to be conveyed by a vessel, in proportion to its tonnage, so as to mitigate, in some degree, the horrible atrocities of the trade as it is now carried on? Such a regulation would have been for the interest even of the Imaum himself; for his revenue arises not from the dead bodies which are thrown overboard, but from the slaves who are safely landed. Sir T. Buxton says:—

"On the arrival of the vessels at Zanzibar, the cargoes are landed; those that can walk up the beach are arranged for the inspection of the Imaum's Officer, and the payment of duties—those that are weak or maimed by the voyage are left for the coming tide to relieve their miseries."

The Imaum derived his revenue from the able-bodied slaves who can walk up the beach, and not from those who are thrown overboard on the passage, or who are left on the beach to be swept away by the coming tide. I think that Her Majesty's Government have been guilty of great neglect in this matter, in not requiring some decent regulation of the trade, if they thought proper to abstain from pressing the Imaum to give it up altogether. I say, then, that this Treaty omits to provide any precautions for the suppression of the Slave Trade on the eastern coast of Africa, on the coast of Brazil, or in the West Indies; and that it is deficient in its provisions with reference to the western coast of Africa, to which only it is intended to apply. But this Treaty contemplates operations by land; it provides that Treaties shall be made with the chiefs, and that, if it should be necessary, operations are to be carried on on shore for the purpose of enforcing those Treaties. To show Her Majesty's Government that I am not now speaking in any spirit of party feeling, I will say that I am glad to see these portions of the Treaty—and for two reasons. In the first place, because they contemplate a renewal of those operations by land for the destruction of the baracoons, and of those endeavours to engage chiefs by Treaty to give up the Slave Trade which we made in 1841 — measures which, as I think, are eminently conducive to checking the Slave Trade; but I think that these provisions will have another effect most advantageous to England and France, and most likely to promote a permanent good understanding between the two countries. Great complaints have recently been made of some proceedings of the French Government in multiplying their settlements on the coast of Africa, and, where those settlements are established, of excluding, as it is conceived, British commerce. The French people entertain a similar jealousy of the multiplication of our settlements. I consider this Treaty as binding both countries to abstain from making any further settlements on any part of the coast of Africa included in the limits prescribed by the Treaty — fifteen degrees north, and sixteen degrees south. The Convention provides that Treaties shall be made with the native chiefs, and that those Treaties shall be exclusively confined to the suppression of the Slave Trade; that such Treaties, when concluded by an officer of either country, must be approved by the Representative of the other Power; and that no operations on land are to be undertaken in virtue of these Treaties, except with the consent of both parties. Now, I think, any compact which tends to leave that part of the coast of Africa intact, and prevent either party from encroaching to the detriment or exclusion of the other, must tend to benefit the commerce of both nations, and to prevent occurrences—such as those in the river Gaboon—which might tend to disturb the harmony existing between the two countries. But there is one stipulation of the Convention which I really do not understand. It is said in Article 3—

"The Officers of Her Majesty the Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and of His Majesty the King of the French, having respectively the command of the squadrons of Great Britain and France, to be employed in carrying out this Convention, shall concert together as to the best means of watching strictly the parts of the African coast before described, by selecting and defining the stations, and committing the care thereof to English and French cruisers, jointly or separately, as may be deemed expedient; provided always, that in case of a station being especially committed to the charge of cruisers of either nation, the cruisers of the other nation may at any time enter the same for the purpose of exercising the rights respectively belonging to them, for the suppression of the Slave Trade."

This seems to me to draw a distinction between cruisers and merchantmen. It seems by this, that when there is a cruiser of one nation stationed at the mouth of a river, or in the bight of a bay, that no merchantmen of the other country can come in, for the purposes of its legitimate trade; because it is said, that when the cruiser of one nation takes its station, it may be lawful for the cruiser of the other nation to enter the same, "for the purpose of exercising the rights respectively belonging to them, for the suppression of the Slave Trade." Why put in that at all? Is it meant that the cruisers should establish a belligerent blockade? It is not the best means of watching the coast: it does not contemplate hostile operations. It is part of a general system that is to be in operation; and yet you say, that when the cruisers of one nation are watching the Slave Trade, that you stand in such a position as to require a special stipulation in your Treaty, to enable the cruisers of one nation to enter the same place where the cruisers of the other are stationed. It appears to me, that unless you can give a sufficient explanation to that Article, that by implication merchantmen are excluded from entering the place where a cruiser is stationed. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will be able to explain that. I say that such is an objectionable arrangement; and that the result is, that you have given up rights which, I contend, were proved by numerous facts to be essential, useful, and proper; and that you have got no proper equivalent in lieu of them. I own, too, that I have an objection to the form in which this Treaty appears. It is one that I very much regret to see. The preamble states—

"Her Majesty the Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and His Majesty the King of the French, considering that the Conventions of the 30th November, 1831, and the 22nd March, 1833, have effected their object in preventing the use of the English and French flags in carrying on the Slave Trade; but that this odious traffic still exists, and that the said Conventions are insufficient to ensure its complete suppression."

Is it meant then—has a British Plenipotentiary been found to put this upon record—that the British flag has been used for the purposes of slavery—that such a practice prevailed, and that it was put an end to by the Treaty of 1831, and by the action of French cruisers? I say, Sir, it is a foul calumny on the British nation. The British Slave Trade was put an end to by the laws of England long before your Treaty of 1831 or 1833. The Slave Trade of France was put an end to by the Treaties of 1831 and 1833. If it were thought uncivil to France to record that fact in the Treaty—if it were thought unhandsome to remind France how recently she had ceased to take part in the traffic, then you should have omitted all mention of the subject—you should have suppressed it altogether; but never would I have put my hand to an implied falsehood which casts dishonour on my country—never consented to that, which, by implication, would affirm that the Slave Trade had been carried on so lately by this country, as in 1831 and 1833, and that the Treaty with France had prevented the abuse of the English flag. I say, that it was unworthy of a British Minister—of a British Plenipotentiary, whether a Minister in or out of office, to have given his signature to such a statement—and nothing more astonishes me, than that this should be done by one of the persons who has put his name to such a falsehood—falsehood by implication—and a calumnious imputation upon his country. Then there is Article 9. What does Article 9 say? It says—

"Her Majesty the Queen of the United Kingom of Great Britain and Ireland, and His Majesty the King of the French, mutually engage to continue the prohibition for ever of all Slave Trade in the Colonies which they possess, or may hereafter possess; and also to prevent, as far as the laws of each country shall permit, their respective subjects from being engaged, directly or indirectly, in this traffic."

How could any man read that Article, and not imagine that slavery still existed in the British Colonies? because to say that you will prevent the Slave Trade in Colonies where no such thing as slavery exists, is a gross and palpable absurdity. What is the meaning of that? The meaning of that is, that there is such a disposition in the British Parliament and British nation to re-enact slavery, and to legalize the Slave Trade, that it was necessary for the Crown to interfere, and enter into an engagement with France, declaring that the powers of the Crown should be exercised, and the honour of the Crown pledged to prevent the Parliament and the country from pursuing so disgraceful a course. This, I say, is an insult to Parliament, and an insult to the people of England. And if the former passage is a gross calumny on the country, I say that this is a childish insult to Parliament; and never would I have put my hand to these two passages. I must express my astonishment that the Government should have permitted their Plenipotentiary to put his hand to two such passages as these. These are my objections to this Treaty; and I think it shows on the part of the Government indifference to the subject of the Slave Trade, and a weakness in dealing with Foreign Powers, unworthy of the Government of this country. Nor are these two defects confined to this Treaty. I read, with some pain, and, I may add, I really felt some difficulty and reluctance in going through those Papers—the Slave Trade Correspondence of last year which has been laid on the Table. In many parts of it I was tempted to throw the book away in which it was contained. I must remark that they were somewhat delayed in their appearance; and I think they might as well have been produced earlier, and at the same time, perhaps, less bulky in form. In the first place, I may say, that according to the time they have been produced, the despatches dated last January will, according to the mode adopted with respect to them, not be laid before Parliament before the month of June next year. I think they might be produced nearer the time at which they were written; and I may also observe that whole passages are taken up with letters that are on matters of form, such as returns relative to ships' warrants. I think shorter entries of them might have been made; for the bulk of the volume is calculated to discourage persons from reading it. I say, that these are of a nature to deter persons from reading the correspondence; but to any one who has read it, there appears a great indifference on the part of the Government, and even a great apathy. I think that they prove the most erroneous concessions made, and the lowest tone adopted in dealing with every Foreign Power with which the Government is brought into contact. I am not going to weary the House with many details; but the instance of one or two examples will be sufficient to demonstrate what I mean. We have, by Treaty, Consuls and Commissioners in almost every slave-dealing country. We have for instance, a Consul at the Havanna, and a Slave Trade Commissioner. Our Consuls General, in many parts of the world, are our sole Ministerial Representatives. Be he whom he may, every Consul is entitled to make to the authorities on the spot, and he is there to make, by virtue of his power, representations for the protection of British subjects and British trade, and to take care that the rights of this country are not violated. Then there are our Slave Trade Commissioners; they are intrusted not merely to adjudicate upon the cases that may come before them, but to make representations of all infractions of Treaties that may come to their knowledge. They were ordered to do that by myself; they were ordered to do that by my successor. The Consul General at the Havanna, and the Slave Trade Commissioners were continually, it appears, obtaining knowledge of contraventions of the Slave Treaties—of the landing of negroes—of the sale of slaves, of the arrival of negroes—of the detention of British subjects, who were not slaves—of the ill treatment of the Emancipados—of those entitled to their freedom, but treated as slaves. They were in the habit of making communications to the Governors of Cuba to this effect; and good Governors were obliged to them for the information, and acted on it; and bad Governors, who were the most numerous, were in the habit of thanking them too, but telling them that theirs was inaccurate information, and they might set their minds at ease on the subject; but still they always treated the Consuls civilly. Lately, however, there came General O'Donnell, a gentleman who thought that the Government of Cuba ought to contribute to the rapid accumulation of his fortune, and he therefore determined to go at once head over heels into the corrupt practices of his predecessors. He took slaves without stint; he took so many dollars a-head for the value of the slaves which were imported in violation of the Treaties; and he refused to be troubled on the subject. I find that these representations of the Consul General and of the Slave Trade Commissioners were very irksome; and it is very probable that for all these there was a lithographed answer; but still these representations were constant—they made a noise. General O'Donnell looked into the old Records, and he found an obsolete Proclamation of 1760, by which it was declared that the Consuls General in Spanish Colonies should only act in their commercial, and not in their diplomatic capacity; and being for a strict adherence to Treaties, he thought that the Commissioners who had to adjudicate should confine themselves solely to their judicial duties—that they had not to inquire as to negroes landed, as to ships going to Africa, and returning from it. He told them, therefore, that he was very sorry; but they had better not write to him, because they had no right to interfere in these matters. They wanted only to perform their duty; and how necessary it was for them to do so, is proved by the case of the unfortunate Consul at St. Jago de Cuba, who, in writing to the Foreign Office for instructions, received a severe reprimand—there was conveyed to him "the censure," for that was the word employed, "the censure of Her Majesty's Government," for even doubting on this subject, and for not having made at once representations to the Governor of the province. The Consul General, and the officers of the Mixed Commission, did make such communications. At last the Governor, finding these communications constantly coming to him, very civilly returned the letters. On the next occasion they wrote, and the letters were again returned; and so it goes on—the unfortunate Consul and Commissioner are placed in a situation most repugnant to their feelings. They are subjected to degradation. They beg to be restored to that footing on which they ought to stand. At once our Government takes the matter up. It writes a strong letter to Madrid, and desires that orders may be given to the Governor of Cuba, not only to receive these letters, but to act on them. The Government at Madrid seems to have a great respect for its Cuba Governor. In answer to the peremptory demand that orders should be given to the Spanish Governor, the Government of Madrid says that it will give no such orders—that by an old custom of Spain, Consuls have no such right in its Colonies as that claimed for England—it says that Governor O'Donnell has acted perfectly right—and then, mixing with this declaration some uncivil language to England, it comes at last to this result, that when the Consul General, or the Member of the Mixed Commission, should find out that negroes had been landed at Matanzas, within a very short distance of where they were placed, and where the negroes are sold, instead of telling that to the Governor, and so having an immediate inquiry, the Consul General should write to London; that the Foreign Office should then write to Madrid; and then those in Madrid should write to Cuba; and then, upon the letter at last getting back to Cuba, he might at once say—"Oh! this is false—this happened a year ago—it is impossible any such thing can have happened—there can be no ground for making such a charge." To such a proposition as that there was a ready answer, if any answers were given to the Spanish Government; but no reply appears from these Papers. I presume, then, that the Government acquiesced in this refusal; that they have assented to that for the neglect of which the Consul at St. Jago de Cuba was censured. I presume, then, that the Government has submitted to that great alteration in the international usages of Europe. And as it is proper that the Consul General and the Member of the Mixed Commission should not make communications of this kind—if that is the notion, then at least it is the bounden duty of the Government to tell the Consul General and the Mixed Commissioner to withdraw by a formal order from displeasing General O'Donnell. There is nothing, indeed, said of it in this book; and, for aught we know, they are still going on sending, week after week, letters to the Governor General, who civilly answers them that he can receive no communication from them; and thus are they both left, exciting contempt for their position, suffering indignities, and becoming the laughing-stock of the whole island. This is one thing that appears by this book. The Government abandons its first demand, and its servants are left to submit themselves to the goodwill and pleasure of the Government of Spain. Passing from Cuba to Surinam, a great number of British-born subjects have, at different periods, been carried into Surinam, and detained there in slavery, contrary to the existing law. Their number is stated to amount to five or six thousand. I have stated before that these persons were entitled to their freedom. The Queen's Advocate says the contrary. I say that his opinion is wrong. It may appear to be presumptuous in me to differ from any one who has devoted himself to the study of the law; but I say his opinion is bad in law, as much so as it is bad in theory and essentially unjust. These negroes were illegally carried out of a British Colony to the Colony of a Foreign Power. If they had remained, as by law they were entitled to remain in a British Colony, they would at this moment be in the possession of their freedom. I say it is not just that British subjects should suffer from an act in which they had no share whatever, and of which they were the unwilling and unfortunate victims. A demand was made as to an inquiry into cases of this sort. Our Commissioner at Surinam made an application to the Dutch Governor. This gentleman, Mr. Elias, appears to have been more civil and less money-making than General O'Donnell. He, too, thought applications irksome; perhaps he had heard of what had occurred at Cuba. He did not return the letters. He first wrote an answer to say he would take no notice of them, and the Commissioners' Judges persevering in writing letters, they were left unanswered. The Commissioners complained of the great indignity that was put upon them. They wrote to the Government at home for support in the performance of the duties imposed upon them. On this our Government wrote to the Government at the Hague to demand definite instructions. The urgent demand subsequently declined into an earnest hope, and our Government went on hoping through a whole year, during which it was unable to extract even a verbal answer. In Cuba our letters are sent back unanswered, and the Government at Madrid refuses to give orders to its Governor to attend to them; in Surinam, our letters are received in silence, the Government of the Hague treats Downing Street in the same way. Indeed, these negotiations with Spain prove, that so long as Governor O'Donnell remains at Cuba, all chance of a fair and faithful execution of Treaties is hopeless. At the present moment the evil is undeniable; and for that very reason it appears that General O'Donnell has been continued at Cuba, and, I believe, is likely to remain there. I need not trouble the House to go further to show the feebleness in remonstrance, and the want of vigour that has been displayed in making representations, in the submission to the unjust decisions of the French Government, and the apathetic indifference to those great matters which have so long engaged the attention, and excited the wishes of Parliament and the country. The right hon. Gentleman will probably tell me, "If you think so ill of the Government, if you consider it so little in earnest in the performance of its duty, why not take the sense of the House on the subject?" I know, Sir, very well that the Government has a majority of 100 when the House is full, and a proportionate majority when the House is less full. I perfectly well know if I were to propose a Resolution, that it would be negatived by a large majority. I do not see that it is necessary for me to please the Government by moving a Resolution for the purpose of its being negatived. I do not, Sir, address these matters to this House. I know full well that no arguments of mine could change the opinions of a majority of this House on a question involving the conduct of the Government. Sir, I address myself to the people of this country —I now address myself to the nation. I am quite sure that the feelings of this country are the same now that they long have been on this subject of the Slave Trade. I am quite sure that there is no abatement in their zeal, no diminution in the desires of the people to put it down. I would beg, if it were not so—I would beg of the people of this country to consider the lessons that history teaches. I am quite sure that if you look to the actions and fate of individual men, that you will sometimes find that evil does not meet with its appropriate punishment here. It is, however, the exception:—

> "Rarò antecedentem scelestum > Deseruit pede pœna claudo."

But, though there may be exceptions as to this rule, and in another state of being individuals are made accountable for their deeds on this earth, with nations it is different. The life of nations is mixed up with the arrangements and dispositions of this world; and history teaches us that the crimes of nations never fail to meet with their appropriate punishment. The superficial, when they read of the worst state of a nation—of tyranny within, of invasion from without—of murders, of massacre, of the devastation of towns, of the destruction of villages, of all these horrors accumulated upon each other—may ascribe these to immediately preceding circumstances; and in their shallow views, may seek to connect them as cause and effect; but the more philosophic will look at these things in another aspect—will trace out in the calamities that befall a nation, the punishment of its former offences, and the just visitation of its former crimes. I do not ask of the people of this country to suppose that it is permitted to them to open a species of debtor and creditor account on these matters, for the good they have done, and the evil they have permitted; but I say this, that as men, they have duties to perform; that those duties do not consist in merely abstaining from evil, but in doing as much good as they can; and that from those who have great power, and are possessed of great influence, the more is to be expected as to the good within their power to achieve. This country stands in a pre-eminent position; and great, therefore, is its responsibility on this subject. This country has great power and political influence for the accomplishment of this great object. We not only possess great means, but we are invested with great rights, which we have acquired by Treaties; great rights, which we are bound to enforce to put an end to this monstrous and calamitous traffic. I say, that the people of this country will not perform the duties that belong to them as responsible men, if they do not urge upon the Government—if urging it requires—and if they do not encourage the Government—if encouragement be wanting—to enforce all the means that exist, and to exert all the legislative powers and influence of this country, to compel the enforcement of those rights; the rights that by Treaty have been acquired for the purpose of extinguishing this diabolical crime. The Government should be supported heartily, if it require support, and it should be urged, if it require pressure, by the people of this country, to take those steps, which it can do without any danger to peace, and without any peril of failure, which it is authorized to take, and has the power to take, and it is its duty to take, to put an end to this abominable and accursed Slave Trade.

Sir R. Peel: Sir, towards the close of the speech of the noble Lord, he gave us the very unnecessary information, that it was not his intention to propose any Resolution by which the opinion of the House would be taken as to the policy of the late Treaty with France on the subject of the Slave Trade. Sir, I greatly doubt the soundness of the policy of the noble Lord. If he has a strong opinion upon the subject, I think he ought to have disregarded the probability of his being in a minority. It is not a question whether the Resolution is to give me a triumph or not; but I think it was a more correct course, which men who have stood in the position of the noble Lord have taken, who, entertaining strong feelings on a question, have disregarded the probability of their being in a minority; but, for the purpose of producing an effect upon public opinion, they have recorded their opinions, and have not contented themselves with Motions for the names of witnesses, or the evidence taken in a case. That is not the course of men who have strong feelings upon a subject; and as the noble Lord was discourteous enough to inform me, in the course of his speech, that whatever I might say, he would not give credit to it, I am justified in informing the noble Lord that I do not believe the reasons he has given for not bringing forward his Resolution. I believe it was not the knowledge of the small minority that deterred the noble Lord—it was because he knew that on this question many of those who concur with him in general politics would be sure not to agree with him in his condemnation of the Convention lately signed between this country and France. I believe it will be found that many are of opinion that we have made no compromise of the honour, no sacrifice of the interests of this country; that we have done that which I shall attempt to show, if our object is to suppress the Slave Trade, will be a better instrument for the purpose than the Convention signed by the noble Lord. I shall not adopt an apologetic tone. I shall not say that in the circumstances of the public feeling of France, we were obliged to sacrifice this and that minor point. I shall demonstrate that the Convention which has been recently signed, presents a better prospect of cordial co-operation of the second great maritime Power in Europe with us in the suppression of the Slave Trade, than if we had refused to agree to this Commission, and rested on the Treaty of 1834. I rest my defence of this Commission not on the deference that was due to the excited state of public feeling in France. I consider it a cause of congratulation that we have substituted an efficient instrument for one that, in the present state of feeling in France, never could have been made efficient at all. I consider it no matter of apology but of congratulation, that we have now a better prospect of suppressing this odious traffic than any that has opened upon this country of late years. Allow me, Sir, before I come to that which is really the subject matter of controversy between the noble Lord and myself—allow me to state in what respect I agree with him. I agree with him, in thinking that it would be unfortunate if this country were to relax in its efforts for the suppression of the Slave Trade. It would be difficult to calculate the results of a total forbearance on the part of this country, and, of course, on the part of every other, from making vigorous efforts for the suppression of the Slave Trade on the coast of Africa. I believe that the trade would be increased in a very great degree: and when we look at the success which our former efforts have achieved, we ought not alone to look at the good we have accomplished; but we ought to bear in mind the extent of the evils and the calamities we have prevented. I am not sure if I concur with the noble Lord in thinking that the suppression of the Slave Trade would lead to the suppression of the status of slavery. I agree with the noble Lord in thinking that the suppression of the Slave Trade would have a material effect on the amelioration of the condition of the slave. If we could impress upon the mind of the slaveholders the knowledge that they would not have the means of increasing the number of their slaves by foreign supply, then, not from humane motives, but from the sordid motives by which slaveholders are actuated, they would provide better treatment at least for their female slaves, and possibly an amelioration in the condition of slaves in general. I wish to remind the House, that though the United States have suppressed the Slave Trade, yet slavery is still in existence in that country; and I do not believe that the extinction of the state of slavery in the United States will ever arise from the mere suppression of the Slave Trade. It may, and I believe must increase the attention of slaveholders to the breeding of slaves; but the mere suppression of the Slave Trade will not destroy slavery. I look to the extinction of the status of slavery in the United States with confidence, from the contact which the slaves are brought into with freedom, in the degree of illumination and knowledge which they must thence derive: but, above all, I can never believe that our example, and the condition of the free labourers in the West Indies, which must become known to them from the increasing intercourse which is sure to take place between those two parts of the world, our Colonial possessions and the United States—I can hardly believe that, with such an intercourse as this, slavery can stand as one of the permanent institutions of the United States. I regret to hear the tone and temper with which the noble Lord spoke of Portugal. I believe that Portugal is now zealous and cordial in co-operating with us for the suppression of the Slave Trade. The mere observance of the Treaties might be all that we could require; but it must be obvious that much of the success of those Treaties depends upon the cordiality with which they are gone into; and from the recent experience we have had of the conduct of Portugal, I think it is scarcely right of the noble Lord to say that all their cordiality is owing to compulsion. I think that by the removal of governors who were unfavourable to the due execution of the Treaty—by the promotion of naval officers who had shown a desire to carry out the Treaty—Portugal has shown a desire cordially and freely to concur with us. I trust the House will feel that the position in which I stand in replying to the noble Lord, without having had any precise notice of the object of his Motion, is one of some difficulty; because the correspondence to which the noble Lord has referred was not immediately conducted by myself. Of course upon all material points connected with the Slave Trade, I may be presumed to be informed; but the noble Lord has ranged through several volumes of the correspondence, going from one year to another, which makes it difficult for a person who did not himself conduct the correspondence, to answer him upon every point. The noble Lord has referred again—for I shall dispose of these matters before I come to the main point—the noble Lord has referred again to the negroes in Surinam. The noble Lord, with his usual complacency, and, perhaps, with a justifiable confidence in his own opinion, says "it is true that the Queen's Advocate has given a legal opinion, but I will venture to say that it is wrong in point of law." Now, without wishing to undervalue the legal skill of the noble Lord, it is clear that the Queen's Advocate is the person whom we ought to consult. [Viscount Palmerston: The Law Officers of the Crown.] The noble Lord says, as both have been consulted, that the law both of the Law Officers and of the Queen's Advocate, is wrong. The noble Lord must excuse me if, with all due deference to him, I, as a general rule, prefer the opinion of the Queen's Advocate upon questions of international law to that of the noble Lord. I stated this the other night when the subject was before mentioned; and I added, that as the noble Lord had stated that a number of slaves in Surinam were entitled to their freedom as British subjects, I was determined that no opinion of the Queen's Advocate, or of any other officer of the Crown, should prejudice the Government as to the course they would ultimately take; but I would take care that the grounds of the noble Lord's opinion should be well considered before any final resolve was come to; and, if on mature consideration, Her Majesty's Government saw cause to believe that an erroneous opinion had been given, I was determined that no person should continue to be deprived of that liberty to which he was entitled for the sake of a consistent adherence to such opinion. That promise I have fulfilled, and I have directed that that opinion shall be reconsidered; for I agree that the liberty of man, whether black or white, is far too serious a question to be made dependent upon anything like Ministerial consistency; and I say again, that if any opinion that has been given to the Government, and upon which the Government has acted, disentitling any man to that liberty which he is entitled to claim; so far from thinking it any shame to retract that opinion, I shall be proud to acknowledge the error, and to restore the man so unjustly detained in slavery to freedom. So much as to the case of the negroes of Surinam. Then, as to that of the Imaum of Muscat, and the relations of France with that Potentate. I do not deny the right of the noble Lord to introduce this subject, neither do I say that it is not important. The noble Lord said, at the beginning of his speech, that a Treaty was lately entered into between France and the Imaum of Muscat, which enabled France to take the subjects of the Imaum, and consign them to slavery; and he charitably supposes that the reason why France has not extended the operation of the Convention recently entered into with England to the eastern coast of Africa, was to enable her to carry on this traffic. Of course it is free to the noble Lord to speak of France in what terms he pleases; but he will permit me to say, that I do not think it conduces to the maintenance of amicable relations between this country and France, that he should seize upon every opportunity to speak of that country in such disparaging terms; and in making the statement I am now alluding to it, would have been no more than fair if the noble Lord had quoted the whole of the document on which he says it is founded. The noble Lord referred to a letter written by the Commissioner at the Cape of Good Hope, to show that France had made a Treaty with the Imaum of Muscat, to enable her to carry away the subjects of that Potentate, and place them in a state of slavery in the island of Bourbon. [An hon. Member: In the same state as the Hill Coolies.] But the Hill Coolies we do not admit to be in a state of positive slavery. Great care is taken for their protection, and unless precautions were taken, there would be great danger of abuse. But what is the statement in the letter to which the noble Lord has referred? It is to the effect that—"They had learned that slaves were brought to the island of Bourbon, but that there were no exports of slaves; but they had heard of a French ship of war, the commander of which had concluded a Treaty with the Imaum of Muscat, for the purpose of transporting the subjects of the latter as labourers into Bourbon."

I infer the noble Lord supposes that to mean to place them in a state of slavery. I do not mean to say that full inquiry ought not to be made whether that arrangement is altogether compatible with our Treaties with the Imaum of Muscat; but I think it was only proper that the noble Lord should have read the whole of it, when he quoted it to show that France was dooming the persons so transported from the territories of the Imaum, to slavery. The concluding portion of the extract which the noble Lord had omitted to read was this—I do not mean to say there might not be more opportunities for abuse in this arrangement than in that under which Hill Coolies are imported into our Colonies, nor do I mean to say that the transaction is one that can be justified; but what I say is, that the noble Lord, in making the charge, should have read the whole of the document. The letter says—

"Unfortunately, I have not been able to procure a copy of the instrument, but I believe it contains stipulations which take away all pretence for supposing that it involves any infraction of the Treaty entered into between England and the Imaum of Muscat."

The noble Lord read the first part of the letter, but he altogether overlooked the passage which stated that there were conditions inserted which took away all pretence of any infraction of our Treaties. The letter further stated—

"My informant states, that under the condition of this Treaty it is probable that the condition of the labourers so hired will be materially improved, as they are to be sent back after a time with the money they may have earned, and perhaps with the knowledge of some trade, and with habits of industry and civilization which will be of great advantage to them afterwards."

[Viscount Palmerston: I read that, and made a comment on it.] I beg the noble Lord's pardon. This part of the letter the noble Lord did not advert to, but he referred to the letter generally, and accused us of remissness, because we had not insisted on the observance of our Treaties with the Imaum of Muscat. I am bound to say it is one evil — compensated for by a superior amount of good no doubt—but it is one evil of the position in which we stand in our relations with other countries in regard to the suppression of the Slave Trade, that it is continually liable to involve us in angry correspondence with those countries. The noble Lord says we have shown tameness in our remonstrances. This is one of them, and as a specimen of that tame submission to Spain, and that unwillingness to offend her feelings, which the noble Lord says characterizes the policy of the present Government. Lord Aberdeen writes to Mr. Bulwer, the British Minister at Madrid, thus:—

"The bribes which the authorities of Cuba have for many years received for upholding the Slave Trade of that island have been well known, and have been pointed out to the Government of Spain, and they have been often urged to put a stop to these iniquities. The precise sum given for each slave, the officers among whom it was divided, and the proportion in which it was shared, were notorious. The Spanish Government have not been able to deny those facts, although they have asserted that it has not been from any neglect of duty on the part of the authorities that the Slave Trade was kept up. But it has been proved, that when the Government of Her Catholic Majesty appointed a person of honour and integrity to be Governor of Cuba, and one who undertook the high functions entrusted to him with other views than those of enriching himself and his associates by a corrupt connivance at the crimes which he was appointed to repress, that trade speedily declined, and indeed had almost ceased to exist. A change, however, was made in the government of the island, and the iniquitous traffic is again in full vigour, notoriously encouraged, and almost openly defended, by the man to whom Her Catholic Majesty's Government have confided the interests and honour of the Colony, and the duty of watching over the faithful discharge of an engagement solemnly entered into by the Crown of Spain. It is for the Spanish Government alone to consider what may be the consequences of a perseverance in such conduct on the part of its Colonial authorities, so far as the welfare of the Colony is concerned. Were it the sole object of Her Majesty's Government to see the liberation of the slaves in Cuba accomplished, no matter by what means, or at what cost of blood and social order, they could hardly wish a more certain course to be pursued than that which, during the past year, the Government at Madrid have permitted, if not sanctioned, in those officers. It is, however, the earnest prayer of Her Majesty's Government that the fearful catastrophe with which Cuba is threatened may yet be averted. But whatever measures with this view the Spanish Government may in its prudence adopt, the flagrant violations of the Treaties with Great Britain which are almost daily perpetrated in Cuba, and the equivocations and false statements with which the remonstrances of Her Majesty's servants have been met by the Representatives of the Spanish Crown, give Her Majesty's Government the right to require that effectual means shall be taken to put an end to these acts, and to prove that they are not committed under the authority of the Government at Madrid. It is the conviction of Her Majesty's Government, that the honourable observance of the Treaty of 1835 is impossible, unless the penal law prescribed by it shall be enacted and enforced, and unless General O'Donnell shall be recalled from the Government of Cuba."

That is the remonstrance we made to Spain in regard to the conduct of General O'Donnell. Unfortunately, it often unavoidably happens that the correspondence laid before Parliament in reference to the Slave Trade is incomplete. It frequently occurs that the countries with which we are in communication are so distant, that the correspondence upon any particular subject is not concluded at the end of the year, when the Papers are made up; and since I came into the House a despatch has been handed to me, written in 1845, on the subject to which the noble Lord has spoken, as having been brought in question by General O'Donnell—the right of our Consuls to make representations to the Governor of Cuba—and which shows that that subject has not been unattended to by the Government. But the communications made in 1845 are not included in the Papers before the House, which reach only to the end of 1844; and those Papers, taken singly, therefore, give but an imperfect view of the correspondence. And with regard to the case of the slaves in Surinam—that of the Imaum of Muscat—and with regard, also, to the conduct of General O'Donnell, and his charge of improper conduct on the part of our Consuls—I repeat that I have only a general knowledge of those transactions; and if, in the absence of the whole of the details, I do not give as full and as satisfactory an answer as may be desired, I trust the House will not suppose we have been neglectful of the honour or the interests of the country, or take up erroneous opinions from the insufficiency of the explanation I am in a condition to give. I now proceed to address myself to what I understand to be the main subject of the noble Lord's Motion. I never certainly expected that the noble Lord would persevere in calling for any expression of opinion on the part of the House upon the policy of Her Majesty's Government in regard to the recent Convention with France; but I did infer from the noble Lord's notice, that he intended to bring that subject under the attention of the House, and that that was the main object of his Motion. Now, Sir, in the first place, let me say again, that I have no apology to offer on the part of the Government in respect to that Convention. I believe that Convention is a wise and prudent measure, and that it furnishes you with a more efficacious instrument for suppressing the Slave Trade, through the kindly co-operation of France, than you would have had if that Convention had never been signed, and your Treaties only remained in force. The noble Lord has referred in strong terms to the refusal of France to ratify the Treaty of 1841 after she had signed it. Is, then, the noble Lord of opinion that that refusal on the part of France to ratify, after signing the Treaty, was a cause for war? [Viscount Palmerston: No.] The noble Lord says he does not consider it a sufficient cause for war; but he tells us that we tamely acquiesced in that refusal to ratify, and that we made no remonstrance to the French Government on the subject. Now the noble Lord must excuse me for saying that his statement in this respect is utterly and entirely without foundation. I agree with the noble Lord that the refusal to ratify was an act almost unprecedented; and an act calculated to establish a bad precedent for the future. I admit, it was an act against which we had a perfect right to remonstrate; but I agree with the noble Lord that it was not a cause for war. The question then is, did we protest against that act, and did we remonstrate with the Government of France on the subject? The noble Lord challenges me to an inquiry, as to what was the cause of the refusal of the Executive Government of France to ratify. He says the clamour in the French Chamber against the ratification was a purely factitious one; and again, though the popular assembly of France in three successive years—in 1842, in 1843, and again in the year 1844—coincided by a unanimous vote in their objection to ratify, and required that efforts should be made by the Government to modify the existing Convention as to the Right of Search, the noble Lord states that this expression of opinion on the part of the Chamber, was nothing more than the clamour of the slave traders, who were anxious still to be able to carry on the Slave Trade. I have heard the noble Lord say that the Slave Trade was extinguished in France—that the subjects of France do not now carry it on. I believe that is the fact; and I do think the noble Lord is doing great injustice to the feelings of that country—erroneous and unfounded as I believe that feeling to have been—when he states that the only and the sole ground of their objection, on the part of the French Chamber, to the Right of Search, and the Treaty of 1841, repeated, as it had been, during three successive years, was founded on a desire to carry on this infamous traffic. I agree with the noble Lord in thinking that the feeling of France against the Right of Search was unfounded; but I do not concur with him as to the source from which that feeling arose. I believe it arose rather out of the irritated state of the public mind, occasioned by the events in Syria, than out of any desire to carry on the Slave Trade. The noble Lord says, that in 1841 I showed a disposition to support the then Government in its Syrian policy; and the noble Lord has also referred to the cordial aid I gave him in carrying through his measures for suppressing the Slave Trade. The noble Lord only does us justice. I was not disposed in 1842 to inquire too minutely as to how the state of things, which it was the object of the noble Lord to meet, had arisen; but having aided him, as he says, in his measures for removing the difficulties that had occurred, I think it is scarcely fair for the noble Lord now to turn round and make that support a matter of charge against me. I will not, as I said, inquire how that feeling in the public mind in France, which led to the non-ratification of the Treaty of 1841 arose—not that I want to insinuate any blame to the noble Lord—but we found that such a feeling did pervade the public mind, and was expressed on the part of the popular assembly of that country, and that the Executive Government of France acting, as we believed, honestly and with good faith towards Her Majesty's Government, did experience a difficulty on account of that popular feeling in ratifying that Treaty. I believe it was the desire of the French Government honestly and fairly to ratify it, if they could have done so. It would have been inconsistent with their dignity, and with their position, to have sought means to evade the ratification of that Treaty. I believe the cause the French Government assigned was the real and honest one; and in a country where the Executive Government is necessarily controlled by the acts and opinions of the popular assembly and popular opinion, they had not the power of performing that which I think they should have performed. The question would have been altered if, having signed the Treaty, they had sought the means of escaping by subterfuge its ratification. The question for us to consider was, was the reason given by the French Government for the non-ratification an honest one? I believe it was; and though we did right to remonstrate if it had been a case in which a recourse to hostilities would have been justifiable, it still would have been an element in our consideration whether the Executive Government of France was acting honestly towards this country, or merely assigning a pretence for not ratifying, after having signed, the Treaty, in their refusal after the debate in the French Chamber. After the signature of the Treaty, M. Guizot proposed that the protocols should be left open, and that some modification should be admitted. To this we gave a positive refusal. The noble Lord said we tamely acquiesced, and offered no remonstrance. I cannot think that any tameness was evinced, nor could we have stated our objections in stronger terms and plainer terms than we used. Lord Aberdeen, writing to Lord Cowley at Paris, on the 12th of February, 1842, speaking of the non-ratification of the Treaty by France, says:—

peared to Her Majesty's Government to be pregnant with mischief, and more injurious to the exercise of the Royal prerogative in France than anything that had occurred of late years; it would shake the confidence of Foreign States in the engagements of the French Government; and the inconsistency was the more striking inasmuch as the Cabinet of the Tuileries had joined in the invitation to the three other Powers to become parties to the Treaty."

If the noble Lord had penned that remonstrance, could he have communicated it in more emphatic, and at the same time in more dignified language? Unless we should have been justified in taking hostile proceedings, all threats and all menaces were out of the question. We stated that we would not be parties to the transaction, that we would not acquiesce in it, that we thought it dangerous, and we remonstrated against it; but if we did not resort to hostilities any menace would have been unseemly and improper. Lord Aberdeen went on to say—

"The proposed alterations in themselves were confessedly of little value—"

For there had been slight concessions proposed with the view of conciliating public feeling in France, and, by means of this conciliation, obtaining the ratification of the Treaty.

"The proposed alterations in themselves were confessedly of little value; but they became of weight from their origin and from the motives which led to them: what M. Guizot called national susceptibilities as to calumny and injustice, and which we called unfounded imputations."

Could we have said more? Was there any tameness in this? It was possible that we might have obtained the ratification of the Treaty by a sacrifice of something to the wounded honour of France; but we said that "We will make no such concession, we feel that our cause is a just one, and we refuse to make the concession." Lord Aberdeen said—

"After the criminations which were made in such an assembly as the Chamber of Deputies of an interested disposition in the course we proposed, if there were only a suspicion entertained, it was impossible they could long be continued; and if they were the consequence of a hostile feeling, it could not be mitigated by concession. At all events, we could not purchase the ratification by these apparent concessions."

Now, I appeal to the noble Lord himself whether, upon the refusal of the French Government to ratify the Treaty, the grounds on which he stated that we abstained from all remonstrance have not been completely demolished. The French Government, however, refused to ratify that Treaty; France would not be a party to the Treaty of 1841, which she herself had signed. The three other Powers which signed that Treaty did ratify it; and the Treaty was still binding on the four Powers who were parties to it. The refusal of France to ratify that Treaty left the relations between this country and France, so far as Slave Trade Conventions were concerned, dependent upon two Conventions—the Convention of the year 1831, and the Convention of the year 1833. I need not, for the present purpose, allude more particularly to the Convention of 1833; it was supplementary to the Treaty of 1831; there were important provisions in the Convention of 1833, calculated to facilitate the execution of the former Treaty; but it did not increase the power within the zones in which the former Treaty could be exercised. The Treaty of 1831 gave a Right of Search, which we have been enabled to exercise, which we are now able to exercise, and which we shall be able to exercise till the recent Convention shall come into force. I appeal, however, to the House most strongly, and I shall be able to demonstrate, that the provisions of the recent Convention will prove more efficacious for the suppression of the Slave Trade, than a mere adherence to the provisions of the Convention of the year 1831. I presume it will be admitted that the Right of Search is not for itself, and per se, a good to this country. I presume it will be admitted that the value of the Right of Search depends upon its efficacy in the suppression of the Slave Trade. We do not ask for this right as a proof of our maritime supremacy—we do not ask for this right as conferring any advantage on our Colonies—we do not ask for it as giving us any triumph over France. The only efficacy in the institution is its power in suppressing the Slave Trade. If we adhere to the Right of Search, it will not be denied that its exercise is calculated to provoke irritated feelings; and, if we can substitute some other measure which is, at least, as effectual, is there a man in this country who would rigidly insist on maintaining this Right of Search, and refuse an equivalent? What, then, is the Convention of the year 1831? The Convention of the year 1831 established a reciprocal Right of Search between this country and France; but it was not an universal Right of Search; it was limited, on the west coast of Africa, to that part of the coast which extends from Cape Verd, being, I believe, in about the 15th degree of north latitude, to the 10th degree of south latitude; but that part of the coast was not the whole of the west coast from which the Slave Trade was carried on. The Slave Trade with the Brazils is carried on several degrees to the south of the 10th degree. The Right of Search, then, was imperfect in this respect, that it was not a reciprocal Right of Search along the whole west coast of Africa, which is the seat of the Slave Trade. The Convention of 1831 gave no Right of Search on the east coast of Africa. The Convention of 1831 did not enable the British cruisers to interfere in the slightest degree with the transhipment of slaves from the territories of the Imaum of Muscat. So far as the east coast of Africa is concerned, there was no Right of Search. I will state fully what the right was. The right extended for twenty degrees round the Island of Madagascar, and it did extend also to certain districts on the coasts of Cuba, of Porto Rico, and of the Brazils. Did it, however, stipulate that the French should be bound to keep a certain number of vessels on the coast? No such thing. Warrants authorizing the Right of Search were to be issued by each country to the vessels of the other; but this country was not allowed to have more than double the number of warrants for French vessels. Now, suppose France should decline to apply for more than four warrants, undoubtedly this would be an evasion of the Treaty, unless there were strong grounds; but the Treaty was defective in that respect, because it limited the number of our own vessels to double those which France might think fit to keep for this purpose. The Treaty, therefore, placed the exercise of the powers under it entirely in the hands of France. It left France to determine the number of vessels which she would keep on the coast, and it precluded us from having more than double the number. Observe also, that the warrants are to be annually renewable. So that the right was given every year to France to fix, at her discretion, the number of vessels. It is important, in discussing the present Treaty, to refer to the correspondence between the noble Lord and the French Government, at the period when the Treaty was made. The noble Lord, in the year 1831, asked the French Government to consent to an unlimited Right of Search. The French Government positively refused to accede to such a proposition. These were the reasons asserted by the French Ministry for that refusal. The noble Lord proposed to the French Government to concede to this country the exercise of a Right of Search, which was to be reciprocal to both countries. On the 7th of April, 1831, Count Sebastiani, in answering the proposal conveyed by Lord Granville said—

"The French Government had already repeatedly declared its reasons for refusing acquiescence in this proposal, and these reasons had lost none of their weight or importance. The exercise of a Right of Search in the time of peace was essentially contrary to the principle of the French law, and it would wound public opinion in France on a ground on which it was very sensitive."

The noble Lord then directed Lord Granville to furnish the French Government with proofs of the great atrocities and cruelties with which the Slave Trade was carried on; and the French Government was invited to acquiesce in a qualified Right of Search. The French Government had, in that very year passed a law, authorizing the infliction of a punishment, and a very severe punishment, on all French subjects who should be concerned in the Slave Trade. It was admitted by Lord Granville and by the noble Lord, that so far as French subjects were concerned, that law would be effectual, and I believe it has been found effectual. The terms in which the noble Lord proposed a modified Right of Search were these:—

"His Majesty's Government are of opinion that a modified proposition on this subject might be made, which would sufficiently accomplish the object in view, without conflicting too much with the prejudices of the French naval service."

He went on, therefore, to instruct Lord Granville as follows:—

"You will therefore propose that instead of establishing a general and permanent Right of Reciprocal Search, that each Government shall furnish to the cruisers of the other employed upon the African station, documents or instructions empowering them to search vessels, not being ships of war, within certain degrees of latitude and longitude. These documents might be limited as to duration in time and extension of space. They might be given for three years, subject to renewal at the end of that time, or revocation during that period, should any abuse be found to result from them. It appears to His Majesty's Government that this partial and temporary experiment, which would still leave the question of Right of Search at all times under the control of the two Governments, would prove extremely useful, and would either remove objections to a permanent arrangement, or render it unnecessary."

Instead of three years' duration for the warrants as proposed, their duration was limited to one year, thus giving to the French Government annually a discretion with respect to the issue of these warrants; and also a power of limiting the number of cruisers employed by the British Government, by limiting the number of cruisers which they (the French Government) employed. That letter was dated the 7th April, 1831, and on the 30th of April, the Convention was signed, the period of one year being substituted for three years. The noble Lord did, at the same time, make another and very important proposition to the French Government. The noble Lord now finds it convenient to depreciate the efficacy of the French squadron on the coast of Africa; but the noble Lord then urged on the French Government, if they would not consent to a general Right of Search, that they should send cruisers to the coast of Africa to co-operate with us; and these are the terms in which he then spoke of the probable efficacy of that instrument in suppressing the Slave Trade. The noble Lord said—

"If the objections to the Right of Search should, unfortunately, prove insurmountable, that then the French Government should be pressed strongly for some French ships of war being sent, without loss of time to the coast of Africa, to enforce the laws on all vessels bearing the French flag. To this proposition His Majesty's Government could not anticipate any objection; with such a squadron His Majesty's ships would be ordered cordially to co-operate; and that there was no reason to doubt that the united efforts of France and England, so exerted, would accomplish the object to which the two countries had mutually bound themselves by solemn engagements."

Thus the noble Lord told the French Government that the Convention of 1831 was a partial and temporary experiment; and he also told them, that if the French Government sent to the coast of Africa a sufficient quantity of cruisers with which our cruisers might co-operate, there was little doubt that, by the means of their joint efforts, the two countries might be enabled to attain the object they had in view. It was such a Convention, with such an explanation of motives, that we should have been left with in case no new Convention had been formed; and I now proceed to contrast the advantages we have, under the present Convention, with those we possessed under the former Convention. I admit to the noble Lord that we have relinquished, when this new Treaty comes into force, the Right of Search. For what was the Right of Search efficacious? Was it efficacious for the suppression of the Slave Trade carried on by French ships? I assert that the Slave Trade on the west coast of Africa, carried on by French ships, is at an end. It can be truly asserted, I believe, that French subjects do not carry on the Slave Trade in French ships. If they do, I admit that under this new Treaty we lose a power which we had under the Convention of 1831; but one of the reasons for adopting this new Convention is, that the Slave Trade carried on by the subjects of France, in French ships, is at an end. I make that assertion on these grounds:—According to returns of vessels condemned for carrying on the Slave Trade, furnished by a gentleman with whose name and abilities the noble Lord is acquainted (Mr. Rothery), the number of vessels condemned since the year 1819, amounts to no less than 6,398; and of these there are only thirteen which were French vessels, belonging to French subjects, carrying on the Slave Trade. Of these thirteen cases, eleven took place between 1819 and 1831. Since the latter period, only two cases fell within the cognizance of Mr. Rothery, of French vessels carrying on the Slave Trade, and which, under the Right of Search, we should have been enabled to visit and capture. They were called respectively the Senegambia and the Marie Anne. The Slave Trade carried on by the French upon the west coast of Africa, then, I contend, is at an end; and I believe that, in speaking of the Portuguese Treaty in 1839, the noble Lord himself admitted as much. I may add that Mr. Sturge, who recently visited the French Colony of Martinique, states that no slaves had been imported there since the accession of His Majesty the present King of the French. I now come to the abuse of the French flag; and I admit that, having abolished the Right of Search, we ought to be cautious, in order that the French flag may not be abused by being assumed by the vessels of other nations carrying on the Slave Trade. What are the precautions we have got against this abuse? Let us compare the Convention of 1845 with the Convention of 1831. As I said before, the Convention of 1831 was limited to a portion only of the west coast of Africa, where the Slave Trade is carried on. Its operation extended only from Cape Verd to the 10th degree of south latitude; whereas the present Convention includes the whole of the west coast of Africa, from Cape Verd to the 16½ degree of south latitude. This includes the whole of the coast where the Slave Trade is carried on; for between the 16th or 17th degree of south latitude and the Cape of Good Hope, there is no opportunity of carrying on that trade. Consequently, there are subject to the operation of this new Convention, 6½ degrees of the west coast of Africa more than were subject to the operation of the Convention of 1831. What is our protection as to the abuse of the French flag by other parties? Have we conceded that right which we claim of visit, for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not vessels really have the national character which they assume? In this new Convention we have it admitted distinctly by the Government of France, that that right which the American Government was disposed to question, is a right sanctioned by the maritime law of nations. The instructions we have given to our cruisers convey distinct authority to exercise that Right of Visit; and these instructions are embodied in this Convention. They are referred to in the Eighth Article, and form an essential part in the theory of the whole agreement. There is, therefore, an admission on the part of the French that the cruisers of this country, seeing a ship under French colours, under suspicious circumstances, have a right, unaffected by the Convention, of ascertaining the national character of that vessel—[Viscount Palmerston: There is nothing new in that—we had that right already.] We have thus the means of preventing any abuse of the French flag. Then let us look to the instructions given to the French cruisers. The French law of piracy is even a stricter one than our own. The noble Lord spoke of vessels carrying double sets of papers—double commissions from different Powers—[Sir C. Napier: Quite a common practice.] The hon. and gallant Gentleman says it is quite a common practice. Well, by the French law, it is a piracy. The noble Lord has spoken of a suspicious ship, not being a French vessel, but carrying French colours: our Right of Visit, in such a case, is admitted by France. It is a right that we have long claimed, but which is only now formally admitted; and the noble Lord knows well that to claim is one thing, and to have admitted is quite another. What are the French instructions given to the French officers? They are similar to those given to the British officers. They authorize French officers, seeing a vessel bearing a flag under suspicious circumstances, to board it, and ascertain its national character. But the French instructions go further, and declare that persons engaged in the Slave Trade are, generally speaking, persons who commit an act of piracy; they state that by the French law, it is piracy for persons to commit depredations from armed vessels, to have double sets of papers, &c. The French instructions, therefore, authorize the French officers to apply their law of piracy to the act of slavers. We are to have, under this new Convention, a joint force belonging to the two nations, amounting to not less than fifty-two vessels, and they are to act in accordance with such instructions as I have explained. I quite admit that the French cruisers will not have the same power as the British cruisers, as they have not the Right of Search with the countries chiefly carrying on the Slave Trade—Brazil and Spain. Still the French cruisers had before no Right of Search over Brazilian, Spanish, or Portuguese vessels, and therefore they now stand, in this respect, in no worse situation than heretofore; but as far as the abuse of the French flag is concerned, will not the assistance of twenty-six French cruisers, co-operating with us, provide an effectual precaution against the assumption of the French flag by the slavers of other countries? The noble Lord says that he cordially approves of those parts of the new Convention which propose that Treaties should be entered into between the commanders of the squadrons with the native princes, in order to enable them to destroy the baracoons, and to prevent the carrying on, upon shore, of the Slave Trade. When these Treaties shall have been formed, the French cruisers will be enabled to give most material aid to our cruisers in carrying them into effect. Is it not a fact, with respect to the suppression of the Slave Trade, that the whole burden and expense has fallen on this country? And what is the noble Lord's own account? Has he not stated that the reason we failed is the not having a sufficient force on the coast of Africa? He said that events are constantly occurring which compel us to diminish our force on the coast of Africa; and, during the diminution of the force, an encouragement and a stimulus are given to the trade. Surely the addition of twenty-six vessels in aid of our squadron will supply that deficiency; fifty-two vessels being the minimum of the joint force to be placed on the coast of Africa. The noble Lord said, that during the Chinese war, during the dispute with New Grenada, and again when it was thought necessary by the present Government, to send a force to the River Plata, we removed vessels from the coast of Africa, and that, during their removal, the efforts made for the suppression of the Slave Trade were ineffectual. Well, then, against this evil we have taken the precaution in this new Treaty with France of providing that France shall bear one half of the burden in suppressing the Slave Trade, and that there shall never be less than fifty-two vessels engaged in blockading the coast of Africa, whilst the commanders shall endeavour to form Treaties with the native princes. Having formed those Treaties, and having then the right, under the law of nations, to interfere, the commanders will be able to give effect to them by the joint and cordial co-operation of the two greatest maritime powers in Europe. The noble Lord asked me some questions as to particular Articles of the Treaty lately concluded. He began with the preamble. The noble Lord stated, that the preamble of the Treaty of 1845 was most disgraceful to this country, because it began with this recital—

"Her Majesty the Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and His Majesty the King of the French, considering that the Conventions of the 30th of November, 1831, and the 22nd of March, 1833, have effected their object in preventing the use of the English and French flags in carrying on the Slave Trade, but that this odious traffic still exists, and that the said Conventions are insufficient to ensure its complete suppression, His Majesty the King of the French having expressed his desire to adopt more effectual measures for the suppression of the Slave Trade than those contemplated in the said Conventions; and Her Majesty the Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland being anxious to co-operate for the attainment of this object, they have agreed to conclude a new Convention."

The noble Lord says it is disgraceful to admit that the existence of these Conventions have not had the effect of suppressing the Slave Trade. Now, it would be rather difficult to insert and put on record that France had carried on the Slave Trade, and that we had not. It would be a difficult matter to draw that distinction. But what does the noble Lord say to his own Convention of 1831? Why, the noble Lord, in that year, knowing that no efficacious measures were required for the suppression of the Slave Trade carried on by British subjects, committed precisely the same error, if it be an error, which we are charged with having fallen into in 1845. In fact, the noble Lord, by the wording of his own preamble, made it difficult for us to use different language from that employed by him in 1831. The Convention of 1831 was not required for the suppression of the Slave Trade carried on by British subjects. That had already been abolished and put an end to by law; but notwithstanding such being the case, the noble Lord had, in treating with another country, thought it courteous to place the common object upon the same footing. In the preamble of the Convention of 1831 he states that the countries of Great Britain and France, being desirous of rendering more effectual the means of suppression hitherto in force against the criminal traffic in slaves, have deemed it expedient to negotiate and conclude a Convention for the attainment of so salutary an object. The preamble was thus couched, and the Convention which it began went on to state, that therefore mutual Right of Search was conceded, such right being necessary for the suppression of the Slave Trade. Then the noble Lord put a question to me as to the meaning of the Third Article of the Convention, to which he seems to attach great importance. The noble Lord is particularly desirous that I should explain the meaning of it. Now, I think I can explain it to his entire satisfaction. The noble Lord asks whether the object of the Third Article is to prevent British commercial vessels from plying in certain harbours. The Third Article provides that certain stations shall be selected and defined, and

"That the care thereof shall be committed to English and French cruisers, jointly or separately, as may be deemed most expedient, provided always, that in case of a station being specially committed to the charge of cruisers of either nation, the cruisers of the other nation may, at any time, enter the same for the purpose of exercising the rights respectively belonging to them for the suppression of the Slave Trade."

Now, I will tell the noble Lord what the object of that Article is, and I anticipate his entire approval of its insertion. It will be desirable to assign those stations to France nearest her own possessions, and to give to British cruisers the same advantage; but it is necessary to stipulate that we should have the right of entering the French stations, because we have more efficacious means of suppressing the Slave Trade than France. It may happen that on the stations assigned to French cruisers, Spanish, Portuguese, or Brazilian slave ships may enter, which the cruisers of France have not the power to search. We have that power. It became necessary, therefore, to stipulate that, though different stations should be primarily assigned to the cruisers of the two Powers, yet the assignation of a particular station to the French cruisers is not to prevent our cruisers, who have superior power, from entering on those stations, in order, if necessary, that the Right of Search should be exercised by us as to vessels over which the French have no corresponding power. Now, I trust I have explained that Article in a way which will be satisfactory to the noble Lord, and have shown him that the reservation was not intended to interfere with the pursuits of legitimate commerce, but only to enable us (after certain stations were assigned to the cruisers of each nation) to have a full power of entering the stations of the other Power, for the purpose of putting in force our superior powers. I am not aware that any other question was mooted by the noble Lord in connexion with the Treaty. [Viscount Palmerston: The Ninth Article.] That is a mere formal engagement, that neither Power will, under any circumstances, be concerned in the Slave Trade. Now, supposing the noble Lord's suspicions to be just as to the Imaum of Muscat, this becomes by no means an immaterial portion of the Convention. The noble Lord has been engaged in showing that France has been carrying on the Slave Trade, and yet he objects to a public engagement that each country shall within its own territories—within the Colonies it now possess, or may hereafter possess—enter into a reciprocal stipulation that under no circumstances shall the Slave Trade be carried on. I admit with regard to us—I trust with respect to France—such a stipulation is perfectly unnecessary; but if I doubted the policy of inserting it in the Convention, the speech of the noble Lord would go far to convince me that it was neither needless nor superfluous. But I suppose the noble Lord will not contend that it would be possible to exact such a stipulation from France, and yet that we should not be prepared to enter into a corresponding engagement. So far from implying any dishonour to this country, I think, if there is any well-grounded suspicion that the Slave Trade may be carried on in any part of the dominions of France, temporary or permanent, that a great public object is gained, if we obtain the admission of a positive engagement, that under no circumstances shall the Slave Trade be carried on—that the carrying it on shall not be merely the infraction of the municipal law, but of a positive stipulation entered into with this country. I, therefore, contend, that we have, under the new Convention, increased the means of suppressing the Slave Trade beyond those which could be exercised under the old Treaty. We have got this Convention with the cordial good will of France. We have assurances of its cordial co-operation, which we never should have had under the old Treaty. The provisions of this Treaty regard a more extended line of coast than that under the old; but add to that the consideration that these provisions are entered into with the cordial good will, and are to be carried into effect with the cordial concert and co-operation of France; then (giving due weight to this consideration) we have an instrument for the suppression of the Slave Trade more powerful and available than we should have had under the defective instrument of 1831. The noble Lord has asked me for the evidence taken before this Convention. The noble Lord treats with utter disregard the statement I made that I could not produce that evidence with a due regard to the interests of the public service. The noble Lord has often given a similar refusal; and I never treated his declaration with that disregard which he exercises towards me. I do assure him that I have no motive whatever in withholding that evidence on account of the supposed importance it might show was attached to the Right of Search. But this evidence was given by eight officers, English and French, who were examined before the Convention with regard to the measures it would be wise to adopt on the coast of Africa; as to the particular parts of the coast where the cruisers of the two countries should be stationed, and where the trade was most carried on; the nature of the engagements it might be desirable to enter into with native Powers; the mode of carrying them into effect, and the secrecy necessary to be observed; and these being mainly and principally the matters to which that evidence refers, I cannot, consistently with the interests of the public service, consent to produce it. Therefore it is that I feel compelled by a performance of my duty, and not from the unworthy motives which the noble Lord chooses to attribute to me, to adhere to the refusal which I gave in answer to a question of the noble Lord, and to withhold from the knowledge of the public the evidence given by the officers who were examined. If the noble Lord thinks that any object can be gained by giving the names of the officers, I have not the slightest hesitation in stating them. There were five English and three French officers engaged in this investigation, and I am bound to say that the evidence they gave was not the foundation of this Treaty, for their evidence mainly referred to particulars with respect to which I adhere to the opinion that it would be inconsistent with my duty to present them to the House. Now, I entreat the House to bear in mind—if you want authority on the subject—who were the parties to whom the consideration of this question was committed, and by whom this Convention was signed. They were two men standing in their respective countries in the highest rank among public men for ability, for integrity, for high private character; but, above all, they were distinguished from most men on this account, that they have throughout their lives been remarkable for persevering and vigorous efforts, at any sacrifice, to combat and control the detestable traffic carried on in the blood of our fellow men. The two men who considered this question, and signed this Convention, have been influenced by no party or political considerations. Dr. Lushington, during the time he acted in public life, was opposed to the views of Her Majesty's present Government. The Duc de Broglie has for a long period separated himself from party in France, and has never shown the slightest desire to sacrifice his private opinions to any party. The Duc de Broglie, if any man, had an interest in maintaining the Convention of '33. It was during his occupation of the Foreign Department that the Treaty of '33, entered upon for the purpose of giving effect to that of 1831, was signed. If the Duc de Broglie has been remarkable for any act of interference in public or political matters of late years, it has been with reference to the cause of education in his own country, or to the suppression of the Slave Trade. During the whole of his political life, opposed to Her Majesty's Government, Dr. Lushington has been chiefly remarkable (more so than any man now living, and ranking in this respect with Clarkson, Wilberforce, and the late Sir F. Buxton) for his successful efforts to mitigate the hard lot of the slave, and to prevent the continuance of the abominable traffic of the Slave Trade. These two men signed that Convention, which no earthly consideration would have induced them to sign, but the firm persuasion that they were placing in the hands of their respective Governments more powerful means of suppressing the Slave Trade than any which previously existed. This Convention comes recommended to this House, so far as authority is concerned, by the highest authorities by which it could be stamped. It comes recommended to the House by the application of reason, by contrasting its provisions with those of preceding Treaties; it comes recommended still more powerfully by this consideration, that you have every assurance that in carrying into effect its provisions, you will have the cordial concert and co-operation of the most powerful maritime Power of Europe next to our own; whereas, if you choose to rely, instead of this Convention, on the letter of the Treaty of 1831, depend on it you will not have that cordial co-operation which is the life and soul of engagements of this kind. You have a right to hold France to the literal execution of that Treaty; but, in my opinion, the example of France, the concert and co-operation between France and England, will add weight and effect to the practical execution of measures for the intended suppression of the Slave Trade, which you will look for in vain to the letter of the Treaty; if the feeling of a great nation, if the feeling of its Legislature, if the feeling of the public mind, runs counter to it; if it throws its sympathy, not on the side of those who desire the suppression of the Slave Trade, but of those by whom it is carried on; if it mingles up some feeling of national pride and honour in resisting the Right of Search, you may claim and execute that Treaty. But I look forward with more confidence to the cordial and harmonious concert of the two countries, than to the letter of engagements opposed to the general feeling of one of the contracting parties, which, though they may be strictly and honourably carried into effect, I believe, in the present feeling of France, cannot be enforced in that spirit and temper which can alone give effect to engagements of this kind.

Mr. Sheil: Though the right hon. Gentleman entered upon the discussion of a wide range of topics, yet "the old and new lobby" question before the House is narrowed to this point—Why has not the evidence been produced? The right hon. Gentleman dwelt much on the Treaty with the Imaum of Muscat; but it was with much surprise I heard him read the concluding paragraph of that part which he cited as to the transfer of slaves along the coast to Zanzibar. The words I refer to are these:—

"We beg to state, we have directed the following authorities, viz., the Superintendent of the Indian Navy, the Collector of Customs at Bombay, the Senior Magistrate of Police, and the Resident in the Persian Gulf, immediately to institute a scrutinizing inquiry into the correctness or otherwise of this report; and the result will, as soon as known to this Government, be communicated for the information of your Committee. We have also made a similar reference on this subject to Captain Hamerton, who, as reported in our separate despatch of this date, is now at Bombay, on his way to Zanzibar, in fulfilment of certain instructions with which this Government has been furnished by the Government of India."

With respect to Cuba, the right hon. Gentleman read a despatch of strong, almost peremptory language. The date of that despatch respecting the habits of acquisition which General O'Donnell had contracted, was, I believe, in February, 1844. A year has elapsed; and though the dismissal of General O'Donnell was demanded by Lord Aberdeen, he is at this moment Governor of Cuba. So that, notwithstanding the strong tone of remonstrance, it was not attended with any practical efficacy as regards the Spanish Government; and the menace of our Foreign Secretary does not appear to have fallen on the ears of General O'Donnell with any high degree of apprehension. To turn, however, from General O'Donnell, I must say, there was one assertion in my noble Friend's speech which struck me forcibly, and for an answer to which I waited anxiously, if not impatiently. My noble Friend stated that it was not only currently reported, but universally believed, that the officers who were examined before the Mixed Commission, gave it as their opinion that the surrender of the Right of Search would be most prejudicial. No contradiction had been given to that statement. My noble Friend is entitled to call for the evidence which refers to that point, and he only asks for extracts. The right hon. Gentleman says, that much of the evidence relates to the state of the coast of Africa, to the regulations of England and France in reference to the stations of the cruisers; and he added, it would be inconvenient to the public service to produce that part. It is not inconsistent with his public duty to give us that part which relates to the exercise of the Right of Search—the real point at issue. Instead of that ratiocination which the right hon. Gentleman has so laboriously pursued as to the comparative advantages of the last Convention over that of '31 — instead of the encomiums which he pronounced on the Duc de Broglie, and his well-deserved eulogy of Dr. Lushington—it would be much more satisfactory to give us the evidence which we want. It is, therefore, a most remarkable circumstance that that portion of the evidence is omitted. The object of the right hon. Gentleman's speech was, to show that the Convention of 1845 was much better than the Treaties of 1831 and 1833. The Convention is perfect, according to his account; the Treaty of 1831 was lame and impotent. But mark the difference—set forth in the very head of the Convention itself. The Treaties of 1831 and 1833 have succeeded. You tell us, that by the Treaty of 1831, we had only ten degrees of latitude to the south of the line, and fifteen north of it, and that now you have got six more on the coast of Africa. But why expatiate on the benefits of a Convention, the results of which are yet merely conjectural, when, having proved the success of the Treaty of 1831, you are giving up the instrument the efficacy of which has been demonstrated, and by which the French Slave Trade has been put down; and are substituting for that which has succeeded, one respecting the success of which, after all, you can only indulge in flattering anticipations? I think that simple statement must strike the common sense of the people of this country, to which my noble Friend has appealed, infinitely more than any comparison of the geographical limits to which the Treaty of Convention of 1831, and the present Convention, extend. But I do not fly from the comparison. In the course of the right hon. Gentleman's speech, my hon. and gallant Friend behind me once or twice exclaimed, "The West Indies!" The Treaty of 1831 extended to the West Indies—mark that. The Convention is limited to the coast of Africa. The right hon. Gentleman, when he heard the exclamation, said that he should come to that point; but he did not do so. He did not attempt to defend the present Convention for that omission. For that part of the case there may be a defence on the other side of the House; but if there be, it was left to some one else. There is this great difference between the Treaty of 1831 and the Convention just concluded, that the former gave the Right of Search in the West Indies, on the whole coasts of Cuba and the Brazils—gave it at the points where the Slave Trade rages in its direst cruelty. The right hon. Gentleman said that the Convention would extend to Madagascar, and that the Treaty of 1831 did not extend to the eastern coast of Africa. Why, every one knows that one of the best provisions of that Treaty was, that it did extend to the eastern coast of Africa, where an immense Slave Trade was carried on. In a geographical comparison between the Treaty of 1831 and the Convention of 1845, we find immense geographical advantages on the side of the former Treaty. The facts connected with those Treaties are plain and indisputable. In 1842, such was the importance attached by the right hon. Gentleman to the extension of the Right of Search secured by the Treaty of 1841, that he introduced a paragraph in the head and front of the Queen's Speech, in which he stated that that Treaty would be maintained. It was made a matter of almost ostentatious commemoration. The Queen's words, spoken on the 3rd of February, 1842, were—

"It is with great satisfaction that I inform you that I have concluded with the Emperor of Austria, the King of the French, the King of Prussia, and the Emperor of Russia, a Treaty for the more effectual suppression of the Slave Trade, which, when the ratifications shall have been exchanged, will be communicated to Parliament."

A Member of Her Majesty's Government, the Earl of Dalhousie, now the President of the Board of Trade, stated in his speech, as a probable result of that Treaty, the total extinction of the Slave Trade. That right hon. Gentlemen was pleased then to state, that, so far from the Government having tamely acquiesced in the non-ratification of that Treaty, Lord Aberdeen had, in the month of February, remonstrated upon the violation of the engagements into which the French had entered. Certainly, the language held was remarkably strong; and it appears, that when the ratification of that Treaty was declined by the French Government, the right hon. Gentleman thought it inconsistent with his declaration to Parliament to give way in the slightest degree. But does it not follow that, if you were not to make any concessions respecting the Treaty of 1841, if no modification was to be submitted to, much less should you have surrendered the Treaties of 1831 and 1833, on which that of 1841 was founded? If it was a settled matter that you would not permit the slightest change, the smallest modification, to be made in the Treaty of 1841, what defence have you for abandoning that of 1831? You would not allow the superstructure raised on the Treaty of 1831 to be touched, not the slightest component part of it to be disturbed; and yet, afterwards, allow the basis on which that superstructure was raised to be upturned from its foundations. M. Thiers and M. Guizot, when they declared that the Treaty of 1841 could not be ratified, at all events concurred in saying, that the faith of France was pledged to the faithful fulfilment of the Treaties of 1831 and 1833. One year afterwards, the Duke de Broglie, whose name has been so often mentioned in this debate, delivered a speech in the French Chamber of Peers, in which he stated that he was the party whose hand had signed the Treaties of 1831 and 1833, that the last Treaty was entered into at a time when great obligations had been conferred by England on France; and that England, in return for those obligations, asked nothing more than the employment of additional means for the extinction of this odious traffic. That speech contained a complete defence of the Treaty of 1831, as a Treaty just, in all respects equitable, and founded on principles of perfect reciprocity — one from which no evil had arisen; but, on the contrary, the greatest good. Such was the panegyric pronounced by the French Commissioner on the Treaty of 1831. I know the high character of the Duke de Broglie; I know the career of Dr. Lushington, with whose name eloquence, learning, high-mindedness, generosity and humanity are associated. To the virtues of my right hon. and learned Friend, no man will bear more cordial testimony than I shall; but the facts of this case are too strong—I cannot get over them. I find, as the commencement of the system, that the Treaty of 1831 has been successful; that by its operation the Slave Trade has been put down. If successful as a remedy, is it to be abandoned as a preventive? Are you to have recourse to what is, after all, but an experiment, and to abandon that expedient, of the efficacy of which not the slightest doubt can be entertained? I should rather say, that in the means you have already tried and found successful, reason calls on you to persevere. This is my answer to the arguments of the right hon. Gentleman respecting the comparative merits of the Treaty of 1841 and Convention of 1845. But there is still another objection, of the gravest kind, to your new Convention. Is it not most impolitic on your part to stipulate with France that she shall maintain a squadron of twenty-six ships, that she shall acquire familiarity with the sea, gain a home on the deep, and become domesticated on the ocean? Is there no risk that the Right of Visit you have preserved, or rather which you have declared, will lead to collision between you and France? The quarter-deck of a slaver is to be converted into a floating Court of Admiralty, where the issue of mixed law and fact, French or not French, is to be tried by the men to whom you commit the perilous adjudication. My great objection to the Convention is this—before it was concluded, if an English sloop of war, furnished with a commission, met a French slaver, she could seize her, board her, confiscate her, the cargo of human beings being delivered intact to life and liberty from the bonds of that living charnel-house. But now what will be the case? After the Convention of 1845, what will happen? From the topmast of an English frigate a bark, whose peculiar configuration bespeaks her purpose, is descried. She is pursued; despite the swiftness which all the well-contrived architecture of Marseilles or Toulon can impart, she is overtaken; she is almost condemned, when suddenly a tri-colour is hoisted, and then she may pursue her unobstructed way to Bahia or the Havannah, while the mariners of England, struck with impuissance, will have but to imprecate the compact, among the points of which is to be numbered this scandalous and detestable result. ["Hear!"] The right hon. Gentleman says "hear;" he cannot deny this—if a French slaver is met by an English cruiser, the instant her nationality is recognised she must be allowed to pass. That is the great and pressing fact of the case; that will be the result of the Convention. In my judgment you have set at nought and rendered valueless two most important acts of diplomacy; you have rendered all the sacrifices which England has made altogether vain; you have tempted the other nations of Europe to say that the Right of Search is incompatible with their honour. You have given a precedent to disturb all the Treaties connected with the Right of Search, and thus have done to the cause of humanity a mischief which not all your ingenious distinctions—not all your moral and sentimental declamations—not all your abandonment of the commerce of Brazil, your violation of the Treaty of Utrecht, and your quarrel with Spain, will be able to repair.

Sir R. H. Inglis thought that the House would admit that his right hon. Friend at the head of the Government could not, even with the largest preparations, have met the statement of the noble Lord opposite, on the general points, more effectually than he had done. But there were one or two points upon which he did not think his right hon. Friend—marvellously perfect as was his information on almost all points—had been successful in meeting the objections of the noble Lord; and he alluded particularly to the preamble of the Convention. It might appear hypercritical on his part, but he could not help feeling that in the diplomatic relations between two great nations, form became substance. Now, there was one expression in the preamble of the Treaty, gratuitously used on the part of England, which might compromise a principle which involved rights which no Statesman, without the deepest consideration, and certainly never without reluctance, would concede to another Power. He felt that the noble Lord opposite, when he called the attention of the House to the terms of the preamble of the Treaty, had urged an objection which was far too well sustained. He did not wish to be misunderstood. Not even the right hon. and learned Member for Dungarvon could entertain deeper feelings of respect for Dr. Lushington than he did; yet he could not suffer his private respect for either that eminent person or for the Duke de Broglie, to render him insensible to the construction which might be put upon the terms of the preamble which they had permitted themselves to sign. He felt with the noble Lord opposite, that the terms of that preamble justified the construction which he had put upon it—viz., that the single object of the Treaties of 1831 and 1833, was to prevent the flag of England and the flag of France from covering the Slave Trade; but he could never admit the inference that the flag of England had been nsed for covering the Slave Trade between the years 1807, when the Slave Trade was abolished, and 1831. Until that expression was explained, he could not but feel that the construction put upon it by the noble Lord was too accurate for him or for any Englishman to deny. He felt that the expression "considering the Convention had prevented the use of the English flag covering the Slave Trade," did imply that, till that Convention had been passed, the English flag had covered that odious traffic; and he therefore regretted that his right hon. Friend (Dr. Lushington) had ever put his name to such a paragraph. He felt, also, that the 9th Article had not been explained by the right hon. Member in a way which relieved it from the objections of the noble Lord. He felt, with the noble Lord, that the declaration made on the part of Her Majesty, that Her Majesty would continue the prohibition of the Slave Trade in the Colonies of this country, might raise the presumption, that, except for such a declaration, the Slave Trade—say for instance to Jamaica—might be carried on. That, in his opinion, was a most gratuitous assertion on the part of Her Majesty; and in making it, Her Majesty had done much to verify the French proverb—by excusing she had accused herself; for a mere declaration that she would not encourage the Slave Trade, implied that without such a declaration she might have encouraged it; and it was on that account that he regretted that a Convention should have been signed in the name of Her Majesty containing such a passage; for which no satisfactory defence had been made by the Government. He was bound to admit, that his right hon. Friend had been successful with reference to the charge which the noble Lord had brought against the Government, of having tamely submitted to France and Spain. The paragraphs which his right hon. Friend had read sufficiently exculpated the English Government; and every one would rejoice that the honour of the country had not in that respect been tarnished by the hands of its Ministers. The noble Lord had been blamed for having, without notice, introduced so many subjects into the discussion; but he did not think the noble Lord could be justly blamed in that respect, as it was impossible, when a Convention, involving the subject of the Slave Trade was under discussion, to avoid introducing the topics to which the noble Lord had referred. [Sir R. Peel: The noble Lord had apologized for doing it.] There was no necessity for an apology. He could never hear the noble Lord address the House on the subject of the Slave Trade, without feeling how much they owed to him for his zealous and constant conduct during the long period of thirty-seven years, in endeavouring to suppress that traffic; nor could he forget the support which the noble Lord gave to a Motion which he (Sir R. Inglis) had formerly introduced on the subject, for which, and for the speech made by the noble Lord on that occasion, all who took an interest in the abolition of the African Slave Trade felt they owed him a debt of gratitude. He could not help taking advantage of the reference which the noble Lord had made to the existence of the Slave Trade in other parts of the world, to call the attention of the Government to a notice which he had given in the early part of the Session, and to the Motion which followed it, on the subject of the revival, or rather the creation, of a Slave Trade in our own Colonies, under the pretence of a voluntary migration. He believed they were giving good cause to their enemies in every part of the world to accuse them of gross political hypocrisy in the denunciations which they make of them with respect to the Slave Trade. He would refer, in the first instance, to the case of Trinidad. He believed that the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies was aware that at a period when there was a greater necessity for supply of free labour than there now was, the planters of Trinidad had met, and had agreed to an Address which he would read to the House. They said—

"The committee, trusting that this equitable rule will be no longer opposed, and that a British subject will be allowed to obtain, in a fair and honourable way, the labour he may require wherever it can be found, are so convinced of the superiority of the source which Africa presents, that they recommend its being made available, even at a considerable expense, the whole of which, however, would be defrayed by the Colony. It is possible that on that extensive continent a sufficient number of suitable free labourers may be engaged, by which all difficulties will be surmounted. But it may be otherwise; and, instead of waiting until the period of failure arrives, the more prudent course will be to prepare and determine beforehand the measures which in such case should be pursued. The committee, therefore, after seriously considering the whole subject, both in its causes and consequences, presume to advise, if a sufficient number of free labourers are not to be found on the coast of Africa disposed to emigrate to our Colonies, that some of the unhappy persons who are held there in bondage should be purchased and manumitted for that purpose; sincerely believing that such a measure will immediately assure a successful issue to the experiment of free labour, and effect in a short period of time the extinction of the Slave Trade."

He should be doing imperfect justice to the Governor if he did not add, that as soon as the particulars of this Address reached the Governor of Trinidad, he caused to be written (on the 9th of July, 1841) this letter to the chairman of the body of planters:—

"Government House, July 9, 1841.

"Sir—I am directed by the Governor to acquaint you, in reply to your note to me of the 7th instant, that when his Excellency granted permission to the public officers to attend the meetings of the Committee of the Immigration Society, he was under the impression that this committee had been appointed for the purpose of procuring and 'furnishing information to the public in Great Britain with respect to the actual state of agricultural affairs in this Colony, and more particularly as to the real amount of wages paid to the labourers;' but as it now appears to the Governor that the investigations of the committee have extended to a much wider field, his Excellency declines any participation in its proceedings.

"I have, &c., "Arthur White, Colonial Sec.

"The Hon. John Losh."

These proceedings on the part of the planters were, he conceived, sufficient to show, at the same time, the demand for labour in the West Indies, and the unscrupulous manner in which the planters of Trinidad were prepared to supply it. This state of things in the West Indies led him to call the attention of the House to the state of things in Sierra Leone, where, according to the statement he had received, something much too like the Slave Trade was now going on. He held in his hand a letter from an individual at Sierra Leone, on whose authority he placed the utmost reliance, which detailed the circumstances that were occurring there. The letter was dated April 23, 1845; and, therefore, was written after the news had been received at Sierra Leone of a discussion in that House, the result of which was, that the Papers were ordered as to the emigration of free labourers from Africa to the West Indies; such free labourers being, in fact, Africans who had just been liberated from the holds of slave ships. It was distinctly asserted that there was no character of free agency at all about the consent of the negroes to go to the West Indies; for, independent altogether of other circumstances which he would immediately detail to the House, he had it on the authority of Mr. Pascoe Hill, that the Africans, when liberated from the slavers, (and, though his statement referred to parties liberated at the Cape, yet it must too often refer equally to all others liberated in Sierra Leone, and there exposed to the solicitations of the agents of the West India planters,) were in such a state of disease as to be unable to stand, and certainly utterly incapable of exercising any free discretion whatever. It appeared from the information he had received, that whereas up to the 8th of July last year, the negroes, when liberated from the slave ship, were allowed to remain for weeks and months in the Colony, they were now treated in the way which was related by his informant, whose words he would read to the House. He said—

"Imagine to yourselves a large yard, enclosed with a high stone wall, filled with Africans from a slave vessel: the door opens, the emigrant agent enters, and is received by these deluded people with demonstrations of joy—a simultaneous clapping of hands is heard. That man, who is bribing them to leave their native country for a distant land, of which they know nothing, is their friend; he gives them money, and tobacco, and salt beef, and promises to send them to a fine country: he is their friend—they clap him. But this is not all. Whilst the emigrant agent and his delegates have free access to the liberated Africans in the liberated Africans' yard, and to use these means to persuade these ignorant creatures to emigrate to the West Indies, all other persons, likely to describe the West Indies in a different strain, are most carefully shut out, and not allowed to enter the yard. For this purpose, the 'gatekeeper' has strict orders to prevent people from entering the yard who have no business to transact at the department; and a few days ago an inhabitant of this village, who had been 'gatekeeper' for three years, was dismissed on a charge of allowing persons to enter the yard, which he denies. Whether his statement be true or not, here is a glaring fact, that from the time the slaves are landed to the time they are shipped off to the West Indies, their country people are not permitted to visit them. The resident liberated Africans may have a father, a mother, a sister, or a brother, among the newly liberated Africans; but they must not enter the yard; they cannot have the opportunity of recognising them."

Now, he contended that, under such circumstances, to call on persons so situated to exercise a discretion whether they would become recruits in the army or emigrants in the West India islands—for those were the alternatives proposed to them—was nothing less than a mockery of men who had now become their fellow subjects. It was a delusive choice, which in all probability would lead only to their misery, and, at any rate, contingently only to their benefit. Was it an imaginary supposition, that among those of their fellow countrymen who were excluded, there might be some nearly and dearly connected with those who were in the yard? This was borne out by the facts. His informant added—

"To show you that relatives may still be brought to the Colony in the hold of a slave ship, I will relate an interesting circumstance of the kind which lately occurred here. A Spanish vessel was brought into Sierra Leone, as a prize, containing a number of Africans, captured by a British cruiser. Among these persons thus mercifully delivered, the chief clerk of the liberated African department, himself a liberated African, found his mother's sister."

It might be said, that here the party must have had the opportunity of seeing his fellow countrymen, or he could not have discovered his relative. But that man enjoyed that privilege from his official situation; and this increased the hardship and injustice inflicted on the others. He was also informed, that so completely was this choice a mockery and a delusion, that the negroes were taken from the stone-yard by a back gate to the beach, to embark in the ships for the West Indies; for, "if they were but permitted," added the writer of the letter, "to walk through the streets o the beach on the day of embarkation, their country people would be sure to 'talk country to them.'" These were the facts which had been stated to him; he believed that some of them were within the knowledge of the hon. Under Secretary for the Colonies. He felt that, having in an early period of the Session brought the subject generally before the House, and having since received this communication, it was his duty to submit it to the House; and he could not find a more legitimate opportunity for so doing than the present.

Sir Charles Napier entirely agreed with the observations which had fallen from the noble Lord and from the hon. Baronet who had just sat down relative to the first paragraph of the preamble of the Treaty. It was in these words:—

"Her Majesty the Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and His Majesty the King of the French, considering that the Conventions of the 30th of November, 1831, and the 22nd of March, 1833, have effected their object in preventing the use of the English and French flags in carrying on the Slave Trade, but that this odious traffic still exists, and that the said Conventions are insufficient to ensure its complete suppression; His Majesty the King of the French, having expressed his desire to adopt more effectual measures for the suppression of the Slave Trade, than those contemplated in the said Conventions; and Her Majesty the Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland being anxious to co-operate for the attainment of this object; they have agreed to conclude a new Convention, which, as between the two high contracting parties, shall be substituted in the place of the abovementioned Conventions of 1831 and 1832; and for that purpose they have named as their Plenipotentiaries, that is to say—" they had made a new Treaty; but what had they given up? They gave up the Right of Search—the right which enabled the British Navy, on falling in with French vessels, to examine them within certain latitudes, and ascertain whether they were fitted up in the usual manner for the Slave Trade, or for conveying slaves to other vessels, or directly to the Brazils. Now what had they got in return for the relinquishment of that right? They had got the privilege of having twenty-six French vessels in company and conjunction with as many English vessels, in order, it would appear, that they might teach the French—as his right hon. Friend the Member for Dungarvon had eloquently expressed it—that they might teach the French all the arts of seamanship in which British sailors excelled. Now he thought that to be just the most impolitic thing that the Government could possibly have done. He recollected that in 1830, when the French squadron had been first acting in conjunction with the British Navy in the North Sea and in the Mediterranean, a gallant officer compared the French vessels as being like so many floating islands. The next matter to which he would wish to allude was the Right of Visit. But was the right hon. Baronet so sure that the Right of Visit would not be as dangerous as the Right of Search, or that it would not, in a short time become equally obnoxious to the French Government as the Right of Search was? What was the Right of Visit? An English vessel on the coast of Africa discovers a vessel with French colours. If the officer in command did his duty, he should send a boat to her to discover whether there might not be some assumption of the French flag or not. Was it not almost certain that if the vessel assumed false colours, she would also have a crew dressed as French sailors, and every other necessary deception to correspond? It would be, therefore, the duty of the British officer to board the vessel; but then they should see the delicate and gentle manner in which the instructions which he had to follow had been prepared. It would really appear to have been prepared by some gentleman who had been all his life accustomed to drawing rooms only. The language was really amusing. It was as follows:—

"You are not to capture, visit, or in any way interfere with vessels of France; and you will give strict instructions to the commanding officers of cruisers under your orders to abstain therefrom. At the same time you will remember that the King of the French is far from claiming that the flag of France should give immunity to those who have no right to bear it; and that Great Britain will not allow vessels of other nations to escape visit and examination by merely hoisting a French flag, or the flag of any other nation with which Great Britain has not, by existing Treaty, the Right of Search. Accordingly, when from intelligence which the officer commanding Her Majesty's cruiser may have received, or from the manœuvres of the vessel, or other sufficient cause, he may have reason to believe that the vessel does not belong to the nation indicated by her colours, he is, if the state of the weather will admit of it, to go a-head of the suspected vessel, after communicating his intention by hailing, and to drop a boat on board of her, to ascertain her nationality, without causing her detention, in the event of her really proving to be a vessel of the nation the colours of which she has displayed, and therefore one which he is not authorized to search."

He wondered what difference would exist between the manœuvres of a French, or a Spanish, or a Brazilian vessel under such circumstances. Perhaps the right hon. and gallant Admiral opposite (Sir G. Cockburn), would enlighten the House on that point. It then proceeds:—

"But should the strength of the wind, or other circumstance, render such mode of visiting the stranger impracticable, he is to require the suspected vessel to be brought to, in order that her nationality may be ascertained; and he will be justified in enforcing it if necessary:—understanding always, that he is not to resort to any coercive measure until every other shall have failed; and the officer who boards the stranger is to be instructed merely in the first instance to satisfy himself by the vessel's papers, or other proof, of her nationality; and if she prove really to be a vessel of the nation designated by her colours, and one which he is not authorized to search, he is to lose no time in quitting her, offering to note on the papers of the vessel the cause of his having suspected her nationality, as well as the number of minutes the vessel was detained (if detained at all) for the object in question; such notation to be signed by the boarding officer, specifying his rank and the name of Her Majesty's cruiser, and whether the commander of the visited vessel consents to such notation on the vessel's papers or not (and it is not to be done without his consent); all the said particulars are to be immediately inserted in the log book of Her Majesty's cruiser, and a full and complete statement of the circumstances is to be sent, addressed to the Secretary of the Admiralty, by the first opportunity, direct to England; and also a similar statement to you as senior officer on the station, to be forwarded by you to our Secretary, accompanied by any remarks you may have reason to make thereon. The commanding officers of Her Majesty's vessels must bear in mind that the duty of executing the instruction immediately preceding, must be discharged with great care and circumspection. For if any injury be occasioned by examination without sufficient cause, or by the examination being improperly conducted, compensation must be made to the party aggrieved; and the officer who may cause an examination to be made without sufficient cause, or who may conduct it improperly, will incur the displeasure of Her Majesty's Government."

Well, what would happen under these instructions? The captains of French merchant vessels cruising on the coast of Africa would feel well that England had been bullied into giving up the Right of Search. This was the plain meaning of the Treaty; and whatever other terms might be applied to it, the generality of persons commanding French vessels would adopt that more correct description of what had been done, and believe that England had been bullied by France into an abandonment of the Right of Search. Well, a British cruiser might fall in with a vessel. She might be French or not; but the British officer could not ascertain that fact without sending a boat to board her. The French captain might possibly be a violent man. He might have a great deal of French pluck about him, and cry out, "I belong to la Grande Nation, and I want to know for what purpose I am detained." At such a time the smallest turn of the helm would be enough to run the boat down. He perceived the right hon. Baronet smile; but he could assure him that such occurrences were not uncommon. A French war cruiser might be in sight, and the captain of the French merchant vessel might say that he would go on board of her, and complain of the manner in which he had been treated, and thus disagreement and ill-feeling between the crews of the two vessels would be fomented. He would illustrate his view of what might take place by a circumstance which occurred to himself on the coast of Syria. They had orders to prevent Egyptian vessels from coming into the port of Beyrout, and an officer, in mistake, boarded a French vessel, which they had no right to do. He had intended writing a letter of apology to the French captain, when the gentleman came on board, and on being informed of his intention, very properly requested that the letter should be written. The letter was afterwards sent to the French papers, and the captain was cried up as being the greatest man that France had ever produced, because he had made an English 84 gun ship apologize to him. The French Government very properly made public a correct explanation of the matter; but the captain was actually presented with the Cross of the Legion of Honour for his conduct. He hoped his apprehensions would not be realized; but he certainly very much feared that the right hon. Baronet would find a great deal more difficulty to arise from the Right of Visit, than had ever been known under the Right of Search. There was one Article of the Treaty to which he wished particularly to direct the attention of the House, namely, the Fourth. It stated that—

"Treaties for the suppression of the Slave Trade shall be negotiated with the native princes or chiefs on the abovementioned part of the west coast of Africa, wherever it may seem necessary to the commanders of the English and French squadrons respectively. Such Treaties shall be negotiated by the commanders themselves, or by officers specially instructed by them to that effect."

Now he presumed that the term "respective" meant "conjointly," and that the superior officers of the two nations could not conclude any of these Treaties unless they could do so together. But then the Sixth Article was in these words:—

"Whenever it shall be necessary to employ force, conformably to the law of nations, in order to compel the due execution of any Treaty made in pursuance of the present Convention, no such force shall be resorted to, either by land or sea, without the consent of the commanders, both of the British and of the French squadrons. And if it should be deemed necessary for the attainment of the objects of this Convention, that posts should be occupied on that part of the coast of Africa before described, this shall be done only with the consent of the two high contracting parties."

Now, he would suppose that two commanders of French and British cruisers saw one of these Treaties, after being made, broken before their faces, and that one of the two commanders-in-chief had gone to Cape Verd, while another had sailed to the south; were they to have no power of destroying these baracoons until they could consult both their superior officers? He would also wish to know why they were not to have French cruisers on the eastern, as well as on the western coast of Africa, as he believed slavery was quite prevalent on the coasts of Madagascar? The crews of the other ships would constantly be in sight of those of this country—watching how they acted, copying them in all respects, and, in fact, learning the art of war. He should not be surprised if, not long hence, Russia were to volunteer to enter into a Treaty of the same kind with Great Britain, in order that her cruisers also might derive benefit from the education. He had little doubt that this was one of the reasons which induced France to enter into the Treaty. The right hon. Baronet had said that we had gained 6½ degrees as regarded the Right of Visit; but the truth, was, that we had the Right of Search before, and a Right of Visit also in southern latitudes; we always had possessed the power of ascertaining whether a vessel really belonged to the country whose flag she bore. He did not see, therefore, what we had gained in this respect; and we had certainly lost upon other points. He would rather see the British Government sustaining the whole expense of fifty-two vessels of war, than acting conjointly with a French or any other squadron.

Mr. G. W. Hope wished to say a few words in answer to what had fallen from his hon. Friend the Member for the University of Oxford, and at that late hour of the night they would be but few. His hon. Friend had spoken of purchasing slaves for the purpose of emancipating them. He had, indeed, acquitted the Government of Trinidad on this subject; but he ought to have said that when proposals of the kind were made, they were met by a most decided negative. The British Government had objected to any proposal that might be so abused; and the noble Lord under whom he served was of opinion that the purchase of slaves in this way might virtually encourage the Slave Trade, under the pretence of free emigration, and the great body of the West Indians had never advocated any course laying them open to such a charge. The more immediate object of the observations of the hon. Baronet was the treatment of liberated Africans at Sierra Leone; and this very day, he (Mr. Hope) had had an opportunity of conversing with a lieutenant of the Navy, who had been engaged in the service: the account he gave did not lead him (Mr. Hope) to assent to the facts, much less to the deductions, of the hon. Baronet. It was undoubtedly the opinion of the Government that liberated slaves could be settled more satisfactorily to themselves in the West Indies than at Sierra Leone. On this point he might refer also to the statements of the Governor of Sierra Leone, himself a man of colour, and to the information derived from the members of the Mixed Commission. Hence it appeared, that at Sierra Leone the negroes worked at a low rate of wages, and although they had some means of education and spiritual instruction, they enjoyed none of the advantages possessed by the negroes in the West Indies. If not a slave, he was a mere drudge. To the same effect he might read an extract of a letter from Mr. Hooke, the Secretary to the Mixed Commission, who added that the liberated negroes often became wanderers among the mountains near Sierra Leone, and being retaken, were resold and reshipped as slaves. In one slave ship three were found who could talk English fluently, who had been liberated at Sierra Leone, who had been recaptured, resold to slavery, and retaken by a British cruiser. On the other hand in the West Indies wages were higher, comforts great, and means of religious instruction abundant. He contended, therefore, that it was the duty of Government, by every fair means, but by fair means only, to induce the natives to transport themselves from the coast of Africa. The hon. Baronet had contended that the negro had no real option, and that it was a mere mockery; but what he had said to-night did not well tally with his former statements and opinions upon the subject. The hon. Baronet had said, that the choice was frequently between starvation and emigration, and that bribes were held out in the shape of bounty money, tobacco, and promises of kind treatment, to induce them to go to the West Indies. At all events, this statement negatived any assertion of the use of force and compulsion; and the officer to whom he had before alluded, had enabled him to contradict it. He had asked him how it happened that so few liberated Africans were persuaded to go to the West Indies? and he had answered that it depended on the advice they received from their own countrymen; they were only to be reached by interpreters. The object was to give them a fair and free choice, to place the advantages clearly and truly before them; whereas, it would be inferred from the statement of the hon. Baronet, that no option was allowed, and that when once they had consented to go, they were not permitted to alter their determination. So far was this from being the case, that the negroes constantly changed their minds before they quitted Sierra Leone; and, in one instance, 180 had so changed their minds. It was evident, therefore, that the assertion of the hon. Baronet was ill-founded.

Captain Pechell stated, that the right hon. Baronet was completely mistaken as to the benefits which he expected to derive from the Convention. The right hon. Baronet attributed the clamour against the Right of Search in France to the feeling which had been excited against his noble Friend; but this was not the case, for nothing was heard on the subject until Russia and other Powers were invited to join this country and France in Conventions similar to those of 1831 and 1833. He would refer to the authority of MM. Guizot and the Duke de Broglie. He denied that the Right of Search could not have been maintained if proper steps had been taken for that purpose. He was proud to find that a naval officer, much to his honour, stated this in the French Chamber. Admiral Roussin had stated there, that as he knew the Slave Trade could not be put down without the maintenance of the Right of Search, he would wave any jealousy with respect to the French flag on that point. He, therefore, thought that there was no ground for this country making the enormous sacrifice which had been made by this Convention. The Treaties with Spain and Portugal might also be thrown up on the same ground. The means which were to be adopted under the Convention would be perfectly harmless as regarded the Slave Trade; and it was a delusion to suppose that any assistance would be given by the French squadron for this purpose, unless by landing and taking possession of the slave factories on the coast. The French squadron could not stop slave ships under the Spanish, Portuguese, or Brazilian flags, because there were no Treaties between France and those Powers respecting the Right of Search. Much more harm would be inflicted on the commerce of England on the coast of Africa, by the presence of the French squadron there, than there was any chance of arising from any collision that would take place under the Right of Search. He could not conceive how any naval man could sanction such a sacrifice as had been made under this Convention.

Viscount Palmerston said, that he had very few observations to make in reply to what had fallen from the right hon. Baronet. The right hon. Gentleman had stated that, from his position in the Government, and from the great labour which he had to perform, it was difficult for him to reply entirely on the moment to observations which might be made on such a subject as the present. It arose from the present constitution of the Administration, as the Foreign Department had no representative in that House; and it was impossible for a Member of the Cabinet to send a copy of his speech, or even the heads of what he meant to say to the right hon. Baronet two or three days beforehand; but it was obvious on that occasion, that any deficiency in the reply of the right hon. Baronet did not arise from any want of knowledge or ability on his part, but because no one could properly answer the points which had been put. The right hon. Baronet had said that he had on every occasion taken the opportunity of speaking disparagingly of France. He denied it. He never thought of speaking disparagingly of France. Every sensible man must feel the greatest respect for the French nation; and must desire that France and England should be on the most friendly terms. He did not wish to boast of what had been done by the Government to which he had belonged; yet, he believed, that they did as much to cement a good understanding between the two countries as it was possible under the circumstances to accomplish. The right hon. Baronet had stated, that he was mistaken in stating that no remonstrance was made by the British Government to France for not ratifying the Treaty of 1841. He made his statement on the assertion of the French Minister in the French Chambers, who declared that England had made no remonstrance on the subject. He agreed with the right hon. Baronet that the refusal to ratify the Treaty, was not a cause for war between the two countries. He would go further, and say, that it was not a cause for any serious coldness between the two Governments; but, for the sake of example and precedent, it would have been well to have written, not merely a despatch to the English Ambassador, but a note to the French Government, stating calmly and dispassionately the reasons why this Government objected to the course taken by them on the subject. He was inclined to doubt whether Her Majesty's Government acted prudently in declining the profered modifications of France, especially if they were only of a trifling and immaterial character. It was likely that the rejection of those modifications was the cause why the ratification of the Treaty was not made. The right hon. Baronet had referred to the despatch addressed by him (Viscount Palmerston) to Lord Granville on the 7th of April, 1831, by which was proposed to the French Government an unlimited Right of Search. To this proposition, France gave a positive refusal. It was then proposed, that a temporary arrangement should be made between the two Governments, for interchanging warrants without founding them on any Treaty. That proposal pleased the French Government, and they agreed to it; but, instead of its being made an experimental and temporary arrangement, France consented to embody it in a Treaty. The moment it was so embodied, it no longer remained a matter of arrangement between the two Governments. The right hon. Baronet must, therefore, admit that he had misunderstood the nature of the Treaty. All he (Viscount Palmerston) could say, with respect to the number of cruisers to be maintained by the two Governments was, that this country had treated with France as a Power acting upon the principles of honour and self-respect. He never believed France would seek to avail herself of any means of evasion. He would not now, believe, that if the Government had refused to abrogate the Treaty, France would not have felt it due to her honour and dignity to act upon the fair spirit and meaning of it. With reference to the explanation given by the right hon. Baronet of the nature of the evidence given by the officers before the Commissioners, he (Viscount Palmerston) was willing to make a bargain. If the right hon. Baronet would give him a list of the names of the witnesses examined, and an extract of such parts of their evidence as related to the value of the mutual Right of Search, as a means for the suppression of the Slave Trade, he would modify his Motion to that extent. He would in that case leave it to the Government to use their perfectly free and unqualified discretion to select the passages aud expressions of the witnesses. But if the right hon. Gentleman refused to do this, he should feel it his duty to take the sense of the House upon the Motion as it stood.

COLLEGES (IRELAND) BILL.] On the Order of the Day for bringing up the Report on this Bill,

Mr. Wyse moved—

"That it is the opinion of this House, that whereas the Act of Settlement enacts that a College be annexed to the University of Dublin in addition to the College of the Holy Trinity, under the name and title of King's College, and the Act of 1793 provides that all future Colleges that may be annexed to said University, after the passing of that Act, be open to Roman Catholics and Protestant Dissenters equally with Protestants, in all their honours and emoluments, as well as studies; the Colleges proposed to be founded under the present Bill be annexed to the said University under the conditions which the Act of 1793 prescribes."

Sir James Graham resisted the Amendment, as totally unconnected with the main object of the Bill. He could not believe, indeed, that the hon. Gentleman was serious in pressing his Motion; and, therefore, he should not trouble the House at that hour by entering into the subject.

Mr. Shaw said, he would have abstained, and particularly at that late hour, from saying a word upon the subject, but for two incorrect statements, having reference to the University of Dublin, which he desired to correct. The first was, that the original charter, by Queen Elizabeth, did not contemplate any distinctions in the religious creed of the students to be educated at Trinity College; but the reverse was the fact, for not only would such an interpretation be opposed to the whole tenor of the policy of those times, but the 2nd Eliz., chap. 1, expressly enacted that "all and every person or persons which shall be preferred to any degree of learning in any University, shall, before being preferred to such degree, take and receive the Oath of Supremacy." And, in fact, no Roman Catholic was permitted to graduate before 1793. The hon. Gentleman was in error, in averring, that the Act of Settlement had enacted that a College should be annexed to the University of Dublin, in addition to the College of the Holy Trinity; whereas the Act of Settlement only enabled the Crown, if it thought fit, to add another College, and to endow it from the restored lands, but not from the estates of Trinity College. He would object to such a course practically—not only on account of the great difficulties connected with the vested property and rights of Trinity College—but also because, as he had before stated to the House, he considered there was already a more than sufficient supply of what could be strictly called university education in Ireland; and that the new Establishments under that Bill would be very useful in their way, but as affording a different kind of education.

Motion negatived.

The Report received. Bill read a third time.

House adjourned at two o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, July 9, 1845.

MINUTES.] NEW MEMBER SWORN. Sir John Thomas Buller Duckworth, Bart., for Exeter.

2°. Borough and Watch Rates; Bankruptcy Declaration.

3°. and passed:—Schoolmasters (Scotland).

Private.—Reported.—London and Croydon Railway, (Chatham to Gravesend).

3°. and passed:—St. Matthew's, Bethnal Green, Rectory.

PETITIONS PRESENTED. From Hereford, against the Ecclesiastical Courts' Bill.—By Mr. Bouverie and the Lord Advocate, from Ayr and other places, against the Universities (Scotland) Bill.—By Mr. Bannerman and several other hon. Members, from Aberdeen and several other places, in favour of the Universities (Scotland) Bill.—By Mr. Stansfield, from Stockholders and other Inhabitants of New South Wales, for Repeal of certain Acts relating to that Colony.—By Mr. B. Chapman and other hon. Members, from the County of York, for Ten Hours' Bill in Factories.—By Mr. Bellew, from Louth (Ireland), for Alteration of Law relating to Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Bill.—By Lord Henniker, from Joseph John Lay, M.D., in favour of Physic and Surgery Bill.

LUNATIC ASYLUMS AND PAUPER LUNATICS BILL.] On the Motion that the House go into Committee on the Lunatic Asylums' Bill,

Mr. Liddell complained that not one Member of the Government was present on this occasion. The point on which he wished to get some information was, whether parties who had embarked large sums in private Lunatic Asylums, all of which were conducted with great care, skill, and humanity, would be injuriously affected by the Bill. He highly approved of the principle of the Bill; but he hoped it would not be allowed to operate injuriously to those parties to whom he referred.

Mr. Williams also concurred in the principle of the Bill, but regretted that a measure of such importance should not have been introduced at an earlier period of the Session. He also trusted that the parties to whom reference had been made, would be adequately protected, as far as such protection did not militate against the principle of the Bill or the interests of the public.

Mr. P. Howard thought, that at this late period of the Session, it was unjust to throw upon parishes and small counties such large expenses as this Bill would entail; and, unless the Bill was greatly modified in this respect, he would, on the third reading, take the sense of the House on an Amendment to have the Bill postponed to next Session.

House in Committee.

On Clause 75,

Mr. T. Duncombe proposed as an Amendment, to leave out from the word "Asylum" to the end of the Clause, in order to insert the words—

["Notice of the same shall be sent to the Coroner having jurisdiction where such Asylum is situated, who shall cause an Inquest to be held touching the cause of such patient's death."]

Committee divided:—Ayes 37, Noes 4: Majority 33.

UNIVERSITIES (SCOTLAND) BILL.] Mr. Macaulay rose to move the Second Reading of the Universities Scotland Bill. He said: I have been requested by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Leith (Mr. Rutherfurd), to act as his substitute on this occasion. I very greatly regret that a substitute should be necessary. I regret that we have not him among us to take charge of this measure, which he introduced to a very thin House indeed, in one of the most forcible and luminous speeches it has ever been my lot to hear. The few hon. Members, however, who were then present, cannot fail to remember the powerful effect which the speech of my hon. and learned Friend, on applying for leave to bring in the Bill, produced. The Ministers who came down to oppose it relinquished their objections to it. They hesitated; they consulted together; and at last, under the irresistible influence of his eloquence, they consented that he should have leave to bring in the Bill. They subsequently appeared to regard the Bill with favour, and his hon. and learned Friend, with himself, was thus induced to expect that the opposition to it was over. We anticipated that this important and salutary measure would be suffered to become law. But we have been disappointed. It has been intimated to us that it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to resist the further progress of the measure; and under these circumstances I now rise to move the Second Reading of the Bill. Were this an ordinary occasion, I should, under such circumstances, despair of success; but when I consider the strength of our cause, and recollect the justice and necessity on which it is founded, I cannot think it possible that even the opposition of Her Majesty's Government could succeed against it. I should consider success not only possible, but certain, if I did not know how imperfectly most English Gentlemen are informed on subjects immediately connected with Scotland. It is on this account that, departing from the ordinary course, I think it necessary, even after the able and eloquent statement of my hon. and learned Friend in introducing the measure, to address the House, instead of simply moving the second reading of this Bill; and in doing so I shall beg the attention of the English Gentlemen present to the state of Scotland. I hope that they will think that on this occasion the Member for Edinburgh has some right to their indulgence. I have been sent to this House as the Representative of a great city, which was once the capital of an independent kingdom—once the seat of a Court and of a Parliament; and, though for the general good it descended from that eminence, it still continues the intellectual metropolis of a great and intelligent people. Their chief distinction of late years has been derived from their University, which was practically constituted on the pure principles of toleration now advocated by Her Majesty's Ministers. So constituted, it has flourished during several generations, a blessing to the Empire, and renowned, to the furthest ends of the world, as a great school of physical and moral science. This noble and beneficent institution is now threatened with a complete and ignominious alteration in its character by the shortsighted and criminal policy of Her Majesty's Government, and by the virulence of ecclesiastical faction, which is bent on persecution, without even the miserable excuse of fanaticism. Nor is it only Edinburgh that is threatened. In pleading for it, I plead for all the great academic institutions of Scotland. The fate of all depends on the discussion of this night; and, while pleading for them, I am confident that I shall be heard with favour by every one who loves learning and religious liberty. I shall now proceed, therefore, without further preface, to the consideration of the Bill before the House. I say, first, that this Bill is founded on a sound principle. I say, secondly, that even if the principle of this Bill were not one which could be defended as generally sound, still the principles of the Ministers should make them desirous of passing the Bill; and, thirdly, I say, that if the Bill ought to pass, it ought not to be delayed by the Government. I state, first, that the principle of this Bill is a sound principle; and whoever else may undertake to controvert that assertion, by Her Majesty's Ministers, at least, it cannot be controverted. From their mouth a declaration will not sound well, that literary and scientific instruction is inseparably connected with spiritual instruction. It will not do for them to rail against the principle of this Bill as establishing "a godless system of education;" or to talk with horror of the danger of young men listening to lectures delivered by an Arian professor of botany, or a Popish professor of chemistry. They have contended that those sciences can be taught without reference to a religious creed. They have, for a country in which a great proportion of those who require academical education are dissenters from the Established Church, advocated a system of academical education altogether separate from religious tests. In that case they have thrown open the professorships to every creed; and they have strenuously defended this principle against attacks from opposite quarters—against the attacks of zealous members of the Church of England, and of the prelates of the Church of Rome. A test was offered only the day before yesterday for their acceptance by the hon. Baronet the Member for North Devon (Sir T. Acland), a test singularly moderate, merely requiring the professors to declare their belief in the divine authority of the Old and New Testaments; and even this test the Ministers resisted as inconsistent with the principles of their measure. It was then argued that it was unnecessary to apply such a test to professors of secular science; that it was unworthy to insinuate that they would inculcate infidelity on their pupils; and all men must remember with what scorn the Ministers discarded the notion that science could not be taught except in conjunction with a religious creed. The right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government said that it was utterly impossible to suppose that the professors would stoop to conduct anything so degrading, and abuse the confidence reposed in them. We heard in other quarters the use of very different language; but that language made as little impression on Ministers as on me. We were told that secular knowledge, unsanctioned and unaccompanied by sound views of pure religion, was not merely useless, but was positively noxious—that it was not a blessing, but a curse. I respect most deeply some of those who used that language; but it appears to me that this proposition is one which, while you state it in merely general terms, may possibly have a pleasing sound to the ears of some persons, but which, when brought to a test by applying it to the real concerns of life, is so monstrous and ludicrous that refutation is out of the question. Is it seriously meant, that if the captain of an Indiaman should be a Socinian, it would be better that he should not know the science of navigation; and that if a druggist should be a Swedenborgian, it would be better that he did not know the difference between Epsom salts and oxalic acid? Is it seriously meant, that 100,000,000 of the Queen's subjects, being Mahomedans and Hindoos, and progressing towards our state of civilization, should be sunk below the aborigines of New South Wales, without an alphabet, and without the rudiments of arithmetic? Gentlemen who mean seriously that secular knowledge, unsanctioned by a pure system of religion, is a positive evil, must go that length; but I should think that no sane man would be found to do that. At least, I never could conceive how an error in geology or astronomy could be corrected by divinity, or how a man well acquainted with his Bible could be saved from scientific errors. On these grounds, I cordially supported the measure which Her Majesty's Government introduced with respect to the Irish Colleges. The principle of the Irish Colleges Bill, and the principle of the Bill the second reading of which I now move, are the same; and the House and the country have a right to know why those who bring in the Irish Colleges Bill call on us to throw out the present Bill. It is most true, that in Scotland there is no clamour against the English connexion. It is true, that in Scotland there is no demagogue who thinks to obtain popular favour by attempting to excite animosity against men of the English race; and it is true, that in Scotland there is no party who would venture to speak of the enemies of the State as possible to be, under any circumstances, the allies of Scotland. In every extremity the Scotch people will be found faithful to the common cause of the Empire; but it will not, I hope, be thought—I am sure that, at any rate, it will not be publicly avowed—that on this account a measure bestowed as a boon on another part of the Empire, ought to be withheld from Scotland. But if this is not the distinction, where are we to look for a distinction? In Scotland, as well as in Ireland, unhappily, the Established Church is the church of the minority of the population. It is perfectly true, that the proportion of Dissenters to the Established Church in Scotland is not so great as in Ireland; but we cannot say that on this occasion we are dealing with the whole of the population. The question concerns that class which requires academical education; and among that class in Scotland the proportion of Dissenters from the Established Church, it would not be very difficult to show, is as great as the proportion of Roman Catholics among a similar class in Ireland. If it is desirable that there should be no sectarian education in Ireland, it is no less desirable in Scotland. If it is desirable that Protestants and Catholics should study together at Cork, it is no less desirable that the sons of elders of the Established Church of Scotland, and the sons of those who are separated from that Church, should study together at Edinburgh. If it is not desirable to require from Irish professors a declaration that they believe in the divine authority of the Gospels, on what ground is it necessary to call on the Scotch professors to say that they assent to every clause in the Confession of Faith? I defy right hon. Gentlemen opposite, with all their ingenuity and eloquence, to find one argument or rhetorical topic bearin gagainst this Bill, which would not be as effectual against their own Irish Colleges Bill. I consider this Bill, then, as safe from attack, with respect to its principle, from Her Majesty's Ministers. But I go further; and I say that, even if I did not hold the principle of this Bill to be most sound and excellent, I could still show, in the peculiar case of Scotland, some irresistible reasons for adopting the Bill, and for inducing many who even voted against the Irish Colleges Bill, to vote in favour of the present Bill. In the first place, I would call attention to the peculiar character of academical institutions in Scotland. The case of Scotland differs widely from the case of England and from the case of Ireland. The English Universities have a character of their own—an ancient, deeply marked character. It may be good, or may be bad; that question I will not now argue; but this we must acknowledge, that it is in perfect harmony with the system of tests. The Irish Colleges have no character. They have to receive their character from the Legislature, and we may impress on them what character we please. If we think it desirable to give them a character not in harmony with the system of tests, we may do so. But the Scotch Universities have a distinct character, as strongly marked as that of the English institutions, and altogether out of harmony with the system of tests. I entreat English Gentlemen not to suppose that the system of discipline or mode of instruction in them is like that in the English Universities, or that there are such authorities in them as the Provost of King's College is, or the Warden of New College. This is a distinct question from anything connected with the English Universities, and is to be decided on different grounds. We are not introducing a precedent for allowing Dissenters to be professors at Oxford and Cambridge. There is, in fact, no analogy whatever between the Universities of the two countries. What ought to be done with respect to the English Universities is a perfectly distinct question, and to be dealt with on perfectly distinct grounds. The object of the Universities of Cambridge and Oxford is, to bring up young men in connexion with a particular Church. At Cambridge, no person is suffered to graduate without declaring his adhesion to that Church. The rule at Oxford is even more strict; for on matriculation a declaration on oath must be made. The discipline, even outside the walls of the Colleges, is analogous to that pursued within. The students are lodged in the Colleges, and are obliged to attend to the strictest regulations with regard to their conduct, and to attend constantly in chapel and in hall. A person is appointed in each College to note the absence of the young men from divine service, another to watch their absence from hall, and another to keep account of those who return to the College at late hours; and University officers parade the streets by night, as a sort of University police, to seize upon any students they may find beyond the walls of their respective Colleges. In these Universities, there are punishments for any breach of decorum, and the authorities of the University have the power of control over the conduct of the pupils. The Scotch Universities are of a different nature. They do not pretend to inculcate one form of religious opinion more than another; a Jew might become a Master of Arts or a Doctor of Medicine as readily as a member of the Church of Scotland. No academical authority has a right to ask a young man attending the University whether he went to the Synagogue, or the Catholic chapel, to the Free Church or the Established Church. As to the moral conduct of the young men beyond the walls of the University, no influence could be exercised, and none of the heads of it could interfere with a student for conduct in the streets of Edinburgh. The proceedings in Edinburgh were similar to branches of scientific education in London. A young man might attend lectures at St. George's Hospital, or the lectures of Mr. Faraday in Albemarle Street, to learn chemistry, and of Mr. Carlyle on German literature, without any interference on the part of his instructors beyond the lecture room. Would it not be absurd to require a religious test from the lecturers to medical students at St. George's Hospital, at Surgeons' Hall, or in other places where science was taught? The relation between those parties being exactly analogous to the relation existing between the Scotch professors and Scotch students, on what principle can we defend the requiring of religious tests from the Scotch professors? If I held all the opinions of those Gentlemen who most dislike the Scotch system, I should say, after all, that in such a system religious tests would be out of place. Where you aim at bringing up young men as members of a particular Church, there is a reason for requiring from all who educate, a test to show that they belong to that Church; but where you do not propose to inculcate certain religious opinions, it is absurd to require that men should be Protestants before they give lectures on chemistry, or Trinitarians before they can take medical degrees. I therefore say, that the peculiar character of the Scotch Universities is, in my opinion, one strong reason to agree to this Bill. The peculiar engagements which exist between the English and Scottish nations also appear to me a strong reason for adopting the Bill. Some Gentlemen may think that I am venturing on dangerous ground. We have heard that the Treaty of Union and the Act of Security require us to prevent the passing of such a measure. I say that by those Acts I am not bound to throw this measure out; but that I am bound to adopt it, or some measure to the same effect; and this I undertake to prove by irresistible arguments. I shall resort to no paltry quibbling with the view of explaining away words. I utterly repudiate such an attempt when made in reference to questions like this. If I thought that the public exigencies required us to break through the Treaty of Union, I would say so openly, and should never quibble at words. I mean to deal with the Treaty of Union as a solemn engagement. In what sense was that Treaty adopted by the contracting parties; and more especially, in what sense was it understood by that party which, if there is any doubt, ought to prevail, that party being the weaker party, and standing in need of a guarantee? It was declared by that Treaty that no person should be a teacher or office-bearer at the Universities who did not subscribe to the Confession of Faith; or, in other words, did not declare his adhesion to the Established Church. What Established Church was that? It was the Church established in 1707, when the Union was adopted. Is the Church of Scotland, at the present moment, on all points constituted as that Church was in 1707? I answer, certainly not. The British Legislature violated the Articles of the Union, and made a change in the constitution of the Church of Scotland. From that change has flowed almost all the dissent now existing in Scotland; and if you attempt to enforce the letter of the Articles of the Act of Union against the Dissenters, you are actually excluding from acting as officers of the Universities precisely those persons to whom the Act of Union meant to give the exclusive possession of the academic offices. This I undertake to prove. Every person who knows anything of the ecclesiastical history of Scotland must be aware that in the opinion of the great body of Scotch Presbyterians, the mode in which pastors are appointed is a matter of great importance. From the time of the Reformation the great body of Scotch Presbyterians held that in some form or other the people ought to have a share in the appointment of their ministers. They do not consider this as a thing indifferent; they consider it as a matter jure divino, for they think that according to the revealed word of God, no individuals are entitled to be ministers to congregations if their preaching does not tend to edify the congregations. I am sure that I do not exaggerate when I say that members of the Church of England do not attach more importance to their ecclesiastical government and ordination, than many Scotchmen who fear God and honour their Queen, attach to this right of a popular voice in the choice of their spiritual ministers. What was the state of the Church of Scotland as constituted in 1707? It was constituted in a manner satisfactory to the great part of the Presbyterian body. In 1690, the Act was passed for the regulation of the presbyteries, and giving to popular bodies a share in the election of the ministers, which then was considered an essential principle of the Church of that country. The Church of Scotland was so constituted when England entered into the solemn engagement with Scotland, by which the two countries were united, and in which it was declared that the then form of the Church should remain and continue unalterable. But five years after the Union there was a violation of this Article of the Union—a violation, the consequences of which I never think upon without regarding them as one of the most solemn warnings history presents to States, always to keep public faith strictly inviolate—and without a conviction, that in the end, though long periods, though whole generations may elapse, retribution for the injustice will come. In the year 1712, it is well known how the country was governed: the Whigs, who were the chief authors of the Union, who had carried on the war with Louis XIV., had been driven from power; they had fallen in consequence of the prosecution of Dr. Sacheverell, and the enmity of the Church of England. A Tory Ministry was in office—brought in and kept in by the Tory country gentlemen. The heads of that Ministry, but still more its followers, regarded the Presbyterians of Scotland with great dislike; that was a feeling which persons acquainted with the writings of Swift would know existed at that time. The general feeling was, that the English nation and the English Church had made a bad bargain, of which they were desirous to get rid, and which as far as they possibly could, without risking the general safety of the State, they ought to violate. During their short period of power they did offer numerous petty insults to the opinions, or, if you please, the prejudices of the Presbyterians; but the chief act on which they ventured was the introduction of a Bill abolishing the law of 1690, and giving back the power of filling up vacant benefices to lay patrons. Of the history of that Bill we have a little in Burnet, and we have something very significant in our own Journals. The measure was hurried on with the greatest speed, that it might be got through the House before intimation of it could reach Scotland; for those were not the days of railroads, when a speech made at two or three o'clock in the morning, is read the same day at Exeter and Newcastle. The significant entry on our Journals respecting it is this—there was an obstinate fight, and in the debate on the third reading, it was ordered that the Act of Union and the Act of Security should be read to the House. This is a pretty clear indication of what the feeling was on that occasion. But the Bill got up to the House of Lords; then came a petition from the General Assembly of Scotland against it. The first name attached to the petition was that of Carstairs, an eminent man, who had enjoyed the confidence of William III., and well known for the share he took in the establishment of the Church of Scotland after the Revolution. In that petition their Lordships were prayed not to violate the Act of Union; but party spirit ran high, and bore down all opposition; the Act of Union was violated; year after year the General Assembly protested against the violation, but in vain; and from the Act of 1712, undoubtedly flowed every secession and schism that has taken place in the Church of Scotland. It is true that the Act being upon the Statute Book was not a necessary reason that men should secede from the Church; but as often as it was put in execution, so often the Act of Union was violated again; as often as the subject was agitated by the operation of the Bill, so often these secessions took place. It is not my intention to detain the House with the minute history of these separations, but in consequence of the operation of the Act, the seceding Ministers formed the Associate Presbytery; and in 1752, the Relief Church was established. Even in our own time we have had similar instances; only two years ago we saw, not perhaps with unmixed approbation, but with strong sentiments of admiration, 470 ministers leaving their parishes and manses, throwing up their stipends, and committing themselves, their wives and children, to the care of Providence in this cause. Their congregations adhered to them firmly, followed them in crowds, and, surrounded by willing and delighted hearers, they preached in other churches, or, if none could be obtained, in tents and barns, or on those hills and moors to which in other times their ancestors fled, and worshipped God in despite of Lauderdale and Dundee. They were supported by their congregations, and the spirit in which every one contributed resembled that in which the widow of old threw her mite into the treasury at Jerusalem. Through whole districts, in whole counties, on the other hand, the ministers of the Establishment were preaching to empty walls. This was the fruit of the Act of 1712; from the Act of 1712, sprang the disputes which led to these distinct and repeated secessions. The repeal of that Act, and a return to the constitution of the Church of Scotland as it existed at the time of the Union, would have sufficed to heal the wound that had been inflicted. This is the true history of dissent in Scotland, and, knowing it, can any English statesman have the front to invoke the Treaty of Union and the Act of Security against those who hold those precise opinions which the Treaty of Union and the Act of Security were intended to protect, and who are Dissenters only because that Treaty and that Act have been violated? I implore the Gentlemen of England to think over the manner in which England has acted towards the Presbyterians of Scotland. First, by a solemn Treaty with the people of Scotland, you bound yourselves to maintain inviolate the constitution of their Church as it then existed; and five years afterwards you changed the constitution of that Church in a point which the people of Scotland regarded as essential; in consequence of which, secession after secession takes place, one great body of worshippers after another leaves the Church, till the Establishment is reduced to the Church of the minority; then begin your scruples about the Act of Security and the Treaty of Union; then you cannot depart from the letter of your contract; then if we ask for justice you turn away your faces, and say you must perform your engagements; then you appeal to Acts of Parliament, not to put the Church in the same situation she held in 1707, but to persecute those who adhere firmly in faith, doctrine, and discipline to the constitution of the Church of Scotland. These are the present conscientious scruples of Her Majesty's Government; but I must say that even its sugar scruples, though they made it the laughing-stock of Europe and America, sink into insignificance when compared with these. Can they have a doubt of this sort? Can they have a doubt of the animus imponentis of the Bill of 1712, when they see the names of those who opposed it, the name of Carstairs and of Boston, the author of The Fourfold State? Suppose we could call them up from their graves, and explain to them the revolutions which have since their time taken place in the Church of Scotland, and then ask them "Which of these was your Church at the time of the Union, for the protection of which the Articles of the Union and the Act of Security were made?"—have you the slightest doubt of what their answer would be? They would say, "Our Church was not the Church you protect, but the Church you oppress; our Church was the Church of Chalmers and Sir David Brewster, not that of Brice and Muir." I am entitled to make a strong appeal to those Members of the House of Commons who are attached to the Church of England. If they think the Bill now proposed will not be in truth a violation of the Treaty of Union, but that it is, as far as it goes, a small reparation for the injustice committed on that Treaty, I ask, how can they vote for tests that exclude men of their own religious persuasion from the Universities of Scotland? We may differ as to the countenance we may give to what we view as error, but he incurs a grave responsibility who persecutes that which he believes to be truth. Yet that will be the position of the zealous member of the Church of England, who gives his vote to-night against the Bill on the Table, which affects Episcopalians as well as Presbyterian seceders. There is another argument which seems stronger still in this regard in favour of the Bill. You may say you are averse to removing these tests; but the question is not whether you will remove these tests, but whether you will impose them? The laws imposing these tests have fallen into disuse. We have heard that disuse made an argument by the right hon. Baronet the Home Secretary in favour of the Irish Colleges Bill; he said "the experiment has been tried—in Edinburgh, these tests have been disused for near a century." I implore the House to remember this; we are called on to establish Colleges in Ireland without tests, and yet we are asked to introduce a system of tests into the University of Edinburgh ten times as stringent as the test the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir T. Acland) proposed to introduce into the Bill for establishing Colleges in Ireland! Is it possible the House of Commons will bear out the Minister in such an attempt as this? These tests have long been dormant in Edinburgh;

I do not exaggerate, when I say there are at least ten professors who have not subscribed the tests. Let the right hon. Baronet the First Lord of the Treasury, give the House some information on this point, for he has been himself Lord Rector of the University of Glasgow. And observe, Episcopalians are precisely the class of men whom these tests were meant to exclude; the tests were made rather against Prelacy than against Papists; at that time it was much more likely that a Papist should have been punished by the penal laws than made a professor. Every one knows that the right hon. Baronet the Secretary for the Home Department, and the noble Lord the Secretary for the Colonies, have also been Lord Rectors of the University of Glasgow; they know practically, that these tests are obsolete. Being to this extent obsolete, why are they now imposed? Having so long slept, the attempt is made to revive them, precisely because a schism has taken place, and there has been a vigorous demonstration of differences which you might have laid to sleep for ever. They were not enforced while the Church of the people was the Church of Scotland; but you begin to enforce them as soon as the majority of the people become Dissenters. You enforce them as they never were enforced before; and the very moment you do so you make the Universities sectarian bodies. The Presbytery certainly deserves credit for striking at high game; their attack is against Sir David Brewster. I hold in my hand the libel. The word is here used in its technical meaning; in the law language of Scotland, equivalent to "charge" or "declaration" in this case of Sir David Brewster, containing the proceedings taken with the view of ejecting him from his office as Principal of St. Andrew's College, his offence being neither more nor less than this—that he adheres in all points to the doctrine and discipline of the Church of Scotland as it existed at the time of the Union. Here we have an instrument put forward against him conceived in such a spirit that I must say with respect to the Presbytery, that it will have very little right on any future occasion to say anything about the arrogance and intolerance of the Vatican. The libel declares—

"That the Senatus and Faculty of the University of St. Andrew's ought to be required forthwith to redress the evil which you have brought upon the Church, by taking all steps competent to them for removing you from the office of Principal of the United College, and that the Senatus be required to report to the Presbytery, quam primum, what steps they have adopted to effect this, that you may be removed from your office, and visited with such other censure or punishment as the laws of the Church enjoin for the glory of God, the safety of the Church, and the prosperity of the University, and to deter others holding the same important office from committing the like offence in all time coming, but that others may hear and fear the danger and detriment of following divisive courses."

And here is another question—

"For the glory of God, the safety of the Church, and the prosperity of the University!" "The glory of God!" As far as that is concerned, I will here say nothing more than this—it is not the first time the glory of God has been made the pretext for the temerity and injustice of man. As to the safety of the Church—if, which God forbid! the Established Church of Scotland is possessed with the spirit of this Presbytery—if, having lost hundreds of able ministers, and hundreds of thousands of devout hearers, instead of endeavouring by meekness and diligence to regain those whom late events have estranged, she is ready to make war upon the seceders—if she is determined to furbish up for the purpose those old laws, the edge of which has long been rusted off, and which were originally meant, not for her defence, but for theirs—then are the days of the Church of Scotland numbered. With respect to the prosperity of the University, is there a corner of Europe where men will not laugh when they hear that the prosperity of the University of St. Andrew's can be promoted by expelling Sir D. Brewster from his professorship? The University of Edinburgh knows better how its prosperity is to be promoted; for I believe the Senatus Academicus of Edinburgh is almost unanimous in favour of this Bill. And, in fact, it is perfectly clear that fearful consequences lie before the Universities of Scotland, unless this, or some such measure, is carried speedily; if it is delayed, I believe there will be a new College founded and endowed with that munificence of which, in the Free Church, we have seen so many examples. From the day such a College arises, there is nothing before the Universities of Scotland but a gradual and, I fear, not a distant destruction. Even now it is notorious, such is the competition and emoluments of other pursuits of life, that it is difficult to procure eminent men to fill the chairs of the Universities. We can now choose from the whole of Scotland, from the whole world, men to fill the office of professors. Throw out this Bill, and you narrow this choice to half of Scotland or less; the diminution of students will lower the emoluments of the chair to less than half their present amount. What will be the consequences? Is it possible not to see that you will have a lower class of professors? With the inferior abilities of the professor, the students will decrease, the decline will be rapid and headlong; and it is clear that all will sink into utter decay, till the lectures are deserted, the halls empty, and a man not fit to be a village dominie will occupy the chair of a Dugald Stewart, an Adam Smith, a Reid, a Black, a Playfair, and a Jameson. How do Her Majesty's Ministers like such a prospect as this? The right hon. Baronet the Secretary for the Home Department has already, by his misfortune or his fault, secured no enviable place in the annals of Scotland: his name is inseparably associated with the disruption of the Scotch Church. Will he ruin the Scotch Universities? If the Government were consistent, even though it acted on an erroneous principle—though we might disapprove, it would be with some mixture of respect; but a Government that is guided by no principle whatever—a Government which on the gravest questions does not know its own mind for twenty-four hours together — a Government that goes from extreme to extreme, backwards and forwards, like "a reed shaken by the wind"—a Government that is against tests in Ireland, and for tests in Scotland—that is against tests at Limerick, and for them at Glasgow—against them in Cork, and for them in Edinburgh—that is against tests at Belfast, and for them at Aberdeen—that opposes tests on Monday, and advocates them on Wednesday, to oppose them on Thursday again,—it is impossible such a Government can command either respect or confidence. Is it strange that the most liberal measures of such a Government should fail to gain the applause of liberal men? Is it strange that it should lose the confidence of one-half the nation, without gaining that of the other half? But I speak not to the Government: I appeal to the House; I appeal to those who, on Monday evening, voted with the Government against the test proposed by the hon. Baronet the Member for North Devon (Sir T. Acland). I know party obligations are strong; but there is a mire so black and so deep that men should refuse to be dragged through it. It is only forty-eight hours since hon. Gentlemen came down to vote against a test requiring the professors in the Irish Colleges to be believers in the Gospel; and now the same hon. Gentlemen are expected to come down and vote that no man shall be permitted to be a professor in a College in Scotland who will not declare his adherence in all parts to the system of church government in Scotland. This is a matter of gross injustice to Scotland on the part of the Government; but its injustice to its own faithful followers surpasses it. The zealous members of the Church of England, I implore them to consider well before they make it penal to hold those doctrines they believe to be true; lastly, I call on every man, of every party, who loves knowledge and science and literature, who is a friend of peace, and respects the solemn obligations of public faith, to stand by us this day, in this last attempt to avert the destruction that threatens the Universities of Scotland. I move that the Bill be read a second time.

Sir J. Graham said: The bitter party and personal invective with which the right hon. Gentleman, as usual, has accompanied his arguments on a great question of public policy, shall not prevent me, on the present occasion, from taking a fair review of those arguments, and, to the best of my ability, sustaining the decision to which Her Majesty's Government has come in a matter so important to the Universities of Scotland. The right hon. Gentleman has truly said this is a question deeply affecting the interests of the Universities of Scotland in no ordinary degree; and he has said Her Majesty's Government is not entitled to the confidence of the House, because, with respect to the Scotch Universities, they advocate a policy which the right hon. Gentleman contends is diametrically opposite to that of the Bill lately introduced with regard to Ireland. I can only say, in reply, that Her Majesty's Ministers are actuated by no other desire than that of honestly discharging their public duty, and pursuing that course of policy which they hold to be best adapted to the varied circumstances of different parts of Her Majesty's dominions, regardless of all taunts that may be heaped on them; and they are also at all times prepared frankly to defend that which they believe to be right, and to be the best calculated for the public good. The right hon. Gentleman has also accused us of having exhibited a marked hesitation in coming to a decision on this subject. I would only remind the right hon. Gentleman, that when last year the subject was introduced by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Perth, and his views were supported with great ability by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Leith, who has introduced the present Bill, I stated fully the reasons which induced the Government to resist the proposition then made. And when, early in the present Session, the subject was again brought before the House, I said that we were waiting a declaration of the sentiments entertained by the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland upon it, and we wished to ascertain, as far as we could ascertain them, the feelings of the people of Scotland with respect to this Bill. I also stated, that on the second reading of the Bill, it would be our duty to take that course which, after having heard those opinions and having ascertained those feelings, we should deem to be the most consistent with our public duty. Sir, the result of our consideration, after having deliberated on the decision of the General Assembly, and, as far as we have been able to collect it, the opinion of the people of Scotland, is, that we are induced to adhere to our decision of last year, and to oppose the Motion now made by the right hon. Gentleman. Sir, in looking at this question, it is our duty to consider what are the engagements of the Crown and Legislature of this country with the people of Scotland; and, without reference to those rhetorical topics to which the right hon. Gentleman alluded, to look to the effect of such a change as this Bill seeks to introduce, with reference to what the public interest requires at our hands. The very circumstance to which the right hon. Gentleman has referred—the test proposed the other evening by my hon. Friend the Member for Devonshire, as applicable to professors in the proposed Irish Colleges, proves that if any test is to be maintained in the Scotch Universities, it is better to adhere to that test which rests on the basis of ancient Statutes, than to attempt modifications or alterations; for the right hon. Gentleman admits, that there could not easily be framed a milder test than that which was proposed by the hon. Baronet. Yet it met with many objections in this House, and a great majority of the House held it to be inconclusive. This failure of my hon. Friend proves that it is not expedient to attempt to alter or modify the test to be imposed, but that if retained it should be the existing test. Sir, the right hon. Gentleman has, in various parts of his speech, pointedly referred to the conduct of the Government with respect to the Irish Colleges, in connexion with this question of the imposition of tests. Now, I appeal to the justice and to the recent recollection of the House, whether, throughout the argument as to the admission or exclusion of tests from the Irish Colleges, I have not rested the course taken by Government on the special circumstances of the condition of Ireland? I appeal to the House whether I have not uniformly declared that the only ground upon which the absence of all religious tests in those Colleges could be maintained was, that there was carefully reserved to the Government the power of nominating and of dismissing the professors of those Colleges? And of this I am quite sure, that I should not be justified in maintaining the policy of the absence of tests in the Irish Colleges, unless the House had conceded that which I contended for; namely, the absolute necessity of vesting in the Crown the power of nominating, and also of removing at pleasure, the professors from whom tests were not required. Sir, the right hon. Gentleman attempted to maintain that there was a difference in the position of the Scotch and English Universities; he maintained that the Universities of Scotland were differently situated from those of Oxford and Cambridge, and from Trinity College, Dublin, with reference to the Church Establishment. There is no such distinction. The only difference consists in the fact, that the Established Church of Scotland draws its supplies of ministers exclusively from those seminaries of learning—the Scotch Universities. All persons destined for the ministry must have passed through certain classes in one or other of the Scotch Universities. Now, in Ireland every provision has been made by the liberality of Parliament for the education of the Catholic priesthood at the College of Maynooth, as at Trinity College and the University of Dublin ample provisions had, in like manner, been made for the priesthood of the Established Church. I may also remind the right hon. Gentleman that in this country, among many reasons that were urged in favour of preserving the integrity of Oxford and Cambridge as regards religious tests, was the necessity of maintaining that connexion with the Established Church which necessarily arises from the foundation and constitution of those seminaries of learning. Sir, on a former occasion I rested my opposition to this measure, among various reasons, much upon the solemn engagements entered into with Scotland by the British Legislature at the time of the Union. The right hon. Gentleman does not deny the validity of those engagements. On the contrary, he does admit the connexion between the Church of Scotland and the University at the time of passing the Act of Security; he says that the Act of Union was a measure to which the good faith of the British Parliament is pledged, and that if no material alteration had taken place in the condition of the Church of Scotland since that period, he is ready to admit that the engagements then entered into are still binding on the discretion of Parliament. I conceive that the right hon. Gentleman grounds his argument on the assumption that the Church of Scotland is altered since the period of the Union, and particularly by the Act of 1712, and from the events which occurred in the year 1842. I apprehend that the right hon. Gentleman is of opinion that what we are accustomed to call the Church of Scotland has, in fact, ceased to be the Established Church of that country, to which the Crown and the Legislature of England are bound. Now, I cannot conceive anything likely to be received with greater feelings of terror in Scotland than this statement, that on account of the disruption that has recently taken place in the Church, that Church is no longer the Church of Scotland to which the faith of the British Parliament is pledged. The argument the right hon. Gentleman has used with respect to the alteration made by the Act of 1712, with respect to patronage in the constitution of the Church, was fully considered in 1842, when I had the honour of introducing and defending a measure on that subject in this House. The very argument the right hon. Gentleman has put to-night was urged on that occasion. It was then urged that, consistently with the Act of Union and the Act of Security, the change then contemplated by the Government could not be supported and sustained. The House of Commons held that the change which was asked to be effected with regard to the right of patronage, was not inconsistent with the Act of Union or the Act of Security. And although the change made by the Act of 1712 was certainly considerable, yet from that period down to the present day, it has never yet been contended, on account of that change, that it is inconsistent with the duty of the Crown to maintain Presbyterian Church Government in Scotland as an engagement solemnly contracted at the Union, and under all circumstances to be observed. Sir, the right hon. Gentleman has referred to expressions which fell from me in the discussion on the Irish Colleges Bill, to the effect, that in one of the Scotch Universities the use of the test has been discontinued. I do admit that in the University of Edinburgh, in the last fifty or sixty years, the imposition of this test has been generally discontinued. But, at the same time, it is historically inaccurate to say that it has been abandoned, or that in later times it has been anything like discontinued. A large proportion of the professors of the University of Edinburgh have signed from time to time the Confession of Faith, or were liable when called on to do so. It was signed by Professor Leslie and by Mr. D. Stewart, and many other distinguished persons have signed it up to a recent period. In the other four Universities of Scotland, the professors have from time to time signed it, without exception, from the period of the Presbyterian settlement, in 1690, to the present moment. The right hon. Gentleman also referred to the Lord Rectors and other office-bearers of the University who have not been called on to subscribe. This is true both as regards Glasgow and the other Universities — Edinburgh not excepted. He added, that these tests were obviously and principally levelled against Episcopalians. It is with great diffidence that I presume to differ from the right hon. Gentleman on a point of history; but I believe that history sustains what I now say, that these tests were not originally framed principally against the Episcopalians. So far from the Episcopalians being regarded with any peculiar jealousy in Scotland, the House must remember that the Episcopalians in Scotland never had a fixed form of worship in the shape of a liturgy. They differed from the Presbyterians as to the question of church government, but not with respect to the liturgy, so much so, that after the Union one hundred and twelve Episcopalian ministers were by the law and the common consent of the two countries maintained in the full enjoyment of their cures. I hold in my hand a copy of the original subscription of the President of St. Andrew's College in the year 1698. The form of it clearly shows that it was not directed so much against the Episcopalians as against certain heterodox opinions to which both equally objected. The words are—

"I underscribe and cordially adhere to the Profession of Faith ratified by the Fifth Act of the Second Session, in opposition to the errors of Popery, Socinianism, and Arminianism, and I do promise to submit to the government of the Church as now settled by the law and by Act of Parliament,"

The right hon. Gentleman has referred to the case of Sir David Brewster, and has quoted some very strong expressions from the form of the pleadings instituted against that gentleman. That is a question of law, and it is also a question which is not yet decided, whether the test can be administered to the head of a College who has been already inducted; and in addition to this, Sir D. Brewster has twice already subscribed the Confession of Faith. Let me assume these tests to have been repealed. By the constitution of the Colleges the Principal exercises a general superintendence and control over all the lectures; it is his duty to see that no doctrines of an obnoxious tendency are inculcated in any lectures within the walls of the Colleges. From the very terms of the Statute the connexion between the Church of Scotland and the Universities appears to have been most intimate; and in the great majority of instances the Principals are themselves members of the Established Church. I repeat that it is the duty of the Principal to exercise general superintendence and control over the lectures. But if he himself should be a dissenter from the Established Church, these tests being repealed, you would have no security against his exercising all the influence which belongs to his office in a manner adverse to the Established Church. The present rule has obtained in Scotland for more than a century and a half; and this fact ought not to be forgotten when we are debating so great a change. During that period religious differences have been widely spread, and have been of a most angry character; but I appeal to those who know the history of the Scotch Universities whether it be not the fact that, while there have been angry religious controversies without the walls of the Universities, notwithstanding the existence of these tests, religious peace may be truly said to have prevailed, and angry religious discussions may be declared not to have found their way within the walls of those Universities? Suppose, in the present unhappy state of religious differences in Scotland, a very large body of Free Church professors should be admitted into the Scotch Universities. Is this a danger of an imaginary nature? It must be remembered that, so far from the professors being all nominated by the Crown, a very large number are left to the choice of popular bodies. In the University of Edinburgh the town council of Edinburgh nominate the larger number of professors. It is argued that either the Church of Scotland is composed of a minority of the people, or its numerical strength is so diminished that it is verging on the minority. I should be disposed to demur to that statement. But, if it be accurate, it should be recollected that popular bodies, partaking of the popular feeling, will naturally select persons bearing the image of their own opinions on particular points; and if in a short time a number of vacancies should occur, the probability is, that a very large proportion of the persons nominated by the town council would be persons bitterly hostile to the Established Church of Scotland. Not only is the connexion between the Established Church and these Universities as intimate and as perpetual as an Act of Parliament can make it, but a pledge was given by the British Parliament that they would never take any course which would derogate from the security which had been offered. I ask whether, consistently with that pledge, it be possible to assent to the motion of the right hon. Gentleman, whether, considering the inevitable influence of popular feeling on those who nominate a large proportion of the professors in Scotland, the House will agree that no security shall be taken that the persons so nominated are friends to the Establishment? Now, let us see what is the weight of authority opposed to this change. In the first place, I will refer to the Report of the Commission appointed to inquire into the state of the Scotch Universities in 1826. That Commission, composed of persons of the greatest distinction in Scotland, without reference, in the selection of its members, to party preferences or party views, not only reports most decidedly that tests should continue to be administered with the rigour observed up to that time, but it commented on some neglect with regard to the administering of tests, and pronounced an opinion that tests should be enforced invariably on the nomination of professors. I will now come to a more recent period—I will refer to the decision adopted by the General Assembly in reference to this question within the last six weeks, when the question we are now discussing was brought under its special notice. That assembly is a body composed partly of clergy and partly of laity. The laity may fairly be regarded as the representatives of the general feelings of the members of the Church of Scotland throughout the whole of that country. The elders of various parishes have seats in that assembly; and not only is this the case with regard to the elders of the country parishes, but delegates are sent from the Royal burghs to the General Assembly, who partake of the popular feeling of large constituencies, and, with the single reservation of the elders sitting in General Assembly being members of the Established Church, the choice is open, without reference to grade or distinction. The question being whether the measure now propounded should be supported or not, on a division there were 246 against the proposed change, while only 11 voted in favour of it. It is also to be remarked that there have been no popular meetings on the subject. If I mistake not, indeed, meetings were convened both in Edinburgh and in Glasgow to consider this very proposition. I have every reason to believe that at the meeting in Edinburgh not 100 persons were present; and I am told that in Glasgow, the city next in importance to Edinburgh, and where all subjects, either of a political or religious character, upon which the popular mind is at all excited, are usually considered in large assemblies, no feeling whatever in favour of the proposed change has been manifested. Then, again, with regard to the authority of those who are most entitled to respect among the Dissenters from the Established Church—I allude to those, who have recently gone forth on account of the right of presentation; I allude particularly to Dr. Cunningham, Dr. Chalmers, and Dr. Candlish—I have every reason to believe that, so far from those gentlemen advocating the abolition of the tests, they are among the strongest advocates of them, and have declared decidedly that they would prefer the maintenance of the existing law to the entire abolition of religious tests in Scotland. With respect to the practice of Dissenters generally, when they found a College of their own for the education of ministers in their own religious opinions, they always take ample precautions that all the teachers in that College shall be, in matters of religion, of the same creed as they themselves profess; and, if a Free Church College were to be founded to-morrow, I feel certain that the founders of that College would take ample security that all the professors, whether theological or secular, should conform to the particular opinions which they themselves entertained. The right hon. Gentleman relied on the strong opinion expressed by many of the professors, by the majority of the professors I admit, in the various Universities, in favour of the proposed change. Now, I should be sorry to speak with anything like disrespect of the opinion of those professors; but I must say, that a narrow view of self-interest is not one which we can recognise as the ground of the decision which Parliament ought to adopt. On the very ground taken by the right hon. Gentleman, it must be with us matter of earnest desire to maintain in their integrity the Scotch Universities, without any diminution in their efficiency, or in the number of the youth who flock to them for instruction. I have already stated my conviction, that if the Free Church were establishing a College of its own, it would take ample security, by means of a stringent religious test, for the exclusive character of the teaching in that College. I have reason also to believe that if this Bill should pass and become law, the Established Church of Scotland would not think itself justified in allowing its youth to be educated for the ministry of the Church in the absence of such tests in the existing Universities. My belief is, I deplore it as much as any hon. Member of this House can do—my belief is this, that the time has arrived when sectarian education in Scotland is inevitable; but I further believe, that if the Free Church of Scotland shall establish a College with a stringent test, and if the Church of Scotland shall establish a College of its own for the education of its ministry, by leaving the ancient Universities without any security with regard to the religious teaching afforded in them, you will be taking a course which is certain, if it do not lead to their downfall, at least to deprive them of a considerable number of students. I am of opinion also that in a matter of this kind the habits and feelings of the people of Scotland should be consulted; I do not believe that it is consonant with their feelings or wishes that all security with reference to the religious education afforded in the Universities should be abandoned; I have come to precisely the opposite conclusion. No practical evil of which I am aware has resulted from the moderate use of these particular tests. There has been no lack of able men in the Universities. It must be remembered, too, that no test whatever is administered to the students. The utmost latitude is given for the peculiar belief of the different students, while ample security is taken with regard to the religious teaching of the professors. These Colleges have risen in reputation throughout the long period during which these tests have been enforced; the ablest men have gone forth from them, and students in great numbers have received instruction. There was a large influx of students up to a very recent period, and the Colleges were in a most flourishing condition; and, although the shock given to these institutions by the serious secession which took place about two years ago has been considerable, yet I am bound to state, that the condition of the Universities at present is not one of decay, it is not a condition which would lead us to infer that they have ceased to flourish. I have stated to the House what I believe would be the effect of abolishing the existing tests. Unhappily, those who have left the Church very recently have avowed their bitter hostility to it, and their desire that it should be overthrown. I have stated the reasons why, in a short time, if these tests should be withdrawn, the enemies of the Church will have, if not a preponderating strength in the governing body of the Universities, at any rate such a degree of influence and power as would enable them to carry out their hostile purposes in the University to a considerable extent. Hitherto sectarian teaching has been avoided; but I very much doubt whether this would be the case if the proposed change were effected; I rather think that the change would lead to sectarian teaching and to the prevalence of religious discord. There is another point which should not be omitted in considering this question. In the long series of years which have elapsed since the connexion between the Church of Scotland and the Universities was formed, a large amount of property has been left by private individuals to these various Colleges. Bequests have been made on the faith that the connexion between the Established Church and the Colleges will be maintained. If you dissolve that connexion—if the governing body, which has the power of administering the bequests made, and of exercising the trust reposed, shall become a body dissenting from the Church—it will inevitably happen that property which was intended for members of the Church will be alienated. On the whole, I am decidedly of opinion that, whether we look to law, whether we look to compact, whether we look to prescription, or whether we look to the practical effect, and to the good resulting from the maintenance of the present system, which was ratified by the Union, and has been so long established, it is expedient, with reference to the circumstances and interests of Scotland, to maintain the existing tests. I have considered the matter very carefully, and whatever obloquy may be cast upon me by the right hon. Gentleman, whose custom it is to impute to his adversaries the lowest and most unworthy motives, my conviction is, I repeat, that it is my bounden duty, in existing circumstances, to vote for maintaining the present tests. I think the doctrine propounded by the right hon. Gentleman, that the Established Church of Scotland, as it existed at the time of the Union, was so shaken by the Act of 1712, and by the Act which was passed two years ago, that it is no longer to be regarded as the Established Church of that country, is an exceedingly dangerous one; yet upon that doctrine this measure mainly rests, and the adoption of the measure would be the adoption of the doctrine by the British Legislature. If I had hesitated before, the speech of the right hon. Gentleman would have confirmed my apprehensions with reference to the measure under consideration. On the grounds which I have stated, I certainly feel it my duty to move that the Bill be read a second time this day three months.

Mr. James S. Wortley regretted that no Gentlemen on the opposite side of the House rose to reply to the speech of the right hon. Baronet. It might seem strange, that after the triumphant answer of his right hon. Friend [cheers]—if hon. Gentlemen allowed him to finish the sentence, they would see there was no cause for that cheer—to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, he rose to address the House in opposition to the measure now proposed; but he did not scruple to affirm that he rested his opposition, at least in part, to the measure, on the peculiar circumstances of the time at which it was brought forward. When they heard the Church of Scotland denounced in that House as a religious faction, it was not difficult to foresee that the effect of the success of this Bill would be, to excite still further public feeling in Scotland. His first impression was in favour of conceding what was asked in this measure; but upon inquiry into the state of feeling in Scotland, he conceived himself justified in resisting the Bill. Such was the state of feeling in Scotland, that this measure would be regarded as a triumph by one party over another. This would, therefore, be a most unhappy moment for its adoption. But that was not his only reason for opposing the Bill. For his part, he was for limiting the application of tests as much as possible; but they were not, in this instance, imposing new tests. These tests existed before the Union with Scotland; and they had never been used for the purpose of religious persecution. The utmost latitude, it was admitted, had been given, notwithstanding their existence; and the present attempt to abolish them was prompted by the enemies of the Church of Scotland. There was no question, that if they repealed these tests, a struggle would follow to wrest the Universities from the Church. He agreed with the majority of that House, that they must have a Church connected with the State, and if so, they should have a University connected with the Church. The present question, in fact, was, whether they would give the Free Church a triumph over the Church of Scotland. The members of the Free Church, of whom he wished to speak with every respect, were pledged to use their utmost efforts to destroy the Church; and the carrying of this measure would be received by them as a triumph over it. The question was by no means, whether all classes in Scotland should have education, for it was admitted they had it under the present system; but the question was, whether they would transfer an establishment, founded and endowed by private individuals, to persons who were the advocates of the voluntary system, and consequently the enemies of all religious establishments. The right hon. Gentleman said that, if this Bill were not carried, a new College would be established by the Free Church; but he did not think that the carrying of this measure would prevent the establishment of that College, nor was he disposed to desire that the establishment of that College should be prevented.

Sir G. Grey felt that some apology was due to the House for his addressing it upon a subject more immediately connected with a part of the country with which he could claim no personal connexion. He should have felt reluctance to rise on the present occasion, after the able, the convincing, the unanswered, and unanswerable speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Macaulay), on moving the second reading of the Bill, had not a Gentleman opposite risen as the defender of the course which the Government had taken with reference to this Bill. Having been one of the few Members present when the hon. and learned Member for Leith (Mr. Rutherfurd) moved for and obtained leave to introduce this Bill, and having witnessed with satisfaction the course which the Government then took with respect to it, he felt called upon, as an English Member of the House, to express his regret at the course which the right hon. Baronet (Sir James Graham) felt himself compelled now to take, in opposing the further progress of the Bill. It must have been evident to every one who listened to the right hon. Gentleman, that he spoke against his own convictions, that he reasoned against his own better judgment, that he was speaking, in fact, under a secret compulsion, which imposed upon him an arduous task — a task, which though ably performed, he had performed reluctantly, whilst his whole manner showed that he was not giving utterance to his real sentiments. Pressed as the Government were by the right hon. Member for Edinburgh, with the most crushing arguments by which he illustrated their inconsistency in the course which they now adopted, as compared with that which they had taken when leave was given to introduce the Bill, and their still more marked inconsistency in the course which they were now taking, in urging the reimposition of those tests in Scotland, as compared with that which, to their credit, they had adopted with regard to the Irish Colleges Bill, and to which they declared themselves prepared to adhere; the right hon. Gentleman got up, and took credit to the Government for their very inconsistency, and stated that they were not to be bound in their future course by any regard to what had been done on former occasions; and that the policy of the Government was an ever-varying policy—a policy varying according to the circumstances in which they found themselves called upon to act. The policy of any Government must, to a certain extent, vary according to circumstances; but the right hon. Gentleman seemed to have forgotten that there was such a thing as principle even in the variations of policy, which should keep them within the limits of consistency; and that their policy should, in all its changes, be free from that discord and inconsistency which exposed the Government to such severe reproofs as were justly administered by his right hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh. He heard with deep regret, from the right hon. Baronet, the avowal, the truth of which must have been forced upon the Government, since the former debate upon this Bill, that sectarian collegiate education in Scotland was now inevitable. The hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. J. S. Wortley) asked what grievance was complained of? There were no better terms in which he (Sir George Grey) could describe that grievance than as a sectarian collegiate education for Scotland. As to the argument on which the Government rested the alteration of their policy, what circumstances had occurred, subsequently to the former debate, which induced them to come to the conviction that the hope which they then entertained had been destroyed? How long was it since the Lord Advocate was examined, and gave his evidence before the Commission of Inquiry into the Criminal Law of Scotland? In answer to the following question:—

"Are there any penal enactments in Scotland, as represented by Mr. Hume in his Commentaries, affecting persons differing from the national religion, except Papists?" his reply was, 'There are restrictions. We have now pending in the House of Commons, a Bill, brought in to relieve from disabilities, in regard to professorships in the Universities.'"

At page 41, the Report of the Commission stated that—

"In Scotland there appear to be no religious tests as a qualification for holding offices or places of trust, except for the admission of the office-bearers, professors, and teachers, in the Universities, and for parochial schoolmasters; in the latter of which cases, tests have always been imposed, though in some of the Universities they have been, to a great extent, in abeyance. As this subject is at present under the consideration of Parliament, we do not consider it proper to offer any opinion upon it."

They expressly abstained from recommending the continuance of tests, which came under the class of penal enactments, because a Bill upon the subject was pending in Parliament, the Lord Advocate not having then intimated his opinion that the Bill was to be opposed. The hon. Member for Perthshire (Mr. Home Drummond) was a Member of that Commission; and he distinctly stated, that his authority, as a Member of that Commission, was not to be quoted in favour of the continuance of these tests; and advised Her Majesty's Ministers to be very cautious before they opposed the passage of this Bill. The right hon. Baronet attempted to show that the continuance of the tests had only been partial. Nobody denied that. The right hon. Gentleman was unable to adduce a single instance in which a professor was prevented from accepting a professorship, or any in which a professor was removed from his professorship, for not taking the tests. A case occurred to him (Sir George Grey), in which a known Episcopalian, within two years after taking his degree, became Greek professor at the University of Glasgow, and who remained an Episcopalian during the continuance of his professorship, and continued an Episcopalian until he died. He now alluded to Sir Daniel Sanford. [Sir J. Graham: He did take the test.] He had no reason to suppose he did, but if an English Episcopalian could take the test, what reason was there that a Member of the Free Church could not—if an Episcopalian were admitted, under such circumstances, to a professorship—why should not a Free Churchman be admitted also? So far as he could gather, the whole argument if argument it could be admitted to be, for maintaining these tests, was founded upon the danger which was apprehended from Free Churchmen and members of the Established Church meeting as professors in the same University. If the passage of this Bill were prevented, he did not see how the calamity of a sectarian collegiate education was to be averted; and he hoped the House would interpose, by suffering the Bill to pass, to avert such a calamity. The result of a sectarian education would be to multiply and perpetuate those differences, which he earnestly hoped would be speedily allayed and diminished, by bringing members of the Free Church and of the Church as established by law within the same University, and there training the youth of different persuasions together. The right hon. Gentleman said that during a century and a half these tests had been, to a certain extent, in operation. But let him remind the right hon. Gentleman, that during that time, comparatively speaking, religious peace had been known in Scotland. During that century and a half, religious differences had not occupied the prominent place in men's minds which they formerly occupied. But what would be the case now? Every man would look to his neighbour with suspicion; and he feared that the differences which he deprecated, would grow and multiply as before. Such would be the effect of obstructing this Bill. The hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. S. Wortley) said, that the General Assembly had this year discontinued the attempt recently made against Sir David Brewster. But would this attempt not be repeated, or might it not be repeated? The Assembly of this year had discontinued the proceedings; but that of next year might encourage similar attempts, and give them their sanction and countenance. It was to prevent the possibility of the recurrence of such attempts that he supported the present Bill. To the Bill he gave his cordial assent, and he could not help thinking that the House should interpose between the opinion expressed by the Government, that a sectarian collegiate education was inevitable for Scotland, and their decision that no attempt was to be made to avert such a result. He deeply regetted the course which the Government had determined upon pursuing; for, as the natural result of that course, he saw springing up a rival University to the Universities already existing—a rivalry which, he feared, would go far to reopen all the sources of religious difference and animosity, and to perpetuate the schism which had already unhappily taken place. He earnestly trusted, that before it was too late the Government would reconsider their decision.

Sir R. Inglis said, his right hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh would acquit him of any intention to speak of him with any disrespect, if he said that of his speech — brilliant and beautiful as were many of its passages—there was only one argument which seemed to him (Sir R. Inglis) to be a piece of ordnance that had made any impression on the bulwark he had attacked. It was this—that whereas there was a compact entered into in 1707 by the Act of Union, there was at present no person entitled to claim the benefit of that compact. It was true, said his right hon. Friend, that if any persons remained in the same condition in 1845 as they were in 1707, he would admit their claim, as the Church of Scotland and the Universities connected with it, to have the protection of those tests which it was the object of this Bill to remove; but that the Church of Scotland, since 1842, had ceased to be that Church contemplated by the Act of 1690. That argument struck him (Sir R. Inglis) at the time; but, on reconsideration, it seemed to him to prove too much, as it proved the utter extinction of any Church to which the faith of the nation was pledged. It could not be said, that it could be sought in the Free Church; and, if not, what alternative was there but to recognise the corporate body of the Church of Scotland, the petition from whom, through their authorized Assembly, was then lying on the Table? The question was not whether they should impose tests, but whether they should remove those which had existed for the last 150 years. It was clear, by reference not merely to the decrees of the General Assembly, but to Acts of Parliament, that from the period of the Reformation, the intention was, that the institution of the Church should be connected with academical education, and that they, and they only, should have rule and authority in the Colleges of Scotland who were in communion with the Church of Scotland. It was not quite fair in the right hon. Member for Edinburgh to taunt his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department with inconsistency, because he did not recognise religion as the essential basis of education in the Irish Colleges Bill. His right hon. Friend had expressly declared that Ireland was an exceptional case —that the course he felt bound to adopt differed from his general conviction, and from that which, under other and happier circumstances, he should have been ready to apply to Ireland itself. The question was altogether different when applied to Scotland, where, he believed, the large body of the people were still attached to the national Established Church, whose ministers for the last forty years had laboured most assiduously in the discharge of their spiritual functions. He was also ready to bear his testimony to the piety, self-devotion, and great sacrifices made by the ministers of the Free Church; although he could not think they were justified by a difference, not in doctrine or discipline, but in church government, in breaking up the peace of Scotland by their secession. He should vote against the Bill.

Mr. Pringle hoped the House would reject this Bill, which, he believed, if passed, would be most injurious, if not wholly ruinous, to the Universities and the interests of education in Scotland. These tests had existed in the Universities of Scotland from a period coeval almost with the foundation of the Universities themselves. Episcopalians themselves, such as Sir Daniel Sandford, had not objected to take them, and there was no reason why members of the Free Church should refuse subscription. Only those would be excluded by their operation who refused to pledge themselves that they would not use their powers or privileges to the prejudice or subversion of the Church of Scotland. The General Assembly of the Church of Scotland had petitioned the Legislature in the strongest terms against the Bill. The Free Church, and many other religious denominations in Scotland, had established educational institutions for the instruction of persons of their own communion; and, if this Bill were adopted, the Established Church of Scotland would be the only ecclesiastical establishment in that country which would be denied the privilege of possessing academical institutions for the education of its members. He called upon hon. Gentlemen to reflect what would be the result of adopting this measure. At present the patronage connected with the University of Edinburgh was vested in the Town Council, which had the power of appointing the professors, subject to the control of the Act of Parliament imposing the existing tests; but, if those tests were abolished, every election would probably give rise to a contest between the two parties in the Church, in which the students of the University would necessarily be involved. He also entertained strong objections to this measure on the ground that it would materially affect the whole system of education in Scotland. The system of national education in that country had been mainly, if not solely, originated by the Established Church; and the result showed how faithfully that Establishment had, in this respect, discharged its duties; but the adoption of the Bill now before the House would, in his opinion, be most injurious to the extension of education in Scotland. On these grounds, he hoped the House would not assent to the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. C. Buller said, when he recollected the proud eminence on which the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken stood in the eyes of the country on account of the singular sacrifice he had made of interest to conscience in the course of the present Session, he was prepared to expect somewhat more clear principles of morality from his lips. He could scarcely conceive a test more grating to the conscientious feelings and the honest pride of an honourable man, than that which the hon. Gentleman would keep up, and for having taken which, for the purpose of obtaining a professorship, the member of another church than the Presbyterian Church of Scotland was now defended. The right hon. Gentleman and the hon. Member for Selkirkshire contended that this test did not operate as an exclusion; but what, he asked, could tend more to keep out the members of another church from those professorships, than to extort from them a declaration that they practised the worship of a Church to which they did not belong? A man might, perhaps, as in the case of Sir D. Sandford, feel himself justified, by the usages of society, and the lax tone of morals around him, in making the required declaration, though he was a member of a different church; but this only showed the perfect farce of the profession. But he could scarcely understand such an argument as coming from an hon. Member who had most consistently, certainly, supported the proposition for separate religious instruction being provided in the Irish Colleges for the Protestant apart from the Roman Catholic pupils—

Mr. Pringle: The difference between the Roman Catholic Church and the Protestant Church is a difference of essentials; while that between the Episcopal Church and the Presbyterian Church of Scotland, is not a difference of essentials.

Mr. C. Buller contended that such a distinction did not justify the test, which was one that ought not to continue; and seeing the principle on which the Government had acted with regard to Ireland, he could not understand how they could support it. The right hon. Baronet (Sir James Graham) rested his argument in favour of the application of a different principle to Scotland from that the Government had applied in the case of Ireland, upon the different circumstances of the two countries. Now, although he was by no means disposed to complain of the Government for having at length altered their policy with regard to Ireland, and adopted a course of which he entirely approved, he could not but agree with all that had been stated by his right hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Macaulay). He could perfectly understand a change of opinions leading to a change of measures, and conscientious conviction , though long in coming, leading to the adoption of sounder views. But he thought they had a right to expect to see the same sincerity evinced by the Government in the maintenance of the new views, as had been exhibited in support of the old ones, and not that the change should be merely that instead of acting upon the principles by which they had formerly been influenced, they had now, having discovered that those principles were erroneous, determined henceforth to act on no principle at all. The right hon. Baronet had said that the utter absence of all religious tests, either from students or professors, in the Irish Colleges Bill, as proposed by the Government, arose from the peculiar circumstances of Ireland; but the right hon. Baronet had not told them what those peculiar circumstances were; for every circumstance which the right hon. Baronet stated as justifying the application of that principle in regard to Ireland, would equally justify the application of the same principle to Scotland. What were the peculiar circumstances of Ireland? The right hon. Baronet had stated that the people of Ireland were in a state of religious difference, and that hostility and animosity on that ground prevailed; and he added, that the evil now was, that the existing educational institutions of the country were in the hands of one religious denomination only; and if you established any religious test as applying to the new Colleges, you would create so many sectarian institutions for education, wherein those religious distinctions and differences which were so mischievous in after life, would be inculcated in the minds of the students, and that the object of a wise statesman in such a state of things was to bring parties of different religions to receive a common education together with the view of implanting in their minds feelings of good will and friendliness to each other. But was the state of things which the right hon. Baronet so described peculiar to Ireland? Thanks to the policy of the present Government, it was not! What was the state of Scotland at this time? The Government had done all they could to bring Scotland into the same state in regard to religious differences as Ireland was. The great mischief in Ireland was, that you had there an Established Church richly endowed, invested with exclusive privileges and honours, which was not the Church of the great majority of the people. In Scotland, up to five years ago, the Established Church of Scotland was the Church of the great majority of the people —but who would now venture to say that that Church represented the religion of the barest possible majority? The argument against the application of religious tests, then, was as applicable to Scotland as to Ireland. Was it not as important that they should not keep up sectarian education in Scotland as in Ireland? He was astonished to hear the right hon. Baronet, in speaking of a country not hitherto torn by sectarianism, declare in his place in Parliament that Scotland was, he feared, in that state in which all education must henceforth be—sectarian. It had been said the object of the opponents of this Bill was not to establish any new test, but merely to keep up old tests. For 150 years the great majority of the people of Scotland had professed one religion; the application of a religious test, therefore, was comparatively unimportant. It did not, under such circumstances, keep out any one who desired to be a member of the Universities; the test fell into desuetude. The right hon. Baronet said that the test still existed at the University of Edinburgh, and that those who chose to take it might. He had never before heard of an optional test. If, however, it was to be maintained on the condition that those who wished might take it, and those who objected should not be compelled, he would have no objection. But let that be understood at St. Andrew's as well as at Edinburgh; and do not, in future, allow such a man as Sir David Brewster to be excluded from his professorship for the glory of God and the safety of the Church. It was said also that, practically. the tests have done no harm. He could not admit that they had done no harm. The right hon. Baronet had referred to the professorships of moral and natural philosophy, and the possibility, if the tests were abolished, of those who filled those chairs instilling improper religious opinions into the minds of their pupils; but what security had they that that might not occur now? Three or four years ago a serious schism took place in the Church of Scotland, and a large portion of both clergy and laity seceded. Those who were of one religion before became divided, and religious differences previously unknown in Scotland prevailed. And now it was that that party, who, by the aid of the law, had obtained the supremacy over the others, came forward to insist on the application of those tests which had previously remained a dead letter, for the purpose of keeping their opponents out of office. This, then, was practically and virtually a new test. They were threatened that if one party resorted to tests, the other would take refuge in sectarian education. In his speech upon the 1st of May, the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary seemed perfectly sensible of the mischief likely to result to Scotland, should a College be established by the Free Church party. Now, however, the right hon. Gentleman seemed to have come to the conclusion that the establishment of such an institution was a necessity which he must submit to; and the evil which he was trying to guard against in one part of Her Majesty's dominions, he was deliberately inflicting on another. On the occasion to which he had alluded, the right hon. Baronet mentioned with great respect an authority which he treated with as much contempt now. He then remarked that a great majority of the professors in every University in Scotland had petitioned for the abolition of these tests. He now seemed to say that these professors were interested parties in the well-being of the College, and, that, therefore, their opinions were not to be adopted, their wishes not attended to. He did not think that if these gentlemen expressed an opinion favourable to the abolition of these tests, that that opinion should be sneered at on the ground of the pecuniary interest they had in the attendance upon their lectures. He had observed, with great regret, the course which Government had taken upon this occasion. Indeed, their whole conduct towards the Church of Scotland, ever since the disruption, seemed that of men who had taken sides with one party, and were determined to support it at all hazards. The abolition of these tests would be a highly conciliatory measure as regarded the Free Church party. The assembly of that Church had petitioned in favour of their being done away with. The present was a great opportunity for conciliating that Church, and if they ever did hope to heal the schism which had taken place, now was the time to operate upon men's minds. But if they went on in a course of intolerance towards the seceding party, they would only exasperate the differences which had arisen, and render that schism which they all deplored as permanent as it was extensive.

The Lord Advocate said, that the Bill which was now moved to be read a second time, proposed to abolish tests in the Universities of Scotland—except with respect to certain chairs and theological professorships. It was not proposed by this Bill to establish any other tests in the room of those established by law. This Bill simply proposed to repeal those tests, or, in other words, to repeal the Act of Security. Now, it would be remembered, that there were at present no Colleges or Universities in Scotland for the education of the clergy, except those with respect to which it was proposed to repeal those tests. At the date of the Union it was made a particular condition of the Union that those Universities should be maintained in their existing state, and that those tests now sought to be abolished should be preserved. This was part of the Treaty of Union, and was afterwards introduced in the Act of Union. A proposal was now made to interfere with that arrangement, and to repeal those tests, and not, instead of them, to substitute any other tests. It was not even proposed to modify those tests, but absolutely to repeal them. He was not aware that any body of Dissenters or Presbyterians had expressed a wish that those tests should be repealed. The resolutions which had been passed by the Assembly of the Free Church did not go so far as that. He had said that the maintenance of these tests was one of the conditions of the Union; and he would ask them to consider, when they sought the abolition of those tests and the violation of the Union, whether they had caused any practical evil? He had heard of no practical evil arising from them, and of no complaint of their operations, except from the University of St. Andrew's. Those tests were uniformly observed, except in the University of Edinburgh; and the reason they were not more strictly observed was, that members of other Universities, who had previously taken the test in their own Universities, were frequently, on account of its superior emoluments, transferred to professorships in the University of Edinburgh. But it was said that within the last two years a state of things had arisen in Scotland which rendered it necessary to interfere with the present Establishment of Scotland; to break in upon the security of the Church of Scotland, which had existed ever since the Reformation. Now, what was that state of matters? Two years ago a large secession had taken place from the Church, so that those who dissented from the Establishment were proportionably more numerous than they were before: was that a sufficient reason for abolishing all tests whatever? Was it the opinion even of those men who had left the Church that no tests ought to exist—that there ought to be no security as to the religious character of the teachers of youth? He would read to the House the opinions of some eminent divines of that body, from which they would see that they were willing that the tests should be so altered or modified as to admit to the Universities all classes of Presbyterians—that was to say, that they should admit the body to which they belonged. But was it supposed that they were willing to see all tests swept away, and that no securities should be taken for the religious character of the professors in Universities? Far from it. In the resolutions which the General Assembly of the Free Church passed preparatory to the petition which had been presented to the House, they state—

"That they are opposed to the present tests as now interpreted; but that they support the present Bill in so far as it removed those sectarian tests, and prepared the way for the Universities being placed on a truly national basis."

It was plain, therefore, that they were not in favour of the abolition of all tests, but they wished them to be so regulated as to admit their own members. To the same effect he found one of their most eminent divines, who was the very soul and spirit of the great secession that had taken place —Dr. Candlish — deprecated the utter abolition of all tests, and added, that he would rather see the present tests continued, than that there should be no security at all. They even professed a determination to establish tests in their own College, where they had already established not only a theological chair, but a logic and a moral philosophical class, and were providing teachers of Latin and Greek. Was it to be supposed that these men would stop short in their scheme, because the tests were abolished in the existing Universities? The thing was altogether out of the question. Or did they suppose that they would retain the members of the Established Church? Why, they entertained, to say the least, the same objections with Dr. Candlish, and they also would establish a University of their own. So the result of this measure would be that they would please neither the one Church nor the other — they would ruin the Universities, and they would please neither party. It would please no party except those—he could understand their motives — who were in the course of establishing a rival University, and who might wish to strengthen it by destroying the usefulness of the existing Universities. But he conceived that that was a motive which would not receive much countenance in the House. He submitted, therefore, that no case whatever had been made out for the passing of this Bill.

Mr. P. M. Stewart was anxious to ask the Government to adopt the suggestion which had more than once been pressed upon them to-night, to reconsider their intentions with regard to this Bill, which they had already done, not once but three times, and at last to come to the resolution of supporting the Bill. The Government would not be astonished at his making this request, for, if he was not misinformed, they had already changed their minds upon the subject three times since the introduction of the Bill. They came down to the House, he understood, determined to oppose the introduction of the Bill; but the statement made on that occasion by the hon. Member for Leith was of so convincing and startling a character, that it was perceptible to all in the House that another resolution was come to in the course of that admirable speech, and the Bill was allowed to be introduced. The right hon. Baronet the Home Secretary then declared his resolution to be guided by the opinion of the people of Scotland. Now what was the opinion of the people of Scotland? It did not consist of the isolated opinion of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland. That never was held to be the opinion of the people of Scotland, even in the best days of the Assembly. But it was said that the tests were optional whether the professors should take them or not. If the tests were of so loose a character as that, he thought the sooner they were repealed the better. He therefore asked the Government again to change their minds, and to pass this Bill. They were bound to do something to alleviate the evils which they had caused. He believed that what they did was done in ignorance; but that was an additional reason why they should pass this Bill, which would be accepted as a healing measure by the great body of the members of the Free Church, notwithstanding all that had been said by the learned Lord opposite, and which would inflict no injury whatever upon the Established Church; and he implored them, therefore, to return to their former opinion, and to pass this Bill.

Sir R. Peel said: I promise the Gentlemen who are anxious for a division, that I will detain them but for a short period. The ground on which I shall resist this Motion I shall state very briefly. I have never concealed from myself the difficulties which the Government would have to encounter in proposing this new plan of academical education in Ireland. I foresaw that an attempt to form new institutions for the purpose of giving academical education in a country so circumstanced in respect to population and religious opinion, must evidently subject the Government to the charges which have, in my opinion, most unjustly been brought against them in the course of this discussion. It has been said, that the principles which we adopted in Ireland, in the formation of these new academical institutions, necessarily compelled us to apply those principles to other parts of the Empire, and that we were acting inconsistently, and in violation of our principles, if we declined so to apply those principles. Sir, what are the circumstances under which those new institutions in Ireland are proposed to be founded? We wish to provide, at the expense of the State, a good secular education. We do not propose to introduce a system of theological education. We do not propose to educate persons intended for the ministry of the Church. We do not propose to disconnect religion from a secular education; but we do propose, on account of the peculiar circumstances of the population, providing a secular education at the charge of the State; and we call on individuals to make provision for the religious education which the young men in these Colleges are to receive. We find existing in Ireland, and in other parts of the kingdom, institutions of great antiquity intended for the education of persons to serve in the ministry. In England we find the two Universities, and in this metropolis we find King's College, an institution in immediate connexion with the Establishment. In Ireland we find Trinity College, Dublin, in existence; we find Maynooth, for the education of the Roman Catholic priesthood; and in the north of Ireland we find the College of Belfast, at which many of the Presbyterian ministers receive their education. It is quite true, that we propose, with respect to this secular education, after very mature deliberation, not to impose as a condition, on the appointment of the professors, the taking of any particular tests. Then we are told, that we are chargeable with inconsistency, and with the violation of principle, because we do not follow the same course with respect to the existing institutions in Ireland, Scotland, and England, which are intended for the education of the ministers of the Church. Do we propose to affect Trinity College, Dublin? We avow that we do not. You charge us with violation of principle, because we don't open Dublin College to the Roman Catholics. We said from the first that we did not intend to interfere with existing institutions. We deny that the principles on which we founded the new Colleges in Ireland, are justly applicable either to Dublin or to the Universities of this country. We desired to institute new Colleges without provoking opposition to them, by encouraging an apprehension that the same principles must be applied to existing institutions. We defended the new establishments solely by reference to the present state of Ireland; for we were aware, that nothing could have induced some gentlemen to have supported them, unless we said that the principle was not the best that might be acted on. The peculiarity of the case, and the circumstances of the population of Ireland, were the only grounds on which we defended our measure. What security have we taken in lieu of the application of tests? We contend that as tests are not to be applied, we should have some security, and we therefore propose to give the Crown, at the commencement, the absolute power of appointment, and the absolute power of removal. What do we find in Scotland? We find there, that there are certain academical institutions which are immediately connected with the Church of that country. We find, that in those institutions, the ministers of the Church generally receive their education. We find, that this very Bill admits, that the academical institutions of Scotland are in connexion with the Church; for it is expressly stated by it that nothing in it shall extend to the chairs of divinity, theology, or church history; or any offices, the holders of which are ex officio connected with the Church. What else do we find with respect to those Universities in Scotland? We find an engagement entered into at the time of the Union, that the professors of those Universities shall subscribe a certain declaration implying their adherence to and conformity with the doctrines of the Church. Can there be any doubt as to the meaning of the conditions of the Act of Union? It is required, that before the admission of a professor, he shall acknowledge and subscribe to "the Confession of Faith" as the confession of his faith; and that he shall practise and conform to the worship and usage of the Church, and shall submit to the government and discipline thereof, and shall not endeavour to prejudice or subvert the same. The right hon. Gentleman fully admits the binding force of that engagement. He says that it is a solemn compact, and that he will not attempt to quibble it away. And what is his reasoning? He says, that in the reign of Queen Anne, in 1711, an Act of Parliament was passed, which was a violation of the Act of Union, and an encroachment on the privileges of the Church—that is to say, he contends, because 130 years since there was a violation of that compact, that we are at liberty now to disregard it altogether. And to what extent does that argument of the right hon. Gentleman go? It goes to a denial of an Established Church in Scotland altogether. It asserts that there has been none since 1711. The right hon. Gentleman says, that he will not quibble away the Act of Union. Shall we say, then, that we are at liberty to set aside the Act of Union, because 130 years since an Act of Parliament was passed of which you complain? Shall we allege that in consequence of the passing of that Act there is no Established Church in Scotland? Then the right hon. Gentleman says, that the doctrines of the Free Church are more in conformity with the doctrines of the Church at the time of the Act of Union than at present. Before the secession of the Free Church party from the Established Church of Scotland, they held no such doctrine as that held by the right hon. Gentleman. They drew a clear distinction between the Act of 1710 or 1711, and the claim which they preferred, to be exempted from the jurisdiction of the civil tribunals; and before that disruption of the Church they complained of my right hon. Friend for having classed the Act of Anne, which restored to the patrons the right of patronage, with the claim which they preferred for exemption from the civil tribunals. They said, expressly, that the repeal of the Act of Anne was desirable; but yet that it was distinct from their claim to exemption from civil jurisdiction. They said, that though one were refused, the Church might, nevertheless, continue to carry on its government in connexion with the State; but the refusal of the other would render it impossible. Distinct claims like these might, the Special Commission ventured to think, have obtained a reply, in which they would not have been mixed up one with another. Therefore, the Members of the Free Church denied that the Act of Anne was a violation of the compact entered into by the Act of Union. Then, if we were to say to the Church of Scotland, that we are at liberty to set aside the Act of Union, is it not clear that no long interval may elapse, if we acquiesce in this Bill, when it will be said to us, "You have established those institutions in Ireland; you have no tests there; but you have done more—you have disregarded the claims of the Scotch Universities; you have abolished the tests which you found there immediately connected with the Church; now we ask you why you refuse to extend that double principle?—why do you not abolish also the tests in the English Universities?" Now, I own that I do contemplate the separation of the youth of Scotland from their Church with peculiar anxiety and apprehension; and is it not possible, if the Church of Scotland loses that security to which she thinks she is entitled under the Act of Union, that you may remove from her the whole of her divinity students? Your own Bill provides that the theological chairs shall still be subject to the test. I apprehend that even that modification of your Bill will possibly lead to the institution by the Free Church of academies intended for ecclesiastical education. The hon. Gentleman who spoke last, taunts us with some inconsistency in having voted for this Bill being introduced, and in now opposing it on the second reading. Sir, we were assured that this Bill would meet with general concurrence on the part of the people of Scotland; and I am not prepared to say that if the general voice of the people of Scotland had been in favour of it—I am not at all prepared to say, that in that case, Parliament would not have been perfectly right in agreeing to it; but, I must say, that when the Union of the two countries was perfected, the engagements then entered into are not lightly to be set aside, contrary to the wishes and the expression of the public opinion of the people of Scotland. What demonstration have we had on the part of the Church of Scotland in favour of this Bill? Instead of such a demonstration, it was by a majority of 240 to 11 on the part of the constituted authorities of the Church that they stated their belief that these securities were granted to them by the Act of Union, and that they applied to Parliament for the maintenance of them. Were there petitions from Scotland in favour of the repeal of these tests? Was there any demonstration from Scotland? [Mr. Hume: Yes.] I don't deny that there may have been some one or two petitions; but does the hon. Gentleman mean to contend that the opinion of the people of Scotland, as it can be inferred from the demonstrations in Scotland, is to be taken as being in favour of this Bill? [Mr. Hume: Yes.] To what extent have petitions been presented? [Mr. Hume: None against; and all for it. Is the recorded opinion of the Church of Scotland itself to be regarded as nothing? [Mr. Hume: Not more than the recorded opinion of the Roman Catholic prelates against the Irish Colleges Bill.] I said in that case, as I say here, that where there is a compact and an Act of Union, we ought not, without the gravest considerations, to set aside the provisions of such a compact. I don't mean to plead them against the voice of the people of Scotland. I don't mean to say, if the opinion of the Presbyterians were decidedly in favour of this Act, that we should rigidly adhere to a measure which was opposed to the sense and wishes of the people; but I repeat, with respect to this compact, as I said with respect to that of the Irish Act of Union, which guarantees the continuance of the Established Church, that these are matters not to be slightly regarded—that they are matters entitled to the most serious consideration, if you wish the faith and the honour of Parliament to be respected. And, with regard to Ireland, we did think that the advantages to be derived from those new academical institutions, coupled with the desire to conciliate the good will of the people of that country towards them, fully warranted their establishment. We have felt that a great prejudice would arise against these new institutions, if it were thought that the principle must necessarily be applied to other institutions of great antiquity, intended for other purposes, and guaranteed by positive contract; and upon that ground we have deemed it perfectly consistent with the principles we have maintained in respect to those new institutions, not to insist upon the condition of a test, and yet in respect to other institutions connected with the Established Church, founded for theological education, intended for the instruction of the ministers of religion, to apply a different rule; and while we impose no test on the professors in the new institutions, not to alter the system which requires, in the case of the ancient institutions that the professors and instructors of youth should take those tests which the law and usage of the country impose upon them. It is my intention to oppose the measure.

Lord J. Russell: I am sure it can hardly be necessary to argue further upon this question; but I do request the House, now that they are able to extricate themselves from it, not to be involved in the humiliating dilemma in which Her Majesty's Government would place them. Hitherto it has been supposed that these matters of education, of religious establishment, of religious tests, were matters of principle, one way or the other. Men who took the view that they were necessary for the maintenance of religion, and useful for the benefit of the State, like the hon. Member for Oxford University (Sir R. Inglis), steadily upheld them; other men, who conceived that they were a snare for scrupulous consciences, and a cobweb broken through at once by those who had no faith and no scruple about these things, as constantly denounced them as worse than useless, and prayed for their abolition. Either course may be taken; either course may be defended by argument. My hon. Friend the Member for the University of Oxford can well defend his opinion; my right hon. Friend who sits near me (Mr. Macaulay) is fully capable of defending the opinion which we hold. But, now we have a Government which holds neither to one principle nor the other, which tells us one day that there is no need of religious tests—that if you wish to provide for the good of Ireland you should have none—that they have been found utterly useless—and which goes out of its way to persuade the House to reject them; and comes down on the next day, saying, that such tests are absolutely necessary for the maintenance of religion in Scotland, and that otherwise to act would be (in the language of the Lord Advocate) to act upon latitudinarian principles. Now, I do put it to the House, let them assert one principle or the other. Let them assert, as I hope they will, the principle which they have stated with regard to the Irish Colleges; but, at all events, do not let them involve themselves in the reproach that they are utterly indifferent to the matter, whether there shall be religious tests or no; that it suits the convenience of the Ministry one day to denounce them and expose their futility, and it suits their convenience the next day to uphold them for the sake of certain interests, and that this House is ready servilely to agree with them, and set at nought that character which it has formerly sustained. There is an old story of two knights meeting upon different sides of a shield, and one saw the side which was black, and the other the side which was white; the one knight maintained that the shield was white, and the other that it was black; and they fought a desperate battle, and were ready to peril their lives for the sake of the maintenance of their opinions. One can believe that each trusting to his own eyesight acted honestly and faithfully. But to tell one of the knights to come round to the black side and say that the shield was entirely black, and then go to the white side and say it was entirely white [a laugh], and to claim credit after that for acting upon a conscientious view, is really what no fiction has ever supposed, and what, until this night, no one ever imagined would be realized in the conduct of an Administration in this country. I will declare my own opinion fairly to the House with regard to religious tests applied to secular offices of all kinds, professorships as well as others; I believe, that while they entangle scrupulous persons, because of some (perhaps no very important) difference of opinion which prevents them taking the test, they are no guard against infidelity and irreligion. And I would point at once to three examples—Lord Bolingbroke, who was Secretary of State, Mr. Hume, who held office abroad, and Mr. Gibbon, who held office in this country; each at a time when the sacramental test was imposed, and when persons were obliged in that solemn ordinance to avow their belief in the doctrines of the Church of England. Did it prevent any one of those men from being a holder of office in the State, and being a good Tory supporter of the doctrine of Church and State? Not the least in the world; they were eminent statesmen as well as authors, every one of them; and yet my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford University would rely upon such a test. But take the actual instance on the other side. My hon. Friend has said truly that here is no question of the fundamental doctrines of religion, that there is not even a question of church government, generally speaking; but there is a difference on one point of church government; and the hon. Gentleman who has so distinguished himself this Session by the vote he gave contrary to his interest (Mr. Pringle), and who ought after that testimony to his character to be listened to by the House, has said, that the difference between Roman Catholics and Protestants is a difference in essentials; but that that between many Protestant denominations is a difference in non-essentials. I ask, what is the difference upon which you found this test? What are the men you wish to keep out by the reimposition of it—for it is a reimposition? You exclude men who do not differ upon doctrine, or even upon the general question of Presbyterian church government as held by Presbyterians in all times, but who differ upon one point of church government, which is in dispute, and for that one point you would keep up a test to exclude them from being professors of natural philosophy and mathematics. Is not that an application of a test which prevents men holding very nearly the same opinions from coming together? If there is any man of eminence as a mathematician, would you prevent his being professor of mathematics in the University of Glasgow, because he did not hold with the present General Assembly of the Church of Scotland upon the question of Church patronage? I am of opinion that there can be no difficulty in men among whom there are such differences as this attending the same instructors, and being guided by their lessons, to the advantage of all. It has occurred to me, in consequence of late discussions, to recollect that when I was at Edinburgh, attending the University there, I heard the last lectures that were given by an eminent man—Professor Dugald Stewart; we attended the lessons of that great professor, being of different persuasions as we were, and when he retired from the chair, we, his pupils, formed a Committee to draw up an Address, and express our sense of his high merits, and regret at his retirement; there was on that Committee a Presbyterian, there were members of the Church of England, but it so happened that the persons to whom we confided the task of drawing up the Address which was adopted was a Roman Catholic—the present Lord Fingall. I mention it as a proof that men who differ may meet and derive instruction from the same eminent men without any compromise of their religious faith. Then, if that is the case, what is there which should prevent you from acceding to the abolition of these tests? You say, there is an opinion in Scotland against it; and what is the proof given by the two right hon. Gentlemen who have spoken? Why, they tell us that in the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, a vast majority, I think, of 240 to 11, put a negative upon the proposition. No doubt it did. The members of the General Assembly are the clergy of the class who are interested; they are the excluding body. Why, suppose you asked the Primate of Ireland to call the clergy of the Established Church of Ireland together at Armagh, and put to them the question whether Maynooth should be endowed, or even the new Colleges erected? Why, in regard to Maynooth, I very much doubt whether there would be that minority of 11; I doubt whether even five or six of them would vote in favour of that or any measure considered detrimental in any way to the Established Church, and admitting others to the privileges of which hitherto they have had exclusive enjoyment. As to any proof of the opinion of the people of Scotland, that must be given by those whom they send to represent them in this House, to tell it to us by their votes; and it is not for you, the Ministers of the Crown, to overbear that opinion, and to tell us that we must not pass this law, because it is adverse to opinions which you have ascertained by consulting the General Assembly. But, then, it is against the Act of Union. Why, have we not altered that in various instances? In bringing forward the Roman Catholic Relief Bill, the present First Lord of the Treasury stated, that by the Act of Union with Scotland, both the electors and the elected (for Parliament) were bound to make declarations against the Roman Catholic faith, and that in taking away all those disabilities, it was not fit to leave that which was imposed by that Act of Union. In that instance, I believe, he did not very much consult the wishes and opinions of the people of Scotland. He acted, however, according to all true policy and wisdom. What is to prevent us in this case from establishing a good rule, and doing that for the benefit of the people of Scotland which I really believe will be approved by them? But, after all, without arguing this question any further, I am disposed to ask the House to come to the establishment of some principle or other upon these questions. My hon. Friend the Member for Oxford University says, that the Government have a general policy, and that they have made an exception to it in the case of the Irish Colleges. My hon. Friend may be right; but the greater part of those on this side of the House, when they heard the right hon. Gentleman opposite, thought that the argument was upon general grounds, and that it was a very convincing proof that the non-admission of religious tests would be a benefit. It would be very shallow to say that it is useful to have no religious tests as a general question; but that it is useful to have them with regard to establishments already made. I do not conceive that such a distinction could be very long maintained. But let us adopt one principle or the other. The country really wants it. I believe they will be disposed to adopt sound principles on this question if you lead them aright. If, on the contrary, you are determined to maintain these tests rigidly, why they will very likely follow what I consider a prejudiced view of the subject. But, in either case, the country would have a fixed opinion, and a fixed system of policy. What would be most injurious would be, that the opinions of the country should be altogether shaken; that there should be no resting-place on which we could plant our foot; that all belief on principles to be asserted and acted on by this House should be altogether lost; that there should be no trust whatever in any such principles. Depend upon it, if you adopt that vacillating and changing course, the people of England may be at first bewildered; but when they come to their senses, they will condemn your conduct and the conduct of the Government which led you into so disgraceful a dilemma. I, therefore, end as I began, by imploring the House of Commons not to suffer this stain upon its own character; to leave the responsibility of this shifting course, this playing and trifling with great principles, to rest upon the Government of the day; let the House of Commons remain intact by such stain, and not touched by such dishonour.

The House divided on the Question that the word "now" stand part of the Question:—Ayes 108; Noes 116: Majority 8.

Main question as amended put, and agreed to. Second reading of the Bill put off for three months.

RELIEF OF ROMAN CATHOLICS.] The Order of the Day having been read for a Committee of the whole House on the Roman Catholic Relief Bill,

Mr. Watson said, as the measure had advanced to its present stage without any discussion of its principle, he wished to state the grounds on which he asked for the assent of the House to it. Its object was to repeal the remaining penal laws affecting the Roman Catholics. He had no wish to touch the safeguards of the Church; but he proposed to abrogate a variety of penal enactments in various Statutes, passed in former times, when antipathy to the Roman Catholics was the prevailing sentiment. The present measure was introduced along with the Act of last Session in the House of Lords, and passed the Committee there; but the Session being so far advanced, it was considered that only those clauses should be left in the Bill which could pass without any objection whatever. Various Members of the Government, and among them the Lord Chancellor, expressed their approval of its provisions; the only objection being, that it did not go far enough, and that a more complete Bill should be brought in to repeal those penal laws affecting the Members of various religious persuasions, which were a disgrace to the Statute Book and to the present age. The right hon. Baronet appointed a Commission, which during the present Session made a most valuable Report on the laws affecting all classes of religionists. It might be said, that this Bill did not go far enough, because it did not apply to other Dissenters. He felt strongly this objection; but once affirm the principle that penal laws directed against a form of religion were unjust, and the rest was a mere question of time. The first class of measures which he proposed by the present Bill to repeal, were those affecting persons acknowledging the religious supremacy of the Pope. The Report stated, that they ought to be repealed; and none of the Relief Acts at all affected the penalties imposed by those measures; unless the parties should have taken the oath prescribed by the Relief Act, 10 Geo. IV. The Acts of 1 Elizabeth and 5 Elizabeth, imposed the penalties of premunire, forfeiture of goods and imprisonment in the first instance, and of high treason in the second; the offence still remained, and might be disposed of before a justice of the peace. Another class of Acts related to persons introducing bulls and rescripts of the See of Rome; the next comprised Acts relating to abnegation, which were recommended to be repealed by the Criminal Law Commissioners; the next were those relating to education, which, among other provisions, enacted that no Roman Catholic should be allowed to engage in the business of instruction without a license from an archbishop or bishop of the Established Church. He now came to the class of laws called the Relief Acts, and should propose to repeal the penal clauses contained therein. The first of them was the Act 1 George III., which required all persons wishing to avail themselves of its provisions, to take the oaths within six months, and excluded certain persons from any benefit under the Act. The 13 George III., also expressly excluded persons therein specified from the benefit of the Relief Acts. The repeal of those two Statutes was recommended by the Commissioners. He now came to another class of those laws, the only one to the repeal of which he expected that any objection would be made. The Relief Act of 10 George IV., contained three clauses which he proposed to repeal; the first forbidding ecclesiastics of the Roman Catholic Church to take their episcopal designations from sees which gave the Protestant bishops their titles. This clause answered no good object whatsoever; and, in his opinion, ought to be repealed. The next clause he asked to repeal was that prohibiting them from wearing the sacerdotal garments out of their churches. On this subject the Criminal Law Commissioners had given no recommendation; they stated that, with regard to several other penalties and disabilities still remaining, as these underwent much deliberation by the Legislature at the time of passing the Act 10 George IV., they refrained from offering any opinion. As to the clauses respecting titles and garments, he thought they were merely vexatious enactments, and ought to be repealed. The truth was, that very little consideration was given to them; they were introduced into the Relief Bill, and passed without reflection. The last clause was one to which he attached very great importance, and was of an extremely penal nature, applying to the regular clergy. By this provision, those members of the regular clergy who were in this country at the time of the passing of that Act, might remain and exercise their functions, which, in the case of most of them, consisted partly in the education of youth. But the Act provided also, that no Roman Catholic ecclesiastic, of the Jesuit, or any other monastic order, should come into this country, except by license of the Secretary of State, and that only for a period of six months at a time. If they remained here afterwards, they were liable to transportation; and if any person were educated in this country as a Jesuit, or bound by any religious vow of any monastic order, the person who so educated him, was liable to transportation for life, and the person so educated to banishment for life. These clauses, he found, on examination, though inserted in the Bill, had received no discussion whatever; but they were offensive to a highly respectable class of clergymen. The regular clergy were equally good citizens with the secular clergy, and as fit to be under the protection of the law; they dedicated themselves to education. Yet we had a penal enactment subjecting these persons to banishment for life; and when the present race died off, no one would be permitted by law to reside in the country. If they became disturbers of the law, they would be justly liable to punishment; but so long as they conducted themselves peaceably, they had as much right to education as the youth of the Roman Catholic persuasion, or any other class of persons. He expected to receive for this Bill the support both of hon. Gentlemen on that side of the House, and of Her Majesty's Government, who had declared their assent to the principles on which it was founded by passing the Dissenters' Chapels Bill, and the Maynooth College Bill. He did not introduce this as a solitary measure, but as one of a class of measures which should be passed to carry out the principles asserted in the Act of last Session, that all penal laws, affecting persons with punishment for the exercise of their religion were bad, and contrary to the principles of the Constitution. He was aware that to this Motion he might expect some opposition from the hon. Baronet the Member for the University of Oxford; but he hoped that hon. Gentleman on consideration would see that there could be no real reason for objecting to the provisions of the Bill, as he had described them. If we asserted our religion and Constitution to be supported by penal laws, we should deny them to be founded on the rock of truth. It became us to rely, for the maintenance of the Protestant religion, upon its truth, and to extend to others the same toleration which the law secured for that form of Christianity. He hoped, therefore, to obtain the unanimous consent of the House to this Bill. The hon. and learned Gentleman concluded by moving that the Speaker do now leave the Chair.

Sir J. Graham complained of the lateness of the hour at which the hon. and learned Member brought on his Motion, and also that it had been introduced at a time when none of the Law Officers of the Crown were present. He had on a former occasion reminded the hon. and learned Member, that with reference to the principle of the remission of the penal laws there was no difference of opinion among Her Majesty's advisers in either House of Parliament — that the principle of the necessity of repealing those laws was, he thought, distinctly admitted by the Bill which had been sent down from the other House last Session:

but that the consideration of those Statutes involved the utmost nicety of the law. The Government, feeling the force of this circumstance, referred the subject to certain learned Commissioners to report upon these Statutes in detail. To the Report of these Commissioners the hon. and learned Gentleman had referred; but when he had added that his Bill, in its present form, had received the support of Her Majesty's advisers in the other House of Parliament, he thought the hon. and learned Gentleman had gone a little too far. The most important part of the measure was the portion which went to repeal certain clauses of the Relief Act of 1829. He apprehended that he was right in saying that the Bill of last year contained no provision for the repeal of these clauses—[Mr. Watson: It contained the provision as it passed the Committee of the House of Lords.] If he was not much mistaken, the Lord Chancellor had distinctly stated, that no support might be expected from the Government in passing that portion of the Act. The Commissioners in this Report stated, that so far from these provisions against the regular clergy being penal, they were recent enactments, forming a part of the policy deliberately adopted by the Legislature as necessary safeguards when passing the Relief Bill; and he was not aware that either House of Parliament, had on any occasion, either directly or indirectly, expressed their assent to the repeal of these measures. Some of the Statutes referred to were repealed in toto, others were repealed in part, and on the whole he thought it would be highly inexpedient to take them into consideration in the absence of the Law Officers of the Crown. The Government had, as he had stated on a former occasion, called upon the Commissioners to prepare the draft of a Bill embodying the substance of their Report. He had reason to know that the Commissioners had attended to the recommendations of the Government on the matter, and that a Bill was now in an advanced state of preparation, which he trusted to see brought before Parliament next Session.

Mr. Redington begged to remind the right hon. Baronet, that Wednesday was the only day of the week on which an Order of the Day could be brought forward by an individual Member, and that the complaint as to the hour at which the Motion had been made was, therefore, not very well founded. He did not think his hon. and learned Friend would be doing justice to this Bill, if he did not persevere in pressing it upon the consideration of the House. It was a Bill which went to repeal some of the most odious disabilities that could possibly affect any human being, and which were, he considered, a disgrace to the Statute Book as long as they were suffered to remain upon it. He had heard of complaints being lately made in another place of certain persecutions that were said to have taken place under the laws of Scotland; and the Secretary of State reminded those who had brought it forward that they had only very lately repealed such bad laws themselves. Now, it would appear from that statement that everything necessary had been done already to purge the Statute Book from penal enactments, though evidently such was not the fact. He thought that the right hon. Baronet the Member for Tamworth ought not to have allowed fifteen years to pass since the passing of the Emancipation Act, without adopting measures to repeal these laws. Much had been said lately about the Jesuits. He was not ashamed to say that the Jesuits were a most worthy, most efficient, and most exemplary society of men; and he would venture a comparison between them and the most learned body in Europe, in every branch of literature and science. He also bore testimony to the efficiency and piety of the members of the other religious bodies, and asked if it was not a disgrace to their laws that a man who had effected so much public good as Father Mathew, should be proscribed, and should subject himself to the penalty of transportation every day that he carried on his misson? The Government had dared prejudices in small things, and he would call upon them to adopt the same course on the present occasion in respect to all penal enactments, no matter whether they had been 15 years or 500 years on the Statute Book.

Sir R. Inglis said, he did not complain of the hon. and learned Gentleman bringing forward his measure; but he did complain that, having been allowed to pass through two stages without any discussion upon its merits, he had refused to inform him (Sir R. Inglis) on what day he intended proceeding with it, on being respectfully requested to do so. The hon. Gentleman now brought forward the Motion for going into Committee on the Bill at twenty minutes after eleven o'clock; and at that late hour the House was called upon to pronounce a decision on one of the most important subjects brought before them during the Session, and which was now first submitted to their deliberate consideration. The Bill proposed to repeal the Act of Supremacy—the Act prohibiting Jesuits from crowding into the country—the Act which prevented Roman Catholic bishops from assuming the titles of the sees of the Established Church; and it also, he apprehended, went to remove the restrictions which prevented Roman Catholic processions from taking place publicly through the streets of every city and town in England. He had understood from a right hon. Baronet, that Her Majesty's Ministers had had under their consideration some of the laws which the present Bill proposed to repeal; but whether such repeal originated with them or with the hon. Member, he viewed the fact with deep regret. Notwithstanding the applause bestowed upon the Jesuits by the hon. and learned Member who spoke last, it could not be denied that in public opinion, or in public prejudice (call it which people would), there were two terms of reproach which were always connected with the assumed profession of the parties; and to be like a Jew or like a Jesuit was always a designation of disfavour. To the Jesuits, he believed, was to be attributed the present unhappy condition of Switzerland. Regarding the Bill as a repeal of the few remaining protections of the Protestant Church, he could not but oppose it; and for that reason, he moved that it be committed on that day three months.

Mr. Newdegate seconded the Amendment.

Mr. Sheil said, that the hon. Baronet, the Member for the University of Oxford, ought to be the last man to object to monastic institutions in this country. As to the intercourse between this country and Rome, it seemed to him much better that it should be open and avowed, than that a sort of backstairs illegitimate intrigue and liaison should be carried on by Mr. Petre with that lady, who, in the opinion of Protestants, did not bear the best reputation. The hon. Baronet had asserted that Jesuits and Jews were coupled in public prejudice; but at least one Member of the Government might be found who would advocate the cause of the latter. The next statement of the hon. Baronet was, that the Jesuits had caused the disturbances in Switzerland; but he must have forgotten that Mr. Strauss had been Protestant Professor of Theology at Zurich. [Sir R. Inglis: And had been expelled.] Tardily expelled. He would not at this time of day discuss the merits of the Jesuits: he thought that their services in the cause of civilization had been long acknowledged: quæ regio in terris nostri non plena laboris was their motto, and every clime and every age had shared in the benefits they had conferred, although it was true that they were not the owners of 40,000 acres in New Zealand. For himself he had been educated by Jesuits, and he had never heard from one a sentiment that was not consistent with piety, patriotism, humanity, and liberality: he therefore took this opportunity of bearing his humble testimony to the obligations they had conferred upon mankind. It would be well if the education of the Roman Catholic gentry in Ireland were always entrusted to the Jesuits; for he defied any man to show a single book from the Jesuit press that contained a sentence or a sentiment inconsistent with genuine Christianity. He contended that the members of the Roman Catholic hierarchy placed on the Commission under the Charitable Trusts Bill, had not been fairly treated. True it was that Dr. Murray, Dr. Crolly, and Dr. Denvil had been termed archbishops and bishops, and had been allowed precedence of the Earl of Devon, but they had neither local habitation nor name, for it was not stated of what places they were archbishops and bishops. This was an inconsistency which had given offence to the whole Roman Catholic body.

Mr. Newdegate said, that he had not been prepared to address the House, and he should not have presumed to second the Amendment of the hon. Baronet the Member for Oxford, if he had not been deeply impressed with the importance of the subject. This Bill proposed to permit the Roman Catholic hierarchy to assume the titles of certain sees, and, among other things, to permit the conducting of their processions in public. Now matters of mere name or title, and processions, however much they might inflame that feeling of indignation which certain measures of Her Majesty's Government had excited in the minds of the Protestant people of this country, were, after all, trifles, as compared with the final proposition of this Bill, which was to remove those clauses of the Relief Bill of 1829, which related to and prohibited the institution of regular monastic orders, particularly that of the Jesuits, that most rigid and most ambitious order of the Roman Church; a sect, which embraced in its institution the most dangerous and worst elements of a secret society, whose history had been marked in every country where they had been tolerated, by scenes of confusion and disorder. What was the latest intelligence of them? That they had been commanded to remove from France; and this very spring they had set Switzerland in a blaze by grasping at the education of her freeborn sons. The right hon. Member for Dungarvon had endeavoured to vindicate the order from the imputations which their whole history entailed upon them, and had stated, that having been educated among them, he had never known illiberal opinions, or principles adverse to free institutions, inculcated by them. Of the advantages in education, for which the right hon. Member was indebted to the Jesuits, the House had constant proof, and he (Mr. Newdegate) fully believed the right hon. Member, that he had never known improper or dangerous principles inculcated by them; for it had ever been the policy of that order only to sow such seed in minds they found adapted for its reception; and he was convinced that the mind of the right hon. Member would have rejected such instruction, and that his teachers knew it: such had ever been the system of the Jesuits. The House might have sufficient evidence from documents in the British Musuem; but did these facts need such illustration? He appealed from all history to the occurrences of the present day on the Continent, as evidence of character of this sect: and it was with deep regret he had heard from her Majesty's Secretary for the Home Department, that a proposition for removing the only safeguards against the propagation of this sect in Great Britain should receive his consideration. He (Mr. Newdegate) hoped that the right hon. Baronet would not be blind to the circumstances connected with this sect at present throughout Europe. For his own part he entered his solemn protest against the introduction of any measure, the effect of which could be only to give countenance to the Jesuits; and he called upon those statesmen who had supported the Bill of 1829, to justify their actions then, by their conduct now.

Sir James Graham wished to correct a misconception of what he had said on a former day; he had not said that Government was ready to take into consideration a measure to repeal certain clauses in the Relief Act of 1829. On the second reading of the present measure, he had expressly claimed that Ministers should not be considered pledged upon the question. What he had said was, that the Commissioners had been directed to prepare a bill strictly limited to the recommendations in their Report; and in the other House the Lord Chancellor had stated that the Government was not at all pledged upon the subject.

Mr. M. J. O'Connell was anxious that Ministers should pledge themselves to resist what was now required, because he was sure from experience that very soon after they had pledged themselves upon any question they gave way. If they now pledged themselves to maintain the absurd exclusions of the Bill of 1829, he had more than a hope that they would abandon them in the next Session. The truth was, that the clauses had only been inserted to satisfy the conscience of that exemplary, religious, and moral monarch, George IV.; and his reign being at an end, people could now consider what they were really worth. The onus was upon the opponents of the Bill to show that these outrageous laws should remain on the Statute Book, which could not be enforced. He hoped that his hon. Friend would go to a division, to see who was for and who was against it. His own opinion was, that all restrictions upon religious belief were as unjust to men as they were insulting to God.

Mr. Bickham Escott felt disposed to oppose the Bill, because the Government had asked time for the consideration of the subject, so as to bring in a measure. He believed that the Bill was founded on the principles of justice and sound policy; and he considered the Acts alluded to, to be a disgrace to the Statute Book. If he heard that it was the intention of Her Majesty's Ministers to do away with those enactments on account of religion, he would not vote for the Motion; but if that was not the case, he should give it his cordial support.

Sir R. Peel stated, that last Session he had brought in a Bill for the repeal of certain Acts which affected a certain part of Her Majesty's subjects. At that time it was intimated to him that he was not justified in giving relief to one class, and giving no relief of a similar character to another class. The whole subject was so complicated, and involved in so many Statutes of an ancient date, that he stated he would refer it to Commissioners to consider those laws. The Commission was composed of very eminent men, and their Report on the subject was not in the possession of the Government until the last week in May, and he had not seen it until June. Now, from the complicated state of public business connected with the various departments, and also from the necessity of considering the measures to be submitted to the House, and also from their sitting in that House from eight to nine hours a day, for four or five days in the week, it was utterly impossible to give full consideration to all the subjects that might come forward. The question of these laws had also reference to persons keeping schools, who were not Roman Catholics, but Dissenters from the Establishment. The Government felt that an impartial view should be taken, and that the measure should comprise all classes; they had, therefore, desired the Commissioners to prepare a Bill on the subject of these ancient Statutes. He could not pledge the Government more than to say that they would give the fullest consideration to the measures which should be proposed by the Commissioners. The enactments of the Bill of 1829 were of a very different character, and he was not able to make any promise or any pledge on the subject. No doubt, as had been stated, there would be considerable opposition out of doors to any proceeding on the subject. He fairly owned that there were many enactments which should not be continued; and he had no hesitation in saying that he was ready to encounter opposition on the subject of the removal of these enactments from the Statute Book. He could not pledge himself to any particular clauses of the Bill of the hon. and learned Gentleman; but he could assure him that the subject should receive the fullest consideration. He was now speaking of the ancient enactments, and did not refer to those which were imposed when the Catholic Relief Bill passed. He hoped, after what had passed that the hon. Gentleman would not press the measure.

Lord John Russell considered that the Bill involved two very separate questions. The first was, whether they should consider with a view to their repeal certain ancient enactments. On this part of the subject, after what had fallen from both the right hon. Gentlemen opposite, the House should be satisfied with their declarations. It certainly would at that moment be difficult for the Government to say what clauses of the Bill of the hon. and learned Gentleman should be repealed; he therefore would suggest that this part of the subject be left to them. The other question was of a very different character; he alluded to that part which referred not to any old restrictions, but to those imposed by the Act of 1829, he meant the disallowing clauses in the Bill, introduced by the right hon. Baronet at the head of the Government. The question was, whether they were prepared to make alterations in this law. This subject might have been referred to the consideration of the Commissioners, or it might, without this, have been considered by the Government as a question of policy, in the Amendment of the law of 1829. They had done neither, however. They now stated that there would be no reference to this Act in the measure they intended to propose. He, for one, was prepared to go into Committee on those clauses of the Act of 1829. He did not say that he was at once prepared to repeal all those clauses, but he was willing to go into Committee to deliberate on the subject. He believed that they might repeal those disallowing clauses which prevented a Roman Catholic bishop assuming a title held by a bishop of the Established Church. He could not conceive any good ground for the continuance of this restriction. With respect to the question of the Jesuits and the regular orders, he did not think that the Act of 1829 was satisfactory; but he should like to look into the laws of other countries in Europe; and above all, into those of Catholic countries, on the subject of these religious orders. As a general principle, he should say, do away with all these restrictions; but if they found that in Catholic countries there were some regulations as to the registration of the members of an order, or similar restraint, he should say that it was a fair subject to go into Committee to deliberate upon, although he would not pledge himself for the immediate repeal of all these restrictions. As for going into Committee that evening, it was a subject for the hon. Gentleman's consideration: but if he divided the House, he would vote for the Motion.

Mr. Watson said, that he should certainly take the sense of the House, as he did not conceive that he had been treated well by the Government.

Committee put off for three months.

House adjourned at a quarter past one o'clock.

PRIVILEGE.] The Duke of Richmond wished to call the attention of their Lordships to a petition relating to privilege. It was from Thomas Baker, of Albion House, Great Church-lane, Hammersmith, formerly superintendent of the C division of the Metropolitan Police Force, but now retired upon a pension. It stated, that he had been called upon to attend and give evidence before their Lordships' Select Committee on the Laws relating to Gaming; and that a person of the name of John Harlow had commenced an action for damages against him for words spoken upon that occasion; that John Harlow intended to proceed to trial on the 31st instant, at the Croydon assizes. The petitioner had not pleaded to the action, but prayed their Lordships to take the premises into consideration, and to grant him such protection as might seem meet. The noble Duke observed, that Mr. Baker had not volunteered his evidence, but had been called upon to give it, having been inspector of that division of the Police, whose duty it was to watch the gambling-houses in the district. He had been examined upon oath, and, under the sanctity of that oath, had no doubt spoken the truth. The noble Duke said, that he had known Inspector Baker for a great many years, and he had served not only during the Peninsular war, but at Waterloo, and he believed that a more honourable man did not exist. It did not become him, not being a law Lord, to offer any opinion on the question; but he begged to be informed what course it was fit, under the circumstances, to pursue?

The Lord Chancellor: It is perfectly clear that if the statement contained in the petition be true, this action cannot be sustained. The petitioner alleges that the words, for the using of which the action has been brought, were spoken by him before a Committee of your Lordships' House. I believe an indictment may be maintained for perjury against a party who has sworn falsely before a court of justice; but I apprehend it is perfectly clear no action can be sustained for words spoken by a witness in evidence before any such court. But that is not the question at present—the question is, whether, under the circumstances disclosed by the petition, we should protect the defendant. It is stated in the declaration that the words were spoken "in the presence and hearing of the Committee." It is possible, therefore, that the plaintiff may represent his case to be of this description, that the defendant had repeated the words in the presence and hearing of the Committee of the House, and yet may not have been at the time speaking as a witness upon oath. I should recommend your Lordships to appoint a Committee for the purpose of searching for precedents to regulate our proceedings. Circumstances make it incumbent on your Lordships to attend more particularly to this matter, because we are ourselves a court of justice in the last resort. If this case should go on, it may ultimately come before us for decision as a Court of Appeal. I, therefore, beg to move that a Select Committee be appointed to search for precedents, and that the said petition be referred to such Committee.

Lord Campbell: I move, my Lords, as an Amendment, that the plaintiff and his attorney be summoned to attend at the bar of this House. In my opinion there is no occasion for any Committee—no Committee can be of the slightest service. There is no doubt that you have here an action brought against a witness, for evidence given on oath before a Committee of your Lordships' House. I entirely agree with what has been laid down by my noble and learned Friend, that no such action in point of law can be maintained; but shall you allow a witness who has been summoned before your Committee to be harassed by such an action? Nay, more my Lords, will you allow your privilege of summoning witnesses, and of examining them before a Committee, to be submitted to any Judge who may happen to sit on the trial of that case? I do say, my Lords, that if you are prepared to imitate the example set you by your ancestors, you will immediately interfere, and put a stop to this action. The most recent case on the question of this privilege which has occurred before your Lordships' House was one which took place during the time when that illustrious Judge, Lord Eldon, presided on the Woolsack. It arose out of an action brought against one of your messengers for taking an umbrella belonging to a visitor, who was standing at your Lordships' bar when the House was sitting as a court of justice. Upon the Motion of Lord Eldon, the plaintiff and his attorney, who had commenced an action before the court of requests, were summoned to the bar, and informed, according to your Lordships' determination, that they would both be committed if they did not at once abandon all legal proceedings. I cannot doubt that your Lordships are now prepared to summon both this plaintiff and his attorney at your bar; and if it shall turn out that the action is brought for words spoken by the witness in evidence before your Committee, that you will commit to prison the plaintiff and his attorney, if they persist in prosecuting the action. It will be utterly impossible for you to exercise your iniquisitorial powers, unless you protect the witnesses in the evidence they give. The Committee in question was a most important one. It was to inquire into the frauds alleged to arise from gaming. There were many witnesses examined, and many transactions inquired into, and a great deal of fraud and dishonesty disclosed. If any person is permitted to bring an action against a witness who should have disclosed that person's infamy, in what situation would the witness stand, and in what a situation would your Lordships be? You would ever after deprive yourselves of the power of instituting any such inquiry. Your privileges are now assailed in the most alarming manner, and unless you make a resolute stand they are irrevocably gone. I have heard it suggested that the witness might have repeated these words at another time; that after having given evidence before the Committee he might have repeated in the presence of the Committee, not upon oath, and not judicially, what he had said before, and therefore that might be considered malicious, and sufficient to form a ground of action. But in his petition the party declares that he never did use the words unless when he was examined upon oath before the Committee. It, however, may be learned from the plaintiff and his attorney, if called to the bar of the House, what is the real ground of the action. If it be for words spoken on some other occasion, then let the action proceed, and let a jury give a verdict upon it; but if it should turn out, as I have no doubt it will, that the action has been brought for words spoken by the witness when on oath before the Committee, then I implore your Lordships, in accordance with all the precedents you have ever acted upon, that you will at once interpose to protect this witness. In the present case there is not time for any Committe to inquire for and examine into precedents. The trial is to take place on the 31st of July in the county of Surrey; and I have no doubt he will be called upon to plead in four days from the time declaration is filed. Before the Committee have made their Report, a judgment may be obtained, and a verdict for 1,000*l.* may be given by a jury against the defendant; and this because he has obeyed your Lordships' summons. It may be said that the defendant may justify; but how? Are you to expose him to the same peril to which all your own privileges appear now to be exposed? My Lords, I shall move as an Amendment, "That the plaintiff and his attorney be summoned to appear at the bar of this House to-morrow at five o'clock."

The Earl of Ellenborough: I entirely agree with the noble and learned Lord as to the course it is essential, for the maintenance of the dignity and privileges of this House, and of its authority, for your Lordships to pursue, and I shall give my vote in support of the noble and learned Lord's Amendment.

Lord Brougham: My doubt is this, and I fairly state it to your Lordships. This is the first time that the question has ever been brought before the House. We have not had one quarter of an hour by the clock to consider what course it would be the best for us to take. We have not had one quarter of an hour to look into precedents. We are surrounded by very serious difficulties. We have at present the statement, and only the statement, of the party against whom the ac ion is brought. If you look at that statement, he does not himself say that the action is brought for words spoken by him in giving his evidence upon oath. He says, he believes it is for words spoken by him in the presence and hearing of the Committee. My noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack has suggested that it does not at all follow from necessity that those were words used by him in giving evidence before the Committee. Though he says (it is his own assertion, no doubt), that he never did, except upon the occasion of being examined before the Committee, say anything respecting Mr. Harlow, still he may have done it upon that occasion without being at the moment giving evidence on oath. My noble Friend opposite (the Earl of Ellenborough) is ready to denounce this as a breach of privilege. I have had some experience on questions of privilege. I was present and took part in the argument of the great case of privilege at your Lordships' bar; and I will venture to say that whoever has the most considered the question of privilege will find the most difficulty in reconciling the conflicting decisions and precedents on the subject, and especially in deciding, as my noble Friend, who is not a member of the profession, has done off hand, that this is a breach of privilege. Taking such extremely breathless haste as our guide is never safe. We ought never to come to a hurried decision when a little time for deliberation might make our proceeding more useful and satisfactory in its results. In all cases arising in the House of Commons, the first thing done is the adoption of the course suggested by my noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack—namely, the appointment of a Committee to search for precedents. You are not like the House of Commons, a mere inquisitorial body. You are a high criminal court of justice in the last resort. The matter propounded is, that you shall call the plaintiff and his attorney before you, with the manifest intention, that if you are satisfied, on examining those parties, that this action is brought for words spoken under certain circumstances, you will stay the action by exerting your power of force against the author of that action. That is a great step for any court of justice to take. It is a very novel position for your Lordships to find yourselves in: that you, a court of judicature, who as a criminal court in the last resort, may have to decide this very case, should at once say "we will not allow this action to proceed." But it is said—"Only examine the plaintiff!" Is it nothing, my Lords, for a plaintiff, upon the mere application of the defendant—his adversary — to be called upon to disclose his case? But that is what you are doing, and upon what ground? Simply because the defendant tells you his story, he being the adversary of the plaintiff. I am not the man to advise your Lordships, without further consideration, to pursue this extraordinary, not to say extr me course of calling upon a plaintiff to tell you what his case is, merely because the defendant asks you to do so by telling his account of the matter. I am, above all things, for maintaining the purity and independence of the administration of justice, and I believe that the privileges of both Houses of Parliament never can be safer, and never can be rested upon a more secure foundation than if they are left, like the rights and privileges of all the rest of the community — the Sovereign included — the Crown included—left to the administration of civil and criminal justice in those courts which are not political tribunals, the courts of the law of the United Kingdom.

Lord Cottenham said: As to what course your Lordships ought to pursue, if the facts stated in the petition be correct, is a question well deserving consideration; but as to what the petitioner has stated, it appears to me he puts the matter beyond all dispute. He, in the first place, states what the declaration itself states, that the action professes to be brought for words spoken in the presence and hearing of a Committee of this House. He then goes on and states, that he never upon any occasion, except upon giving his evidence before the Committee, spoke or published any such words as are charged against him in the declaration, and that he verily believes that the action has been brought for words so spoken. Of course he could not state more than his "belief," as he speaks of the reasons that actuate another man's conduct. Under these circumstances (there may not be a word of truth in it, but looking at the allegation) it does appear to be a most direct and distinct breach of the privileges of the House. Therefore, the only question is, in what way will the House assert its privileges? Beyond all doubt, the House will take as much time as circumstances will admit; but my apprehension is, that there will be no time if you do not act this evening by summoning the parties to-morrow. The mischief will have occurred before Monday. I trust your Lordships will not follow an example set elsewhere, and permit the party to plead, and thus involve yourselves in difficulties from which it may not be possible to escape. If your Lordships' privileges are to be asserted at all, it is at the time when they are first invaded. Therefore, although I am anxious to take as much time for deliberation as circumstances may admit, yet if your Lordships do not act to-day, you will, in all probability, lose the opportunity of acting at all.

Lord Denman: With great respect, then, I hope your Lordships will not act at all. I hope the plaintiff will be allowed to assert his right in a court of law. The evidence may have been maliciously given to his prejudice, and he may be ruined in consequence of that evidence being given. I think your Lordships, being in the last resort a high court of justice, ought to be very slow before you say to any one of Her Majesty's subjects, on bringing an action against another for an alleged injury done to him, "You shall not proceed in a court of justice to show that you have been injured, and to obtain redress for that injury." But it is said that this petitioner and witness would be harassed if this action were allowed to be brought against him. Would he not be equally harassed if he were indicted for perjury? and yet are your Lordships prepared to interfere in such a case? Would your Lordships prevent such an indictment because the party indicted came and told you that he was guiltless of the crime of perjury alleged against him, and that he had said nothing but the truth? Are your Lordships prepared, on such an allegation, to declare that you will not allow the law to take its course, nor will allow the question as to the falsehood or truth of the party's statement to be investigated by a competent legal tribunal? I think your Lordships will incur a most serious responsibility if you undertake to interfere thus without great deliberation. It will not be in my power to attend the House after this day, because I shall be obliged to proceed on the circuit. For that reason, I am induced to enter rather more fully than I otherwise might have done, into my views upon this most important question. I do not think any injury will arise to the parties from delay. My noble and learned Friend (Lord Campbell) says that all the precedents are one way, and that it will not be very difficult to find them. He mentioned but one precedent—that known by the name of the umbrella case, a precedent which I trust your Lordships will not be eager to follow when you know the facts. A person, while attending at the bar of your Lordships' House, when sitting as a court of justice, lost his umbrella, and believing that one of your Lordships' messengers had taken possession of it, he brought an action in the court of requests against the messenger. The House of Lords thought it became its dignity and sense of justice to interfere, and prevent the plaintiff from establishing his right to his property, and to the fact of his having been illegally deprived of it. I cannot think that that is a case which your Lordships will feel proud or anxious to act upon. I beg to express my very great disapprobation of actions being brought for the sake of producing collisions between Parliament and the Courts of Justice—a circumstance at all times much to be deplored—actions brought for the purpose of obtaining from the prejudices or excited feelings of a jury damages which greatly exceed the amount of injury sustained. I do, at the same time, think that there is no more certain mode of encouraging such proceedings, than by interfering with a view to stop the due course of justice between the Queen's subjects by the high hand of power on the part of Parliament, under the pretence that the parties against whom such proceedings were taken were acting under its protection. I should be very slow in offering any opinion upon this case. The facts at present before your Lordships are merely ex parte. I know that the proposition before your Lordships is, that the facts be inquired into by summoning those parties to the bar who are supposed to have injured this petitioner, that is, to summon the plaintiff and his attorney. But, by summoning those parties before you, your Lordships pledge yourselves to take some course, provided certain disclosures are made; but which disclosures, I humbly apprehend, ought not to be sought for from any of Her Majesty's subjects who are only seeking to establish their rights in a court of justice. I am very unwilling to commit myself without necessity upon a point of law; but I have not the least difficulty in saying, that if this statement be true, and I have no doubt it is—if this respectable person, of whom the noble Duke has spoken so highly, has really done no more than what is stated in his petition, then I have not the least difficulty in saying, nay, it admits of no doubt, that the plaintiff cannot hold up his head in a court of justice. What! when a competent tribunal, justly held in the highest respect by the country—a Committee of the House of Lords, appointed to inquire into the necessity of making an amendment in the law of the land—when such a tribunal summons before it a public officer, a man competent to speak of the conduct of certain parties having relation to that law, and when that officer shall have fairly and fully disclosed what he knows on oath—is he to be accused as a malicious slanderer because he makes that disclosure? It could not be endured for a moment: and do your Lordships believe that any court of justice would say that a plaintiff could possibly succeed in such an action, or that a witness so conducting himself should be punished? Why should it be supposed that a court of justice would overlook all circumstances of this nature? All confidential communications, that are made bonâ fide, are privileged communications; but the privileges of the House of Lords, and of your Lordships' Committees for the purpose of public inquiries, stand beyond the reach of any criminal or civil proceeding by way of action. I venture to think, although I know what has been said in another place, that there is nothing in the conduct or in the disposition of the courts that disentitles them to the credit of wishing to put down any action brought under such circumstances. But, on the other hand, is it to be maintained, if parties will vent any personal malice, or will indulge in any personal and unjust reflections to the prejudice of others, while giving evidence before a Committee of your Lordships' House, that those persons are not be pursued in order that the facts may be inquired into, and be decided upon in due course of law? But upon this more general ground—a ground which has been considered and felt at all times by those Judges who were aware of the high privilege they enjoyed, of standing between irresponsible power and those whom it was sought to make its victims—I am opposed to the undue interposition of privilege to impede the due administration of justice between subject and subject. The feeling which has actuated all those Judges who have thus appreciated their own high privilege, has been this—"We know our duty, and that duty we will perform; we will perform it without fear or favour, for the protection, not of one class, not of an individual who happens to have been a witness before a Committee either of this place or of another place, but for the protection of all; for doing equal justice to all, in order that those who are injured may obtain redress, and that those who complain that they are injured may have the right to show how and wherein they have suffered." These are general grounds, I think at least, sufficient to induce your Lordships to pause before any steps are taken. I should have thought the Motion of my noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack, if any course was to be taken on the subject, was the only course that a deliberative body, with due regard to their own high station, and to the great power they possess, and the great injury they may by possibility inflict, could have taken on such proposal being made. My Lords, I venture to warn you against the notion that dignity consists in taking sudden offence, and in putting down all who question your proceedings. There may be good grounds for the statements of those who come before you for protection. Your Lordships do not possess the means of investigating the merits between the contending parties; but if those grounds exist, the assertion and proof of them will be available to the party complaining in any court of justice in the kingdom.

Lord Campbell would warn their Lordships of the infinite importance of the step they were now about to take. If they refused the Amendment he had proposed, they would be declaring to all the world that let an action be brought against any one for what he might have said before a Committee of their Lordships' House, they would not interfere to protect him, even though he should be a Peer of the realm.

Lord Brougham had always said that the House had the right to commit for contempt of its privileges. The courts of law had the same right. He would ask, however, if an action were brought against a witness for something which he had said upon oath in the Court of Queen's Bench, would the Lord Chief Justice call the plaintiff and his attorney before him and ask him on what account his action was brought; and if they replied "On account of what the defendant had said before you," would the Lord Chief Justice then say, "Then I commit you for contempt?" Yet that, he considered, would be tantamount to acceding to the Motion of his noble and learned Friend near him. He would only add, that if the statements contained in the petition were true, this was one of the most ridiculous actions that had ever been brought against any person.

On Question, That the words proposed to be left out stand part of Motion? House divided:—Content 33; Non-Content 22: Majority 11.

Resolved in the Affirmative. Then the original Motion being put,

The Marquess of Clanricarde contended that if they allowed their privileges to go to the courts of law, they gave up their prorogatives and submitted themselves to the other courts. He wished to know with what justice they could ask witnesses to give evidence before their Committees, by which they would subject themselves to penalties such as that which the petitioner had incurred? He said penalties, because the petitioner had already incurred expenses, and which would be further increased. If witnesses were to be subject to such actions, they could not, in justice, be expected to come forward and tell the whole truth on matters upon which it was necessary for the House to be informed.

Lord Stanley protested, on the part of the Government, against the doctrine that the House was abandoning those persons who gave true and faithful evidence in obedience to their Lordships' orders. There could, he believed, be hardly a dissentient voice to the proposition that it was their duty to protect those persons. By the vote the House had just come to, they had not abandoned one jot or tittle of the privileges of the House; but what they had done was to abstain, on the recommendation of his noble and learned Friend, from taking a hasty course the moment a petition had been presented. They had been recommended to take some short time to examine into precedents of the course adopted on former occasions, in order to assist them in arriving at a decision upon the course to be taken in the present instance. He conceived that neither their Lordships' privileges nor the cause of those persons who had given evidence before them, were compromised, if, upon conflicting opinions being expressed by the highest authorities upon such a question, their Lordships took twenty-four hours to consider the wisest course to pursue.

The Earl of Ellenborough could not but feel apprehension if, after the Report of the Select Committee, the House should adopt the course recommended by the noble and learned Lord opposite, that a most serious effect would be produced upon evidence given in future before Committees of their Lordships' House. It was essential that evidence given before those Committees should be given without the apprehension of punishment—it was essential that it should be given without fear. If witnesses—even although they should ultimately receive indemnity—were to give evidence under the apprehension, so embarrassing and distressing to nervous minds, that they might be forced into a court of justice as a result of their testimony, they would flinch from telling the truth, and their Lordships would find themselves unable to exercise one of the most important of their functions, that of extracting truth from witnesses before Committees.

Lord Brougham agreed, that nothing was more important than that evidence should be given without apprehension; but he feared their Lordships could not carry out the principle contended for by his noble Friend opposite. Suppose in this case the petitioner had given false evidence before the Committee against Mr. Harlow, the latter had only to prefer his bill of indictment before the grand jury, and, upon the bill being found, the witness would then be put upon his trial for his evidence.

Lord Cottenham said, that the House having rejected the Amendment of his noble and learned Friend, the question before them was the original Motion of his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack. The petitioner had stated a most distinct breach of privilege; and that having been brought under the attention of the House, they had postponed the consideration of the case to search for precedents. What were the Committee to inquire into? Into the question what their privileges were? Or into the mode of asserting them? He apprehended that both those points were perfectly clear and plain, and could not be elucidated by the labours of any Committee.

Lord Campbell believed, that the House would hereafter regret that his Amendment had been lost. They must now, he supposed, adopt the Motion of his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack; but he hoped that the Committee would enter to-night upon the consideration of the question, and make their Report to-morrow, by which course only twenty-four hours would be lost.

The Lord Chancellor said, that so far as he was concerned, no delay should take place; but his noble and learned Friend seemed to consider that the inquiry of the Committee was much more limited than it really was. They had to inquire into the whole cause of proceeding from beginning to end; and when their Lordships considered the result of the course which had been pursued in the other House of Parliament, he would suggest a little caution, in order that they might weigh the consequences of every step.

The Earl of Ellenborough apprehended, that the duty of the Select Committee would only be to examine into and report to the House what had been done on former occasions.

The Duke of Richmond said, it had been suggested by some noble Lord, whether the words spoken by the petitioner might not have been in conversation with the Committee, and not as strict evidence upon oath. He (the Duke of Richmond) was chairman of that Committee, and could inform the House that the witness stood in the witness box, and answered upon oath the questions put to him, and which he was bound to answer. In an examination of the kind that took place before the Committee upon Gaming, it was necessary to put the most searching questions. With all the blackguards the Committee had to deal with, it was most difficult to get any evidence at all, except from the police, The petitioner had given his evidence in a very proper way; and it was to be hoped the House would protect him. If the minutes of evidence had not been printed, the House must have trusted to the Committee's Report. But in these cases the House sent their evidence to the other House, and they choose to sell it. No men would give evidence if they could help it, when they found they might be subject to inconvenience and pecuniary loss by so doing.

Motion agreed to, and Committee nominated.

FORGERY OF NAMES IN RAILWAY DEEDS.] The Duke of Richmond called the attention of the House to two petitions of James Pym; and which had been placed upon the Table, making a direct charge against certain directors of a railway company, or rather stating, that in their deed of contract, there were ten or fifteen cases of forgery. So serious an allegation should not be made without an inquiry being instituted; and he would suggest that a Select Committee be appointed to which these petitions should be referred. He was aware that some difficulty might be experienced in obtaining a full attendance of Peers, on account of so many being engaged upon Railway Committees; but it would not be satisfactory to the public to allow such allegations to pass unnoticed.

The Marquess of Clanricarde wished to know if the noble Duke proposed to refer the Bill, to which petitions related, to the proposed Select Committee.

The Duke of Richmond: Only the petition; but I think the Bill ought not to pass until the Report of the Committee has been received.

The Marquess of Clanricarde objected to the progress of the Bill being delayed.

The Duke of Richmond said, he knew nothing of the case but this—the petitioners stated that they had never signed or authorized any one to sign their names for them, whereas people had sworn that they had seen the parties sign.

The Marquess of Clanricarde apprehended that it was a case of perjury, punishable in the ordinary way before a court of law; but he did not see why the Bill should be delayed on account of this allegation, because, supposing all these names erased, there would still remain a sufficiency of surplus to carry on the work.

Lord Brougham: The House might in pœnam of such proceedings delay the Bill.

After a short conversation,

The Duke of Richmond said, he did not desire to delay the Bill long, but only until an inquiry had taken place. He must inform the noble Marquess that the amount of 100,000*l.* had been struck off the subscription for noncompliance with the Standing Orders, and then would remain the question, whether enough surplus still remained to carry on the works. It would be absurd to pass the Bill through all its stages until that fact was ascertained.

The Earl of Devon said, he was tempted to move the adoption of an intermediate course, as an Amendment on the Motion of his noble Friend. Why should not the petitions be referred specially to the Committee of the Bill, with power to inquire into the allegations contained in those petitions; and also whether, if the fact were proved, it ought to delay the further progress of the Bill.

The Duke of Richmond said, his noble Friend could not take that course; for by the Standing Orders of the House, the Committee could not entertain the inquiries proposed, and his noble Friend must, therefore, give a day's notice of moving the suspension of the Standing O der.

After a few words from the Marquess of Clanricarde and the Earl of Charleville, Lord Monteagle said, such a case as an allegation of the forgery of fifteen names should not be suffered to pass without strict inquiry. Only last night a statement had been made regarding a Member of the other House, who had been rendered liable to the amount of 30,000*l.* by the insertion of his name in an Act of Parliament without his authority. No inconvenience could result from postponing the measure; and although he should regret this particular Bill being lost, he would rather that should happen than these allegations pass without inquiry.

Committee nominated.

DOCUMENTARY EVIDENCE BILL.] Lord Brougham moved, that the House do resolve itself into a Committee on the Documentary Evidence Bill. The noble and learned Lord explained the state of the existing law respecting documentary evidence, and the defects which the Bill was intended to remedy. Railway Bills had introduced sundry anomalies in this branch of the law; and whilst providing for the admission of documentary evidence, omitted to attach penalties in cases of fraud. The Great Western Railway Company had obtained the insertion of a clause stating that—

"Whereas, the books of the Company were by law evidence against them, it was very expedient that they should be also evidence for them."

It therefore enacted, that, with respect to all questions of rate, the entries in the books of the Company should be evidence for the Company of all matters contained in them. The Bill corrected all these anomalies, and made it forgery to counterfeit certificates of documents. There was likewise a clause to enable the Journals of either House of Parliament to be given in evidence. The noble Lord concluded by moving that the Bill be committed, in order that when the Report should be brought up, he might propose his Amendments, and have the Bill reprinted, and afterwards recommitted.

The Lord Chancellor highly approved of the suggestion of his noble and learned Friend with respect to constituting the printed Journals of their Lordships House legal evidence in a court of justice, and agreed entirely in the proposal to introduce a clause to that effect into the Bill.

Lord Campbell highly approved of the Bill. It would simplify the proceedings save expense, and prevent anomalies House in Committee. Bill reported without Amendment. Amendments made.

FREE CHURCH OF SCOTLAND.] The Marquess of Breadalbane presented petitions from the General Assembly of the Free Church of Scotland, the Inhabitants of Wick, and of the Free Church congregation at Peebles, complaining of the conduct of certain landowners in Scotland, who peremptorily refuse to grant sites for the erection of churches for the use of congregations of the Free Church of Scotland; also a petition from the Presbytery of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, in connexion with the Presbyterian Church in England, praying that "the law of property may be so far modified as to admit of the purchase of sites for churches and chapels for the use of members of the Free Church." The noble Marquess stated, that great dissatisfaction had been caused by the refusal of landed proprietors to grant sites among the community of the Free Church. That community embraced 800 congregations, with 620 ministers. The amount subscribed for the use of the Free Church since the disruption, was 776,000*l.*, of which 320,000*l.* had been applied in the erection of churches. He hoped that the prayer of the petitioners, which was confined to obtaining the accommodation indispensable for the free exercise of their worship, would be acceded to; and that their Lordships' would pronounce by an authoritative declaration that men who were good citizens and obedient to the laws, although dissenting from the Established Church, should not be precluded from that free exercise of their religion which was guaranteed to the professors of all forms of Christianity by the great principle of toleration inseparable from the British Constitution. If large proprietors were to exercise their rights of property in direct contradiction to that principle, we might say that we had a theory of religious liberty, but that our practice would be totally at variance with it.

The Earl of Cawdor denied, that in the conduct which he had observed with regard to the adherents of the Free Church, he had been actuated by the harsh and oppressive motives attributed to him by the Rev. Mr. Begg and others, or that he had wished to exercise an extreme right in order to obstruct the enjoyment of religious liberty. He had, in the first instance, objected to the erection by them of a permanent place of worship, because he had some reason then for believing that the delusion would be but temporary, and that the people would return to the Establishment; but he had given consent for the erection of a temporary building, on the condition that it should be removable at six months' notice, which he thought a perfectly reasonable one. He was only anxious to promote the permanent interest of the country. The question between his tenantry and him, was not one of principle but of time, and he trusted that in the end all differences would be amicably adjusted.

The Duke of Buccleuch said, he should not have troubled their Lordships with any observations, had it not been that his name was mentioned in the petition as one of those who objected to and took means to prevent the building of a Free Church; and he also wished to take notice of the extraordinary zeal and diligence with which some people laboured to put forward the seceding party, as if they were the great body of the Church of Scotland. For his own part, he thought, instead of any complaints being made against him, that he, on the contrary, had great right to complain of the treatment that he had received, and of the conduct of many persons connected with the seceding body, in the part of the country with which he was more immediately connected. In those districts, every species of agitation was resorted to, and no pains spared to excite the worst passions of the people. The agitators talked of toleration—it would be well if they only practised a little of that toleration themselves which they so loudly demanded from others. They had described him as a godless tyrant, who would trample down their rights; and this description of him had been given to one of the congregations during that most solemn period of divine service, the administration of the sacrament, and that language was applied to him by the person officiating. Though the worst feeling was thus exhibited against him, he hoped that he had preserved his own mind free from the influence of any angry sentiments. As he had so far occupied their Lordships' attention, he should just add, that having heard it was intended to perform divine service and administer the sacrament in one of the parishes with which he was connected, literally on the roadside, he wrote in order to have arrangements made for preventing this; it did, however, take place within a field at no considerable distance. But it was not alone the congregation of one parish which met there; it was a vast concourse of people assembled from all the adjacent parishes. What he said at that time was, that he saw no reason why the parties, whose case was now under consideration, could not do as o her Dissenters did—why, for example, th y might not go to the next town. Then he had been accused of dismissing servants of his for joining the Free Church. So far from that being the fact, he had not interfered with overseers of his who had exercised their influence with the labourers in his employment to induce them to join the Free Church. He had not been actuated by any illwill towards the Free Church of Scotland; and he might state that he had in his employment persons who had become members of that Church, and in whom he placed the most entire confidence. A great number of his tenants in different parts of the country had also become members of the Free Church, but with them he had had no difference. He believed that not one quarter of the discontent to which the noble Marquess had referred would have been manifested but for the itinerant agitators who had gone about the country, and who, instead of inculcating charitable feelings, had excited feelings of hostility against the Established Church and the landed proprietors. They had, in effect, used the language of a rev. gentleman who had taken a prominent part in that movement, that "the Establishment was a great moral nuisance, which ought to be swept from the face of the earth."

Lord Campbell said, he did not wish to throw any blame upon the noble Duke (Buccleuch), or the noble Earl (Cawdor), but he was anxious to state generally his sentiments upon a subject so interesting to his native country. He considered the noble Earl (Cawdor) was fully justified in doing everything in his power to prevent the disruption of the Church of Scotland; for in his (Lord Campbell's) opinion the disruption of that Church would be a tremendous national calamity. He thought that the Church of Scotland, for which he entertained the highest respect and reverence, had, for many generations conferred the greatest benefits upon that country. But he must say, that any great proprietor in a county or parish, who would endeavour to persecute those who had left the Established Church, by refusingthem the means of erecting places of worship, abused the rights of property, and placed those rights in great jeopardy. Though he did not agree in the principles upon which the recent secession had taken place, it was impossible not to admire and respect the motives by which the seceding members of the Church had been actuated —they had acted in a most noble and disinterested manner, and had sacrificed all prospects of worldly advantage for conscience' sake. It could not be said that the Free Church did not inculcate sound doctrine and pure morality; but he regretted, with the noble Earl opposite the intolerance manifested by some of its members. He thought, that while not a few of them would resist persecution themselves, they would not be slow to persecute others; but he considered that the conduct of great landed proprietors, who, after the disruption had taken place, endeavoured to embarrass and harass the members of the Free Church, by preventing them from purchasing sites in localities where a place of worship was needed, was greatly to be deprecated. He believed there was no proprietor in Ireland, who, however strong his Protestantism might be, and however he might disapprove of the Popish religion, would not allow a site for the erection of a Roman Catholic Chapel. The law, as it now stood, was certainly in favour of those who refused such grants The petition presented by his noble Friend prayed that the law might be altered, and he considered that if these refusals were persisted in, some alteration would be necessary. In the case of the railroads their Lordships had interfered with the rights of private property in a manner which called forth the nightly vituperation of his noble and learned Friend (Lord Brougham), who had left the House. Having done this, he did not see why, if it became indispensably necessary, it would be any violation of the just rights of property, if, under certain restrictions, they should provide, that on reasonable compensation being given to a proprietor, sites should be granted for the erection of places of worship in connexion with the Free Church. This might be done by appeal to the Court of Session, or some other tribunal. He hoped, however, that such a step would not be necessary, and that if a reconciliation between the Established Church and the Free Church was hopeless, both parties would remember that they were Christians.

The Marquess of Breadalbane replied. He thought the charge of intolerance imputed to the Free Church somewhat misapplied. He believed they were ready to act on the principle of giving toleration to all religious persuasions — amongst others, to the Roman Catholic. This was the description given of one of these meetings by the clergyman who officiated:—

"I too, Sir, have been at Canobie; and never shall I forget the scene that was there presented to my sight. I went to Canobie amid snow and storm, and had formed the resolution within myself not to speak to them of the privations and sufferings they were undergoing. I was glad, Sir, that I had formed this resolution, for I could not have trusted myself to speak to them of the wrongs they were called to endure. When I went from Langholm on Sabbath morning to the place where I was to preach, the roads were covered with the melting snow, the wind was biting cold, the Esk was roaring in full flood, and a more bleak and wintry prospect it is impossible to conceive. On turning a point in the road, I suddenly came upon 500 people collected together to hear the Gospel; and so sudden, impressive, and desolate was the whole scene, that when it broke upon our view, the man who drove me to the spot looked in my face, and burst into tears. I never saw such a scene before; God grant that I may never see such a scene again! Had the Duke of Buccleuch been there, he could not have withheld his tears at the sight. The hardest heart must have melted to see so many, young and old, assembled on that open road for the worship of the God of their fathers. A tent was erected for me under the leafless branches of a tree, which, in truth, afforded little protection to me or to them: but, Sir, I found I could not preach in that tent, It may seem to some an unaccountable kind of feeling in me; but you can understand it. I felt as if I could not preach in that tent while those poor people stood shivering round me. I have been much struck to find that, in very similar circumstances, when preaching on a bleak moor, Richard Cameron, in his wanderings, was accommodated with a tent; but he felt that, while the people stood unprotected around him, he could not preach in it. It was with the same feeling that, upon this occasion, I could not preach to those people from the tent. I left it and took up my place upon the ground. Before I was half through with the sermon, lashing torrents of rain came down upon me, and soon I was almost as wet as if I had been dragged through the river that rolled by us in winter floods. On the conclusion of the service—while the rain fell heavy—I said to some gentlemen who were present, that it would be cruelty to ask these people to come back again; but with one voice, they protested against my resolution, and said, with an earnestness which bespoke the earnestness of their hearts, that if I would remain to preach, they would come back, and remain to hear me if it were till midnight."

Were not such things enough to excite the feelings of the people? As toleration was, in theory, a part of the Constitution, it ought to be observed in every part of the country.

Petitions read, and ordered to lie on the Table.

New Zealand.] The Earl of Chichester presented a petition from the Church Missionary Society of Africa and the East, respecting the rights of the natives to the full enjoyment of their lands, and praying that the same may be effectually secured to them. It stated, that there were 35,000 attendants at religious worship, 15,000 scholars, and 300 native teachers. The petitioners stated, that from the period of the cession of the land by the native princes, they did everything to promote harmony between the aborigines and the colonists: that they were deeply impressed with the necessity of having the land question speedily and finally settled. That the Queen, by the Treaty of Waitangi, guaranteed full and undisputed possession of their lands to the natives, and that, in the opinion of the petitioners, the Report of the Committee of the House of Commons, affecting the rights of the native princes, was contrary to the principles of justice, and to the express declaration of the Treaty of Waitangi. Their Lordships could understand the alarm felt by the Society, whose petition he had read, as well as the alarm of all those who took an interest in their happiness and welfare. The missionaries of the Society were alarmed at a course of policy being suggested, the pursuance of which would set aside the Treaty of Waitangi, which provided, that natives should not have lands taken away from them by virtue of the sovereignty over the island, ceded by them to the British Crown. Nothing, he thought, could be more clear, than the actual meaning of the Treaty; and he believed that the New Zealanders were sufficiently enlightened and educated, perfectly to understand the interpretation which common sense would put upon it. To act in any way in contravention to the Treaty, would be to pursue a course at once fraught with disaster to the natives and to the settlers in New Zealand. He wished to take the opportunity of making a statement to the House upon the part of the Church Missionary Society, because, among other charges made by the friends of the Company, was one which accused the missionaries in New Zealand of having acted in an improper manner; of having, in fact, impeded the progress of the Colony, and of having obtained—not by the most reputable means—a very large quantity of land. Now, the land in question was held under certain regulations made by the Missionary Society, which allowed a certain sum of money to the missionaries for every child above fifteen years of age; that money had been invested in the purchase of land, obtained, not for the private advantages of the missionaries, but for the public good. The regulations had been strictly acted upon in these purchases, and he possessed authentic information of the exact quantity of land so obtained. The Society had also purchased a certain portion of the land for the purposes of the mission, but the whole of this property had been placed at the disposal of the Crown. No missionary held more land than he was strictly entitled to hold under the regulations of the Society, and there was no instance of a missionary's claim having been disallowed by the Government Commissioner. In the cases in which a reduction had been made in the quantity of land possessed by missionaries, the reduction had been effected with the perfect consent of the holders. He would remind the House of the favourable testimony borne to the conduct of the missionaries of the Church Society, by all who had had an opportunity of witnessing it. New Zealand had been visited by many travellers—some of them in an official capacity; it had been recently visited by two bishops, and the conduct of the missionaries had also been watched by witnesses not likely to be partial to them—he meant the emissaries of a neighbouring, not a rival institution—the Wesleyan mission—the missionaries of the Church Society had been watched, and their conduct had been commented upon by all those witnesses to it, and he had never heard it asserted that they had been led away from their ministerial duties by any occupation connected with the possession of land. On the contrary, every report which he had seen on the state of New Zealand was most creditable to the missionaries, and proved them to be most worthy and disinterested men. One of the great objects he had in making these remarks was, if possible, to draw from Government some assurance that the alarm felt by the petitioners, from the cause to which he had alluded, was unfounded. He believed that the maintenance of that interpretation hitherto put upon the Treaty of Waitangi was of the greatest importance to our own reputation for good faith, and to the cause of the civilization and progress of New Zealand. So long as the missionaries had been unmolested by voluntary settlers, nothing could have been more satisfactory than the way in which the natives had conducted themselves, and nothing more rapid than the progress they had made in Christian knowledge. He hoped that the Government would feel the great importance of promoting that object, and would recollect that it could only be attained by maintaining the strictest good faith towards the natives themselves—by showing that we were alive to their bet interests, and that we had taken New Zealand under our protection, as much with a view to their benefit as our own.

Lord Stanley: Your Lordships will feel that it would be very inconvenient were I at all to enter at this time upon the general question connected with New Zealand. I have no intention of troubling you with a single word upon that subject; but the noble Earl has indicated a desire to hear the views of Her Majesty's Government as to that Treaty by which the sovereignty of New Zealand was ceded to the British Crown. I have no hesitation in giving the noble Earl the assurance which he seems to desire. At the same time, however, I should have thought—whatever may have been the suspicions—whatever may have been the blame cast upon the Government in the matter—that the course which they have pursued would have prevented its being imagined for a moment that they entertained an idea of avoiding, or in any way violating a Treaty by which they consider themselves to be bound. Almost the whole of the difficulty with which the Government has had to contend in New Zealand, has arisen out of the apparently conflicting engagements entered into towards the New Zealand Company on the one hand, and, under the Treaty of Waitangi, towards the natives on the other. Had we felt ourselves at liberty to depart from the strictest fulfilment of the terms of that Treaty, we should have met but little difficulty; and in proof of the fact, our embarrassments have arisen mainly from our feeling that, however desirable and important it is to promote the colonization of New Zealand, yet that object would be very dearly purchased were it to be obtained by the slightest reflection on the good faith of this country, or by any liability to the imputation that we wished to shrink from an engagement we entered into with the natives—an engagement which I think the natives perfectly understand, the full importance of which I think they are as deeply impressed with as we can be—and an engagement which we have always felt that the Government of this country were bound to adhere to in its fullest integrity. I assure your Lordships that we have strictly, in every instruction we have issued (and the Papers upon the Table prove the fact), insisted on the strict fulfilment of the spirit and the letter of the Treaty of Waitangi. Our instructions upon that point have been uniform. They were given to Captain Fitzroy, and whatever instructions may have been since despatched to his successor, they have in this respect remained unaltered. We have told him—our declarations to the effect have been reiterated—that while he should seek in every possible mode to promote the amicable settlement of the affairs of the New Zealand Company, that he should always consider it to be the paramount duty devolved upon him, specially, and scrupulously, and religiously to fulfil our solemn engagements with the natives of New Zealand.

Lord Monteagle thought that it would be very satisfactory were the noble Lord to state more definitely what was the precise construction put by the Government upon the Treaty in question. He would wish to know whether he carried the principle so far as to assume that there was to remain to a semi-barbarous population such a right over the whole of the immense territory of New Zealand as would preclude the possibility of our exercising a right of government, except by the permission of the natives themselves. With respect to the general subject, he was far from adopting all the views of the New Zealand Committee. He knew the difficulties which the Colonial Office had to contend with in the cases of Colonies founded by unauthorized settlers. Most of the difficulties of New Zealand had arisen from that cause, and from the character of many of the original settlers in New Zealand, comprehending, as they did, some of the worst portion of the population of Australia and of this country. He repeated that he did not by any means fully adopt the Report of the New Zealand Committee; but still the opinion of that body was entitled to very considerable weight, when it was recollected that it had been appointed with the approval and concurrence of the Colonial Office. He did not want to go beyond the fact that the Report of the Committee had been generally adverse to the system pursued by the Colonial Office in the administration of New Zealand; and the members of the Committee so far had been amply supported by events which had occurred in the Colony itself. But he entirely protested against the doctrine that the finding fault, even by inference, with the management of New Zealand, was to suggest that there had been any bad faith or double dealing on the part of the Colonial Office. Any such charge was as much unsupported by proof as it was contradicted by the character of the noble Lord at the head of that branch of the public service. Still, however, a more melancholy instance of mismanagement than that displayed in the local government of New Zealand, never was exhibited in the colonial administration of any country; and he was convinced that until there should be a clear and distinct exposition, upon the part of Government, of the exact construction which it would be prepared to put upon the Treaty of Waitangi, that the state of confusion which now existed in New Zealand would continue. He wished to guard himself from being supposed to acquiesce in all the statements of the petitioners; but he did believe that had the missionaries been left unmolested by the vicious population which had settled around them, the results of their labours would have been such as had been anticipated by his noble Friend who had presented their petition. But from the evil influence exerted upon New Zealand by its first settlers, a train of calamities arose. Insults had been offered to the British name, crimes had been committed, wars waged to an extent unequalled in the history of our colonial administration. He repeated that the Colonial Office was not to be blamed for this. He had been for a short time in that Office himself; and he could not forget not only the difficulties but the perfect impossibility which, as it seemed to him, existed in many of the duties of that Office, as at present constituted, being satisfactorily performed. In 1834 a change had taken place in the Colonial Office, which it would have been well to have adhered to. Our Colonies had increased in numbers and in importance, to such an extent, that his noble Friend, with all his energy and ability—or, indeed, that two equal to his noble Friend, would be incapable of carrying on the manifold duties of the Colonial Secretary in such a manner as to be generally satisfactory and generally successful, and as it had been comparatively easy to manage them fifty years ago. He expressed his regret that the improvements introduced into the constitution of the Colonial Office, in 1834, had not been adhered to.

The Earl of Chichester never considered that the Government could be fairly charged with any breach of faith in their administration of the affairs of New Zealand. The Church Missionary Society, however, had reasonable grounds for the fears expressed in their petition. He was satisfied with the distinct intimation of his noble Friend at the head of the Colonial Department, and he was sure that that intimation would be equally satisfactory to the petitioners.

Lord Stanley: I beg to say one word. I should have wished that my noble Friend had either abstained from touching on the topics to which he has alluded, or that he had brought forward the subject in a more distinct form, and at a period of the evening, and in a state of the House, when I could have entered into a full explanation of the different points alluded to. Under present circumstances, then, I will abstain from doing anything but answering the demand made upon me by my noble Friend as to the construction which Government is prepared to place upon the Treaty of Waitangi, The whole question of that Treaty I will not argue now. If my noble Friend will give me an opportunity of arguing it, I will undertake to prove to demonstration, that not only by the present, but by all former Governments—that not only by the noble Lord who preceded me, but by the noble Marquess who preceded him—that not only by the present but by former Parliaments, has the same construction been placed upon the Treaty of Waitangi—that construction which never was disputed by any authority, by any party, until the year 1842. I am prepared also to show, and whenever I am called on I shall show, in this House, that whatever may be the apparent discrepency between the conditions of arrangement entered into by Lord John Russell with the New Zealand Company, and those concluded under the Treaty of Waitangi, that discrepancy is not real, but apparent, and that it arose from Lord John Russell acting on the misrepresentation of facts made to him by the New Zealand Company. He conceded to that Company, on the part of the Crown, a certain number of acres, providing that that number of acres should be taken within a certain district—the foundation of the whole arrangement being the assertion and declaration of the New Zealand Company, that they had purchased the whole of that district, comprising a space of about twenty millions of acres, from the natives themselves. In that way, and in that way alone, can the arrangements of the noble Lord be consistent. In that way they are consistent, and in that way the declaration and agreement made by Lord John Russell, confirming, instead of contradicting, the Treaty of Waitangi —namely, that on the part of the Crown, he confirmed the claim of the Company to a certain tract of land, on the assumption that they had bought it from the natives. In that way I contend the arrangements of the noble Lord are perfectly consistent. His assumption, proved by his agreement, leads to the inference, that, in his opinion, the natives had a right to sell to the Company that tract of land which they did not inhabit; and I can show by repeated Acts of Parliament that that right to sell on the part of the natives, not the land which they occupied and enjoyed, but the waste land which they did not occupy or enjoy, was uniformly recognised during the period from 1836 to 1842. I am not prepared to say that there may not be some districts wholly waste and uncultivated—there are such in the northern island—but they are few in number; but I know that a large portion of the district in question is distributed among various tribes, all of whom have as perfect a knowledge of the boundaries and limits of their possessions—boundaries and limits in some places natural, in others artificial—as satisfactory and well defined, as were, one hundred years ago, the bounds and marshes of districts occupied by great proprietors and their clans in the Highlands of Scotland. With respect to the greater portions of New Zealand, I assert that the limits and rights of tribes are known and decided upon by native law. I am not prepared to say what number of acres in New Zealand are so possessed; but that portion which is not so claimed and possesed by any tribe, is, by the act of sovereignty, vested in the Crown. But that is a question on which native law and custom have to be consulted. That law and that custom are well understood among the natives of the islands. By them we have agreed to be bound, and by them we must abide. These laws — these customs — and the right arising from them on the part of the Crown—we have guaranteed when we accepted the sovereignty of the islands; and be the amount at stake smaller or larger; so far as native title is proved—be the land waste or occupied—barren or enjoyed, those rights and titles the Crown of England is bound in honour to maintain; and the interpretation of the Treaty of Waitangi, with regard to these rights, is, that, except in the case of the intelligent consent of the natives, the Crown has no right to take possession of land, and having no right to take possession of land itself, it has no right—and so long as I am a Minister of the Crown, I shall not advise it to exercise the power—of making over to another party that which it does not itself possess.

Petition read and ordered to lie on the Table.

FOREIGN LOTTERIES BILL.] Lord Stanley moved that this Bill be now read 2ª.

Lord Monteagle said, that nothing had been farther from the intention of the Government of which he had been a Member, than to encourage lotteries for the advantage of speculators at home or abroad; in fact, a Bill had been framed with the contrary effect; but he did not approve of that part of the Bill which deprived the informer of all inducement to follow up a prosecution where the law had been violated; he feared that, if the pecuniary motive were withdrawn, very few prosecutions would be instituted especially by informers.

The Lord Chancellor remarked, that the object of Government had of late been to get rid, as far as possible, of prosecutions by common informers for penalties, since nothing could be worse than a system under which they were encouraged. Prosecutions by the law officers of the Crown had, in many instances, been substituted, and an alteration might, he thought, be introduced into this Bill in Committee without endangering it.

Bill read 2ª.

COMMONS' ENCLOSURE BILL.] The House met at twelve o'clock, and proceeded in Committee with the remaining clauses, which, with Amendments, were agreed to, and the Report was ordered to be received.

COLLEGES (IRELAND). Sir James Graham, at the five o'clock sitting, moved the Third Reading of the Colleges (Ireland) Bill.

Mr. Bernal Osborne rose to bring forward the Amendment of which he had given notice, for an Address to Her Majesty, praying that she would be graciously pleased to direct an inquiry to be made into the amount of the revenues of Trinity College, Dublin. He said that he was fully sensible, at this advanced period of the Session, when the fatigues of July legislation overcame the energies of the House, that it was impossible for any Member to succeed in rousing the dormant attention, or in exciting the wasted energies of the Members of the House in favour of some particular subject. He felt, therefore, the difficulty of awakening the attention of hon. Members on the subject of his Motion, to the extent which the importance of the question so pre-eminently deserved; but, at the same time, it was his intention to condense what he felt it necessary to say in the smallest possible compass. He did not believe that he could be fairly charged with throwing any unnecessary impediment in the way of this measure, because, in accordance with the request of the right hon. Baronet, he had withdrawn his Motion on a former occasion, at a time when he had the chance of a much larger number of hon. Members present, and consequently a much greater probability of support than at present. The more he considered the subject, the more did he feel the force of the allegation that the measure was one which must be wholly inefficient for the purpose for which it was proposed, unless some great change were effected in the constitution of Trinity College, Dublin. He entertained no hostility to that institution. On the contrary, he had many friends among its members. But he could not conceal from himself the fact that the whole system pursued in that College was so totally unknown, that while the darkness respecting it was maintained, a stop must be put to all legislation in that House in any way connected with it. He would ask hon. Members, when they considered the vast and great resources of Ireland, and also when they recollected that the Roman Catholic gentry of that country annually send 10,000*l.* to the Society at Lyons for the Propagation of the Faith, whether the people of that country should be induced to look to the Consolidated Fund when any new institution was to be raised. During the present Session they had drawn considerable sums from that fund for the endowment of a Roman Catholic College, contrary to the feeling of the great majority of the tax-payers of this country. They were also called upon by that measure to take from the same source another amount for the Colleges, and which was to be done against the wishes of the Catholic bishops; and it was impossible to say what dips might be made into it in the course of next Session. The Land Commissioners also looked very temptingly at this fund; for they suggested or recommended that a grant for the Irish Constabulary should be taken from this source. He did not mean to enter upon this question at present; but he had no doubt that the Irish Members of that House would be constantly looking to this fund, as the pool of Bethesda was by cripples, that they might have a dip when the right hon. Baronet troubled the waters. Although he agreed with his hon. Friend the Member for Limerick in many things, he could not agree with him that it was not with good intentions that the Government brought forward this measure; but he believed that the wiser and more satisfactory course would have been, if they had in the first place made inquiry into the revenues of Trinity College, Dublin, with a view to the establishment of these institutions in connexion with that University. At this moment the whole of the higher education in Ireland was monopolized by eighteen or twenty Fellows of Trinity College, Dublin, who took to themselves all the endowments of that rich University. He found, from a return which had been laid before Parliament, that only one in 320,000 Roman Catholics went to that College; those who did attend were received there as long as the heads of the University could get any money for their education, but afterwards excluded them from all the endowments. On a late occasion the right hon. Member for the University of Dublin, when he was not present, resisted all inquiry into the subject, on the ground that the revenues of the College were private. Did the right hon. Gentleman represent the Colleges in that House in a private or corporate capacity? The Legislature had interfered with and remodelled the rights of all the municipal corporations in Ireland; and did the right hon. Gentleman mean to say that Parliament could not interfere with Trinity College as a corporation? As to the distinction between private and corporate rights, he would refer to the authority of a most eminent jurist on the point. He alluded to Sir James Macintosh. That eminent man said—

"Private property was one of those fundamental acts which constituted society. It was the band of society itself. But the acts which form and endow corporations are subsequent, and subordinate; the property of individuals is established as a general principle which seems coeval with society itself; but bodies, whether ecclesiastical or civil, are instruments fabricated by the Legislature for a specific purpose, which ought to be preserved whilst they are beneficial, amended when they are impaired, and rejected when they become useless and injurious."

He regarded this to be a clear distinction between public and private property; and notwithstanding the strenuous opposition which he might expect from the right hon. Member for the University of Dublin, and some other persons connected with Trinity College, he felt that he should have the support of the hon. Member for the University of Oxford; for that hon. Gentleman had said that he would vote for inquiry if any allegation of abuse were brought forward. Now, if he brought forward allegations of abuse, and if he proved satisfactorily that the charter had been violated, and that the endowments had been diverted from the purposes for which they were intended, and that the academical system had been changed, he should rely upon the support of the hon. Baronet. He probably should be met with the cuckoo cry, that this was a Protestant institution, established by a Protestant Queen for Protestant purposes. He would not be stopped by such an objection. He believed that, on inquiry, the religious opinions of Queen Elizabeth would not be considered to have been orthodox by the hon. Baronet the Member for Oxford. But let them see how much Protestant money was devoted to the endowment of this College. It was founded in 1592 by Queen Elizabeth, and it was endowed out of the confiscated estate of the Earl of Desmond, and it was built on the site of the Catholic monastery of Allhallows. The letter of the Lord Deputy, would show for what purpose this University was founded; he would, therefore, read an extract from it (A.D. 1591):—

"Whereby knowledge, learning, and civility may be increased among the Irish, and their children's children, especially those that be poor (as it were in an orphans' hospital, freely), may have their learning and education given them with more ease and lesser charges than in other Universities they can attain it."

So far, then, from its being endowed with Protestant money for an exclusive purpose, it was endowed with public money for public purposes. He defied the hon. Member to point out a single word in the charter which justified the assertion that it was for exclusive Protestant purposes. It was reserved to forty years later, when Strafford, for his own and his master's purposes, chose to introduce some arrangements with respect to Roman Catholic Fellows. He would go to the foundation of this institution; and when he was told that it was a College endowed with Protestant money for Protestant purposes, he would recommend those who alleged this to go to the fons et origo of this establishment. He understood that the right hon. Member for the University of Dublin alluded to the Oath of Supremacy the other evening, and intimated that the existence of that would prevent Catholics taking part in the University. If this was the case, why allow them to take degrees? The Member for Oxford, who was well acquainted with the history of his own and all other countries, must be aware that the system with respect to the Fellows in Trinity College was peculiar, and a departure from the general academical system. In fact the whole system of the University of Dublin was an anomaly, because the Fellows consisted of married persons. The rule and custom of the University had been changed in this respect within the last five years. It was enough to make Queen Elizabeth shudder in her grave to hear of a body of married priests holding the fellowships in the College established by her. Supposing, then, that the University had the power of abrogating the Statute in one instance, as they had done in this case, was it to be said that they had not the power in another? He was sure that Queen Elizabeth would have been more readily reconciled to the abandonment of a religious test with respect to a chemical professor, than to a body of married Fellows in the College. He thought that the hon. Member for Oxford could hardly resist his Motion, for the body of married Fellows was contrary to the whole system of academical institutions; and they might say of it that it was a gigantic scheme of collegiate connubiality. Though they had a body of married priests, Fellows of the College, residing within the walls of the University, he was told that a very small number of the Fellows attended in hall, and still fewer were present in chapel, which certainly was not a good example to set to the students. The object of the ecclesiastical patronage of the College was altogether nullified since the Fellows had been allowed to marry; for since that time only two had resigned their fellowships to take a living. The junior Fellow refused to resign and go out to a country living, where he would get an income of about 300*l.* a year, while he was secure of a good income, a residence in a very pleasant place, and his domus et placens uxor in Dublin. The truth was, that no Fellow who could get a wife would take a living. [Laughter.] This might appear to be a farce, but it was an undoubted fact, and he knew that a Fellow of Trinity College, Dublin, was considered a most eligible investment in the coteries there. He believed that the hon. Gentleman would agree with him so far. There was another allegation of abuse which he could establish. Every Fellow on his induction into his Fellowship took an oath in which was the following passage:—"Studiorum finis erit mihi theologiæ professio, ut ecclesiæ Dei prodesse possim." Now, so far from the Fellows of Trinity College devoting themselves to the study of divinity, several of them were eminent mathematicians, but the divines were few and far between. The great proportion, in fact, of the Fellows were men of science and mathematicians, and among them he could mention the names of Hamilton, Lloyd, and Robinson. Trinity College was composed of one Provost, seven senior Fellows, and twenty-five junior Fellows. There were twenty-five Professors. It was a difficult thing to ascertain the amount of their incomes, as there was no Income Tax in Ireland; but having taken some pains to inquire into the subject, he had no hesitation in saying that the gross revenues of Trinity College were 50,000*l.* a year. He would not weary the House by going into details on the subject, but he would give a sketch of the receipts from various sources. He took some of his estimates from the University Calendar of 1844, and others from members of the University. It appeared that the total of the income derived from teaching was 28,316*l.* a year. The rent from land held under the College, although it was difficult to get at it accurately, was very great. Some of the land must be very valuable, such as Brunswick-street and other streets in the neighbourhood; and, therefore, the estimate of the rental might be fairly taken at 21,684*l.* a year, thus making a total of 50,000*l.* a year. Of course if he knew exactly the amount of revenue of the College, all necessity for his Motion would be obviated. Such, he believed, was really the amount of the income, while the money expended in prizes, scholarships, &c., was only 4,404*l.* 14*s.* It was also stated, that with this deduction, and after the common expenses of the College were paid, the Fellows divided the remainder among them. ["No!"] Surely, if hon. Gentlemen would not agree to the Motion, they would favour him by stating how it was paid. At any rate, the duties of the Fellows were at an inverse ratio to their emoluments; for their duties were extremely small, while their incomes were very large. The seven senior Fellows were supposed to receive from 2,000*l.* to 3,000*l.* a year each. [Mr. Shaw: No.] Then, what did they receive? Why not lay a return on the Table of the House of their emoluments, or consent to inquiry? The junior Fellows received 1,500*l.* a year each, and besides this, the Fellows laid violent hands on many of the professorships. One of the senior Fellows, whose name it was unnecessary to mention, but who was a most excellent man, was regius professor of Greek, and he combined very oddly with this the offices of catechist and professor of oratory. There was another, who was also a catechist and professor of modern history and civil law. Thus, in addition to an income of 2,000*l.* a year from their fellowships, they received large fixed salaries attached to the professorships. He would appeal to any rational man whether they should not look for a different standard of eligibility for a professorship than the holding a University fellowship. Was it not obvious that a much better system was pursued in the Universities of Scotland and Germany, where the test of excellence and the amount of emolument depended upon the number of students attending the lectures of the professor? If the professors in Trinity College were paid according to the number of their pupils, and by them, their professorships would be worth between 30*l.* and 40*l.* a year each. This appeared farcical and ridiculous, yet they were told by the hon. Gentleman that they could not interfere, because it was private property? Look to the University of Dublin as the seat of education of the Protestant youths. As was truly said the other night by the right hon. Baronet at the head of the Government, a forced attendance at chapel was not very likely to generate a feeling of devotion and reverence. But those intended for holy orders were forced to attend at chapel, and the only other religious instruction they received was an examination in the Greek Testament. When they were preparing for ordination they went to a person called a "crammer," and they then took up "Mosheim's Ecclesiastical History," "Magee on the Atonement," and "Marsh's Lectures." They then went forth to country districts as clergymen, and from the nature of the education they received, entertained the most bitter feelings against the Catholic religion, regarding it, as it had been described in another place, as the master-piece of Satan. Here was a Protestant clergyman receiving his education in a place where all the emoluments were bestowed on Protestants, and where the Catholics were sedulouly excluded from every place of trust and emolument, which naturally engendered a feeling as to the inferiority of the latter. He repudiated all distinctions between institutions founded by the endowments of Catholics or Protestants. If there was an endowment of a Catholic institution from Protestant money, you would complain—how then could you take the endowment for the Protestant Church from the Catholics? But in this case did they intend to keep up Protestant exclusiveness in this College? He had always understood that the institutions were made for the people, and not the people for the institutions. On this point he would refer to a speech made a short time ago by the right hon. Secretary for the Home Department. That right hon. Gentleman declared that he could see no relation between science and sects, and then proceeded to say—

"In the case of metaphysics and moral philosophy, I can see no possible reason or necessity for requiring professors of any particular creed in order to render them competent teachers in those branches of instruction; and as for the other three branches, logic, geology, anatomy, they are entirely out of the question. If this held good with respect to the new Colleges, was he not prepared to do away with the system entirely?"

The continuance of the system in Trinity College, was, in fact, stating that the Protestants were the only fitting persons to teach chemistry, botany, anatomy, logic, oratory, and all other branches of art, and science, and literature. A short time ago, he found the following advertisement in a newspaper, reporting a vacant professorship in Trinity College:—

"Trinity College, Dublin—Pursuant to the provisions of the Act of 40 Geo. III., notice is hereby given, that the professorship of chemistry in Trinity College, Dublin, will become vacant on the 16th of May next, and that on Saturday, the 27th of May, the Provost and senior Fellows, at the board-room of Trinity College, will proceed to elect a professor of chemistry. The emoluments of this professorship consist of a sum of 200*l.* paid annually by the College, and of four guineas' fee paid by each person attending the professor's lectures. Under the provisions of said Act of Parliament, said professorship is open to Protestants of all nations, provided they shall have taken medical degrees, or shall have obtained a license to practise from the College of Physicians, in consequence of a testimonium under the seal of Trinity College."

The professorship was open to the Protestants of all nations, but it was shut to the Catholics of Ireland. It must be in the recollection of the House that the right hon. Baronet at the head of the Government, on a recent occasion, passed a high but a just eulogium on the attainments of Professor Kane, who, he stated, was the first professor of chemistry in Ireland. Now, it so happened, that Professor Kane was ineligible to this professorship, which was open to Protestants of all nations. A Frenchman, or a German, or a Spaniard might be eligible, but these professorships were shut to the people of Ireland. If the penal laws were wrong, do not allow such restrictions as these to exist, but carry out the principle of the Act of 1793. It was the bounden duty of the House rather to extend inquiry into the College, after the case which he had stated. The right hon. Baronet, who apparently had more love for a precedent than a principle, could be furnished with a striking one on this point. A Commission had been appointed to inquire into the Scotch Universities—why not have one, then, to inquire into the Irish University? The right hon. Gentleman said, that there were peculiarities in legislating for Ireland; but surely, that was no ground for resisting inquiry. If it could not be properly done by that House, why not submit it to Royal hands, and to a Sovereign who rivalled Elizabeth in all the high attainments of legislation, and was superior to her in all the softer attributes which adorned the woman, and under whose sway more had been done for Ireland than under all the Sovereigns before her? The hon. Member concluded by proposing the following Amendment:—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to direct an inquiry to be made into the amount of the Revenues of Trinity College, Dublin, from rents of College lands, endowments and bequests, fees on matriculation, on taking degrees, and from every other source; also, into the manner in which that income is expended, the number of Senior and Junior Fellows, of Professors, Scholars, and all other Officers of the College, with the amount of salary and allowances to each of them; with a view to ascertain whether the income or funds at present applied solely to the benefit of Protestants in Trinity College, Dublin, might not be beneficially extended, so as to make Roman Catholics and Protestant Dissenters eligible, if otherwise qualified, to all Scholarships, and to all such Fellowships, Professorships, and other Offices in Trinity College, Dublin, as are not intended for ecclesiastical purposes, or immediately connected with ecclesiastical endowment."

Mr. Bellew seconded the Motion. He said, a Catholic could not go through his studies at Oxford; he could go through his studies at Cambridge, but could not take a degree; at Dublin he could both study and take a degree. He could also vote for the Member of Parliament for the University. This was not included in the charter of Elizabeth. The hon. Member proceeded to draw a distinction between the systems pursued in the Universities of England, and that pursued in the University of Dublin. He maintained that so long as that system was to be continued, so long would exist that Protestant ascendancy which the Government appeared to think had gone by. He thought that there ought to be a second College united to Trinity College, forming together the University of Dublin.

Sir T. Fremantle said, that when, on a former occasion, the hon. Member for Wycombe had brought forward a similar Motion to the present, he had considered it his duty to resist it; and he might at once say that he came, in the present instance, to the same conclusion at which he had then arrived. Since the former discussion, however, he had had the subject more under his consideration, and he had also considered what grounds there were for the House of Commons addressing the Crown upon the question; and, having listened with attention to the speech of the hon. Member, he had been unable to discover that the hon. Member had alleged any Parliamentary grounds whatever for the adoption of the course recommended. It appeared to him that the hon. Member had not been able to allege any specific abuse or misappropriation of the moneys of this University. But what were, in detail, the abuses of which the hon. Gentleman complained? In the first place, he said that a certain number of the Fellows had been allowed to marry. It was not for him to give an opinion if that indulgence which had been given to Trinity College had been rightly conceded, or not; but he might be permitted to remind the hon. Gentleman, that that concession was an arrangement which had been made but a very few years ago, and during the period when Lord Fortescue was the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland—the previous Government having constantly refused to grant it—and he thought it was, therefore, rather hard on the part of the hon. Member to charge that as an abuse against the University, which had been done with the consent of the Government under which it took place, and against which he had never heard any complaint or remonstrance on the part of the people of Ireland. But the senior Fellows, said the hon. Member—and this was the head and front of their offence—enjoyed very large emoluments, amounting to between 2,000*l.* and 3,000*l.* a year. The hon. Member, indeed, did not say that he had any very accurate data to go upon in making this charge; but he (Sir T. Fremantle) thought that he ought, before he made such statements, to have had some better grounds for them than he appeared to have had. Now, if he mistook not, the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Shaw) who represented the University of Dublin, had made a statement not very long ago upon this subject, and had observed that, after making every inquiry into the case, he was prepared to state that the incomes of the senior Fellows did not exceed 1,500*l.*—and that a considerable portion of that sum was derived from professorships held by them, and to which offices the discharge of important duties was attached. He would put it to the House whether 1,500*l.* a year was too large a sum for them to enjoy, when the laborious duties they had to perform were taken into consideration. But it was alleged that they also held professorships. Why, a better arrangement could not be made than that the Fellows should superintend the education of the University. They remained in the College, as it seemed to him, for that especial purpose. And this ought not to be made a ground of complaint against Trinity College, for the same took place in other Universities. With regard to the patronage of livings which they held, he was not sufficiently acquainted with the details to speak upon this point; but he did not think the hon. Gentleman made out a very good case on the subject. The hon. Gentleman stated that the proceeds of the College amounted to 50,000*l.*; but it appeared that the rents derived from the property of the College, amounted to only 21,000*l.*, the remainder of the 50,000*l.* being derived from tuitions; but it was not fair to make the money obtained from the teaching of young men a ground of complaint against the College. The hon. Gentleman, and also the hon. Member for Louth said, that as long as Trinity College was maintained, they maintained Protestant ascendancy. But this had nothing to do with the administration of the funds of the College. Besides, hon. Gentlemen knew that Trinity College was as much open to Roman Catholics as it was to Protestants, for the purposes of education; and he was rejoiced to see that so many Roman Catholic Gentlemen looked back with satisfaction to the education which they received there. It might as well be said, that as long as they gave 26,000*l.* a year to Maynooth, from which Protestants were altogether excluded, that Roman Catholic ascendancy was maintained. He admitted that Parliament was competent to interfere, if any abuses or misappropriation of the public money, on the part of Trinity College, could be shown. But the hon. Gentleman had not made this a ground for his Motion. In 1818 and 1819, a Commission was appointed for the purpose of inquiring into all the schools of the United Kingdom; but the Universities were excluded from that inquiry. If they were now to allow this inquiry, it would be considered hard and offensive by Trinity College. It was true, as the hon. Gentleman stated, that a Commission was issued to inquire into the state of the Scotch Universities; but the circumstances were different, for there was at that time a grant of money from the public funds for those Universities, and, therefore, they were justly open to the cognizance of Parliament. There were, besides, irregularities and disputes in those Universities; and it was with the consent of the Universities themselves that the Government interfered. There was, therefore, no analogy between the two cases. The hon. Gentleman's Motion concluded by stating that it was made with the view of ascertaining whether the income and funds now solely applied for the benefit of Protestants might not also be applied for the benefit of Roman Catholics and Dissenters. But this was not a question which depended on the amount of revenue possessed by Trinity College. It was a question of law. The Court of Queen's Bench had already decided that the visitors could enter into the question, and give an opinion upon it. If the decision was against the gentleman who brought the case before the Court, it would be a subject for the interference of the Legislature. It could not be affected by the Motion of the hon. Gentleman. He did not think the hon. Gentleman had laid any grounds for his Motion, and he should, therefore oppose it.

Mr. Redington hoped that an Act would be passed on the subject, if the decision was against the person who brought the matter before the Courts in Dublin. With regard to the inquiring into the Scotch Universities, it was not confined to the money given by the State; and with respect to abuses, he was not quite clear that none existed in Trinity College. It was not fair to say that Trinity College was open to Roman Catholics, when they were excluded from all the prizes and rewards of industry and learning. The Roman Catholics of Ireland would not be satisfied till they were put on an equality with their Protestant fellow countrymen; and he thought this might be done with regard to the University of Dublin, by leaving all the professorships for the purposes of the Protestant religion in the hands of Protestants, and throwing open all other professorships to persons of all denominations. Roman Catholics could not hold any professorships at present, because they were obliged to take an oath to conform to the liturgy of the Church of Ireland.

Mr. George A. Hamilton had certainly anticipated that the Motion of the hon.

Member for High Wycombe would be resisted strenuously by Her Majesty's Government; and it was to him a cause of much satisfaction that he had not been mistaken in that anticipation. He had grounded his expectations upon the strong expressions which had been used by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in a speech which he had made not very long ago, when resisting a similar Motion in reference to the English Universities. The right hon. Gentleman on that occasion had stated that a Royal Commission of inquiry in such matters was generally adopted as an instrument of reform, where great abuses were known to exist, and not as a weapon which could be called into every day use, for the mere purpose of gratifying curiosity. The very fact of instituting a trial implied censure, and though the charge was disproved, the impression remained. Such being the language of the right hon. Gentleman with regard to Oxford and Cambridge, he should certainly have felt surprised if different language or a different course had been taken with reference to the University of Dublin. He would take it upon himself to state, that there was no indisposition on the part of the Provost and Fellows of Dublin College, to afford to Her Majesty's Government any information which they might think proper to seek for any useful purpose that was consistent with the objects for which the University of Dublin was established, and which might equally be sought for in reference to the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge. But he had a right to consider the Motion before the House as a hostile Motion, originating with a hostile party, and with a design certainly not friendly to the University of Dublin. With regard to the object of the hon. Member, it was not concealed in his Motion that his real object was to confiscate a part of the property of the University, and to apply it to purposes different from those for which it was designed. And with regard to the hostile feelings of the hon. Member, what had been the language which that hon. Member had always used —what had been the language he had used that night, in reference to the University of Dublin? Why, the hon. Member had intimated that scarcely any men of distinction had been connected with that University. [Mr. Osborne had spoken of theologians.] But the one or two exceptions which the hon. Member had quoted, were not theologians. He had quoted, as the exceptions, Sir W. Hamilton and Professor M'Cullagh. At all events, not long ago, the hon. Member had asked, in somewhat contumelious terms, who ever heard of any eminent man being educated at Dublin College; and on another occasion he had urged it is a matter of reproach that the University of Dublin should be misrepresented, as he was pleased to say, by his right hon. Colleague and himself, neither of whom had been educated there, intimating that no person educated at that University could be found qualified to represent it. Certainly, when the hon. Member talked of never having heard of any eminent men who were educated in Dublin College, he felt that he had to argue with the hon. Member under some disadvantage. He was compelled to suppose that the hon. Member had never happened to hear that there existed within the last century a very distinguished prelate of the Irish Church, whose name was Jebb, distinguished as a scholar, distinguished as a divine, and distinguished also for his sound and practical knowledge of Ireland. It happened upon one occasion, in a speech in the House of Lords, which speech at the time caused no inconsiderable sensation, that this prelate adverted, amongst many other things, to the very matter referred to by the hon. Member; and in doing so, he used the following expressions, which might convey an answer to the hon. Member:—

"The University of Dublin, which in its earliest days produced Usher, the most profoundly learned offspring and ornament of the Reformation, and Loftus in oriental letters, rivalled only by his great coeval, Pocock; which afterwards sent forth to shine among the foremost of an Augustine age, Parnel, the chastest of our poets; Swift, the purest of our prose writers; and Berkeley, the first of our metaphysicians; Goldsmith, the most natural depictor of life and manners; Burke, the greatest philosopher and statesman of his own or any other age or country; Grattan, the eloquent asserter of his country's rights—the parent of Irish independence;"— and in later times he would remind the hon. Member that the erudition and learning of Dr. Hales and Archbishop Magee, and Dr. Graves and Dr. Miller, and the eloquence of Plunkett and North—[Sir R. Peel: Bushe and Curran.] Yes, Bushe and Curran. He only mentioned those whose names occurred to him at the moment. He would further add, that, however they might differ in politics, it must be a matter of pride to every one connected with Dublin College, that the transcendent eloquence and brilliant imagination of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, the Member for Dungarvon, had been nurtured under the auspices of that University. Amongst those who are, or have been, in the present generation, more immediately connected with the University of Dublin, the House, he was sure, would recognise the names of Professor Lloyd, Professor M'Cullagh, who had been mentioned by the hon. Member, and to whom recently the Copley prize had been awarded by the Royal Society for his beautiful researches respecting light—Sir William Hamilton, the Astronomer Royal; Dr. Robinson, the astronomer at Armagh; Dr. Wall, well known to the right hon. Member for Dungarvon, [Mr. Sheil: Hear!]—and one of the most distinguished scholars of these times in the ancient oriental languages. He might appeal to an hon. Member whom he saw opposite, the Member for Kendal, whether these names, as well as many others whom he might enumerate, such as Professors Kane and Apjohn, were not well known and acknowledged by every man of science in Europe, as persons of whom Trinity College, Dublin, might justly be proud. And now with respect to theologians—he supposed the hon. Member would not deny that Bishop O'Brien was eminent as a theologian. Doctor O'Brien had been a Fellow; Doctor Elrington and Doctor Singer were at present connected with Dublin College. It would be unfair and invidious to institute a comparison between the Fellows of one University and those of another; but when the hon. Member spoke of the Fellows of Dublin College being unoccupied and not distinguished as authors, he must remind the House, that while in the two great English Universities, there were, as he believed, more than 900 Fellows—in Dublin there were but thirty, and of those thirty, the twenty-three junior Fellows were engaged in the education of a body of young men not much inferior in point of numbers to the undergraduates at either of the English Universities. He did not know the precise number of undergraduates at Oxford or Cambridge, but there was considerably more than 1,500 in Dublin College under the instruction of the twenty-three junior Fellows. With respect to the seven senior Fellows, he could assure the House these offices were anything but sinecures; in the first place, as the Board of the College, they had the whole direction and management and supervision of that great institution, and the estates and everything connected with it; in addition to which, most of them were Professors, and in that capacity had onerous duties to perform—and they had, further, the preparation for the fellowship examinations, which it must be obvious required a constant course of severe study. He would now say a very few words on the other subject to which the hon. Member had referred. The hon. Member had urged as a matter of reproach, that the Dublin University was represented in that House by two persons, neither of whom had been educated there. Now, as far as his right hon. Friend and Colleague was concerned, he must deny that this could justly be said to be the case. His right hon. Friend had gone through the whole course, or nearly the whole course, of his education at Dublin College; and although it was true that he had afterwards gone to Oxford for a short time, and taken his degree of A.B. there, substantially he had received his education in Dublin College. With regard to himself, he had to acknowledge that he was open to the reproach of the hon. Member; and he acknowledged he had felt it to be an objection to him. But, because he had been elected, it was by no means fair to raise the inference that there was any want of persons who had been educated in Dublin College eminently qualified, much better qualified than he was, to represent that University, so far as talents and collegiate attainments were concerned. He would say nothing of his right hon. Friend near him (the Attorney General for Ireland), further than this, that every one who knew that right hon. Gentleman, must know that in point of talents and acquirements he was eminently fitted to represent the University where he had graduated. Besides the Attorney General, he had had, as his competitor, a gentleman formerly a Fellow, now a Professor, in that University, Dr. Longfield, a gentleman whom he did not hesitate to acknowledge was greatly his superior in talents and academical acquirements, and who certainly would have represented the University with great ability. But the fact was, the constituency of the University of Dublin consisted now of nearly 2,000 persons—the resident gentry and clergy of Ireland, as well as the Fellows and scholars of the College—and it did happen that there were other considerations involved—the recollections, perhaps, he might say of former contests in which he had been engaged, and especially those for the city of Dublin, which had excited so much interest—had induced the constituency to prefer him (though he had not come forward of himself) to others far more distinguished for talents and acquirements, and in many respects much better qualified to represent the University of Dublin than himself. He should now proceed to notice the objections which had been made to the present constitution of Dublin University. The first of those objections was its Protestant character. Now, in reference to this, he was prepared to maintain that it was a Protestant institution, and founded for Protestant purposes and objects. Really, considering the time when it was founded, the circumstances of the country at that period, and the parties who had been principally instrumental in its foundation, he did not think that any hon. Member could argue seriously that it was not founded and designed for Protestant purposes. Could it be supposed that Queen Elizabeth at that time, and under the then circumstances of Ireland, could have contemplated anything but an institution for promoting the principles of the Reformation? Could it be supposed that Archbishop Loftus, and Usher, and Burleigh, in those times—or Bishop Bedell and Archbishop Laud, and Sir William Temple, and Jeremy Taylor, in later times —all of whom had been engaged in framing the constitution and statutes of the University, could have intended that it should have been placed under a mixed government of Protestants and Roman Catholics? The statutes of the University were in themselves quite clear upon that point; and those statutes were confirmed by the Act of Uniformity and several other Acts of Parliament to which he might refer. But while the character of the University was essentially Protestant in respect of its governing body, it was most tolerant and liberal in respect to the admission of students, and in affording to students every opportunity both of distinction and emolument that was consistent with the constitution of the University. He was aware that this subject had been referred to on former occasions; but he thought it right, notwithstanding, that the House should be again informed how the matter really was in those respects. In the first place, it should be understood that there was no test whatever on entrance, or with reference to any degree, except degrees in divinity; the Oath of Allegiance was all that was required on the taking of any degree, except divinity. And next, with respect to the honours and emoluments of the College, there were thirty sizarships, objects both of honour and advantage, open equally to Roman Catholics and Protestants; and no imputation of unfairness or partiality had ever been imputed to those who conducted the examinations of Dublin College. All the University honours at the term examinations, and the gold medals at the examination for degrees, were open equally to Roman Catholics and Protestants; so were the University degrees, except in divinity; so were the vice-chancellor's prizes—prizes in English, Latin, and Greek, prose and verse; the Primate's Hebrew prize, Law's mathematical prizes, the Berkeley gold medals, the prizes for modern languages; in history, the medical prizes, those in Biblical Greek, those in the Irish language, and which, for the last two years, had been gained by the Roman Catholics: the moderatorships, or highest honours in mathematics, classics, ethics, and logic; premiums in political economy, catechetical premiums, Hebrew premiums, the exhibitions (which were emoluments) from schools of the foundation of Erasmus Smith, at Drogheda, Ennis, Galway, and Tipperary; the royal scholarships, twenty-five in number, and from 50*l.* to 30*l.* in value, from the schools of Armagh, Dungannon, Enniskillen, and Middleton, and the two Lloyd exhibitions. These honours and emoluments were open to Roman Catholics, equally with Protestants, among the students in Dublin College. He would now come to the higher offices in the University; and he was enabled to state, that the following offices and professorships were open equally to Roman Catholics and Protestants:—the professorship of English law, the regius professorship of physic, the high office of astronomer royal, the professorship of French and German, of Italian and Spanish, of political economy, of civil engineering, the lectureship in natural history, the professorship of moral philosophy, and of the Irish language. With regard, however, to the two latter, although there was no rule to exclude Roman Catholics, yet he felt bound to say in candour, from their connexion with divinity students, it was not likely that the Board could feel warranted in appointing a Roman Catholic. His hon. Friend the Member for Dundalk had been kind enough to point his attention to the Act of Elizabeth, and to subsequent Acts, by which, as he thought, it was necessary that all professors should make a declaration of conformity to the Established Church. He, though he had not had the opportunity of examining the Statute Book since his hon. Friend had spoken, could not help thinking that these Acts must have been subsequently repealed. At all events, he felt sure they were obsolete, and that, in point of fact, no such declaration of conformity was exacted in the cases he had enumerated. If the House would bear with him for a short time longer, he would now enumerate the offices which were not open to Roman Catholics, and the reasons on account of which Roman Catholics were ineligible to those offices. He was sorry to trespass so long upon the indulgence of the House, but it was really important to the University he had the honour to represent that these matters should be clearly understood. The first office from which Roman Catholics were excluded, was the provostship. He thought it could be scarcely necessary for him to defend that exclusion. There was no one, he thought, in that House, whatever might be his religion, who could say that, considering the objects and constitution of the College, it would be at all consistent with the nature of that high office that it should be filled by any one but a member of the Established Church. Roman Catholics were rendered ineligible by the letters patent of Charles I., by the College statutes, by several Acts of Parliament, the Act of Uniformity, and the Act of 1793. The same arguments and reasons were applicable to the office of vice-provostship. The nature, also, of the office of the Fellows, their being engaged in the religious as well as general education of the Protestant students, appeared to him to justify and render necessary the exclusion of Roman Catholics in reference to the fellowships. It was expressly declared by the College statutes, that all Fellows, except three, should take priests' orders in the Established Church, clearly proving the object of those offices. By the College statutes, also, Roman Catholics were excluded expressly. The same Acts of Parliament, moreover, which applied to the provostships, applied to the fellowships. The professorships of divinity must obviously be confined to members of the Established Church. The professor of Greek, by the College statutes, must be one of the Fellows, and, as such, a Protestant. The professors on the foundation of Erasmus Smith—a private foundation—must be Fellows, and, as such, Protestants. The three University professorships of anatomy, chemistry, and botany, by the Act of the 25th George III., for establishing a school of physic, were open to Protestants of all countries; and of course, by inference, Roman Catholics were excluded. With regard to the scholarships, as the case was now pending, he could say nothing on the subject. The professor of civil law, by the King's letter of 1668, must be a Fellow. He had now, he believed, enumerated every honour, every office, and every emolument connected with the University of Dublin; he had stated what were, and what were not, open to Roman Catholics, and the reasons; and he trusted there would be no further misapprehension on the subject. But there was another matter of complaint urged against Trinity College, which he felt bound to notice. In a petition which had been presented to the House, signed by many most respectable individuals, and in the speech of the hon. Member, it had been imputed to that College that it was defective in many important branches of practical education. Now, in the first place, he must remind the House that a University was not intended to be a mere mechanics' institution, and that the higher branches of knowledge and science should occupy the highest places in a course of University education. But he thought, in practical matters, Trinity College might challenge a comparison with any other College in the Empire. He could state how matters were in this respect: an engineering school, which was well attended, had been established by the Board—lectures were given in that school by three of the Fellows, as also by Mr. Oldham and Dr. Apjohn, on the practical application of chemistry, mineralogy, and mechanics, to engineering—and they had placed Sir John Macneill at the head of that school, who afforded the class the best opportunities of a practical acquaintance with that subject. There was also a professorship of geology, recently held by a distinguished geologist, Mr. Phillips, whose removal from Dublin was a matter of great regret. There was a public course of lectures, as well as a private one, in that school. In botany there was an herbarium formed; an admirable collection was purchased, and Mr. Harvey, a well-known botanist, made curator; in zoology there was a museum open to the public, and Mr. Ball appointed director. He believed that the means which had been taken by Trinity College to advance the study of natural history were estimated by naturalists in this country, and that he might appeal also on this subject to the hon. Member for Kendal. Then there was the magnetical observatory, under Professor Lloyd, established at great expense by the Board of Trinity College, in which, during the last six years, most important observations had been made, from which there could be no doubt interesting and valuable results would arise. There were also lectures in political economy, moral philosophy, and biblical Greek. He thought he had stated enough to prove that the promotion of study in practical matters was not neglected by the Fellows of Trinity College. He would, however, repeat, that they considered as paramount a certain progress in the usual University branches of classics and science, and that they therefore withheld certificates for attendances on these new courses, unless the students should have passed through the science and classical course of the first year. He was sorry to have occupied so much of the time of the House. He would resist the Motion of the hon. Member, because he could not but think that it was most inexpedient and unnecessary to subject gentlemen of the highest attainments, who had devoted themselves for many years to the education of youth, to the unpleasantness of an inquiry, as the hon. Member proposed, into the amount and items of their income. The House ought to recollect that these were men who, from their talents and acquirements, must certainly have risen in other professions to the highest eminence. The income of the senior Fellows had been stated at 2,000*l.* a year: this he believed to be an exaggeration. He had reason to suppose that 1,500*l.* was the highest emolument which any senior Fellow enjoyed in any capacity from the College. But even if the amount were 2,000*l.* a year, he should be sorry to think that there was any one who would grudge even that amount as the recompense for the successful cultivation of the highest talents, and for the devotion of twenty or thirty years to the education of the youth of Ireland. He further resisted the Motion, because he could see no reason why, if an inquiry were to be made into the revenues of Trinity College, Dublin, a similar inquiry should not be made into the revenues of Trinity College, Cambridge, and King's College, or any other College which had the reputation of being wealthy. No case of abuse had been made out. The hon. Member had been obliged to rest his case upon what he called the gigantic connubiality of the system in Dublin College. He would not enter now into the question of the expediency or inexpediency of permitting the Fellows to marry. That, however, was a Government question—not grounds for such an inquiry as was proposed. Many hon. Members had almost strained their consciences to support the Irish Colleges Bill. He would confess that he was one of them. He had supported it because he believed that education was wanted among the middle classes in Ireland; and he sincerely hoped and trusted the measure would have a salutary and happy effect upon the social condition of that country; but he warned Her Majesty's Government against attempting to carry further the principle of that measure. Its principle was scarcely upheld by any one—though the particular measure was thought justifiable under the peculiar circumstances of Ireland. But it was most essential it should be understood that the same principle was not to be applied to the other institutions. Great concessions had recently been made, and were still making, with the hope of conciliating the Catholics of Ireland. The conciliation that people hoped for would certainly be marred, and discord and distrust excited, if the Protestants were to see that each concession was made the ground of fresh aggression—and if, after institutions being created for the Roman Catholics of Ireland, which Protestants thought questionable in their mixed government and the character of their education, attempts were to be countenanced to apply a similar principle to institutions which the Protestants of Ireland looked upon as their own. After thanking the House for the patient attention with which he had been listened to, Mr. Hamilton concluded by expressing his intention of offering his most strenuous opposition to the Motion of the hon. Member for Wycombe.

Mr. Warburton said, that the question before the House was not the number of great men which Trinity College had produced, but whether the objects for which the University had been established had been fully accomplished according to the purposes described in its charters. What were the purposes for which the College had been established? What were the circumstances under which the fellowships and scholarships were founded? They ought to consider those questions attentively, and whether they had been fully carried out, and, if not carried out, in what particulars they had been neglected. The object of the Motion of the hon. Member was to ascertain by a Commission, to be appointed by Her Majesty, if the objects for which the University was established had been carried into effect, and if the money which was appropriated to that purpose had been properly expended. The original objects seemed to be of a most comprehensive character — to teach the liberal arts; and it appeared from the original charter that at the period of its establishment the University was so fully adequate to the teaching of the inhabitants of Ireland, that teaching the liberal arts in any other institution in Ireland was considered wholly unnecessary. That was the nature of the original charter in 1592; but there was a subsequent charter of Charles I., in 1637, and in that charter it would appear, from the sums appropriated as stipends to the provost, Fellows, and scholars, that they possessed but small emoluments. The provost was by that charter allowed 100*l.* per annum, the seven senior Fellows were allowed 9*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* each, and the four junior Fellows 3*l.* per annum. It was true that money was at that time of a different value from the present; but allowing for that difference, the emoluments of the provost and Fellows was at that time very much below what it was under the present system. They ought, therefore, to consider whether there were under the existing system a larger amount of profit and emolument given to the provost and Fellows than the amount which was intended to be given by that charter. In Elizabeth's time, the fellowships were established under a system calculated to encourage the acquisition of learning and the cultivation of the liberal arts, which purposes it was intended to accomplish by a rapid succession of Fellows. In Cambridge and Oxford the fellowships were rendered conducive to the encouragement of learning, by restrictions, in some cases, to a certain number of years, or by becoming vacated on the marriage of the person holding the fellowship, or his being appointed to a living beyond a certain amount of value. There was no sufficient reason why an inquiry should not be made into the amount of emolument which the Fellows in Trinity College received under the existing system, and into the regulations under which those fellowships were now held; and if it were ascertained that those regulations, and the emoluments of the fellowships, were not in accordance with the charter, then in that case the original regulations ought to be enforced, if they were found to be better calculated for the encouragement of learning and the cultivation of the liberal arts. It appeared by the charter of Charles I. that Fellows were not permitted to marry—that if any one contracted marriage during his fellowship, it should be vacated; and in 1811 the Fellows themselves, it appeared, agreed, as every one would be supposed to do who had read the charter of Charles I., that such was the meaning of the words of the charter. If this regulation were for the encouragement of learning, had they not a right to inquire as to why it had been departed from? In Trinity College, Dublin, and in Trinity College, Cambridge, from precisely the same premises, they arrived at the very opposite conclusions. In Trinity College, Cambridge, it was held that the rapid succession of fellowships, being held, as they were, for no longer than seven years after being obtained, unless the parties took holy orders, was conducive to the encouragement of learning within the University. In Trinity College, Dublin, somehow or other, those to whom the regulation of this matter was referred, were acting upon the very opposite principle. If this alone were the question to be raised before such a Commission, he thought it was but fit that a Royal Commission should be issued by Her Majesty in reference to it. Seeing that the practice of Trinity College, Dublin, was so opposed to the practice, in this respect, of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, and that the general belief, in these latter, was, that the rapid succession of fellowships tended to give encouragement to learning at an early period of life, he must say that this subject alone deserved the attention of Her Majesty's Government, and that, on this subject alone they should issue a Royal Commission for the purpose of inquiry. His hon. Friend had also made out sufficient grounds for the appointment, by the Government, of a Commission of Inquiry, in order to see whether or not the funds of the College had been diverted from their original purpose. And here too, when the College was open to students of the Catholic persuasion, who might choose to attend it, and where they might take degrees, it appeared to him that, considering the changes of time and circumstances, it was well deserving of inquiry, whether the impediments which now existed to conferring offices of emolument upon them could not be greatly removed, and whether these offices could not be thrown open to a much greater extent than they were at present. The right hon. Secretary for Ireland said that the funds which supported Trinity College were not public but private funds. As to the case of Scotland, with regard to four out of the five Universities in that country, the original funds by which they were endowed, were funds granted to them by various Popes, who were in their day encouragers of learning. But the funds in this case, by which Trinity College, Dublin, was endowed, were not conferred upon it by Popes, but were derived from the property of the Earl of Desmond, and other great proprietors whose property was confiscated. The argument, therefore, that in the one case public property was made use of, and not in the other, fell to the ground. This property of Trinity College, Dublin, belonged to the Crown before it was conferred upon that College for public purposes. The funds for the support of Trinity College, Dublin, were, to all intents, as much public funds as if they were procured from the Consolidated Fund. In the case of this College, they had already the whole establishment, with its buildings, at their command; and they had every facility for opening it more widely to the Catholics than before; and he, therefore, thought that their best course would be—leaving to the Protestants their existing funds and the foundation, so far as they were strictly applicable to Protestant uses—to endow new fellowships and professorships, to which Catholics might be eligible, and have, equally with their Protestant brethren, a reward thus held out for their exertions. It was but right that the benefits of the education to be procured at the College should, in every respect, be more widely extended to the Roman Catholics; and to this end, the objectionable practices at variance with the intention of the founders of the College should be removed. He thought that there were good grounds in this case for inquiry, and he would, therefore, cheerfully vote with the hon. and gallant Member who moved for the Commission.

Sir R. H. Inglis observed, that the hon. and gallant Officer who introduced this subject, appealed to him and claimed his vote, on the ground that in a former debate he had promised to support a Motion for a Commission of Inquiry in any case in which an abuse might be alleged and proved. Admitting his words to have been correctly quoted, he still contended that they did not properly apply to the subject then before the House. An abuse, indeed, was alleged, but an abuse was not proved. The hon. and gallant Officer found only two things which he termed abuses, and which alone the most jealous scrutiny could discover in the history and present state of Trinity College: and these were, in the first place, that the income of the College was 50,000*l.* a year, and, secondly, that Fellows were legally allowed to marry. As to the first, it was not necessarily an abuse, even if the statement of fact were correct. But, in point of fact, when they analyzed the amount of income, as stated by the hon. Member for the University (Mr. Hamilton), it turned out that only 21,000*l.* of that income could be considered as the income of the University, as such, the remaining thousands being as completely the personal earnings of the individual Fellows and others, as were the earnings of any man in a particular profession or calling in the world. It was as unreasonable to include the income derived from their pupils in the aggregate emoluments of the College, as it would be to include the fees of Dr. Chambers, or Sir Benjamin Brodie, or any other of the eminent men connected with the London Colleges of Physicians or of Surgeons, in the aggregate income of those institutions. The income of professors should not, therefore, be regarded as an abuse or grievance, which warranted the issue of a Royal Commission. The hon. Member for Kendal (Mr. Warburton) laid particular stress upon the other point—the marriage of the Fellows. It was not for him (Sir R. H. Inglis) to state now, as a general proposition, that he would or that he would not defend the introduction of such a system into the College. He was, however, at liberty to consider it as a fact before the House. But did not the fact itself as it stood, even on the hon. Gentleman's own showing, prove that if such a system were wrong, it could be remedied by the same authority as permitted it to exist? The celibacy of the Fellows was first prescribed by the Sovereign and visitors, and afterwards relaxed by the same authority. In 1811, the obligation to celibacy was again restored, and recently relaxed; and if it were advisable to restore again the original obligation to celibacy, the Crown might effect that without a formal visitatorial inquiry. The hon. and gallant Officer stated that Trinity College was founded on the site of the Monastery of Allhallows, and endowed from the lands of the Earl of Desmond. That was an error of memory; for the Monastery of Allhallows was alienated by Henry VIII. to the Mayor and citizens of Dublin; and it was not till half a century afterwards that it was made the site of the present University. And under what circumstances was the University founded? Adam Loftus, the Archbishop of Dublin, applied to the citizens of Dublin, and told them what advantage it would be to themselves and their children, and "how many stories high it would raise the foundations of their fortunes"—for that was his language—if they would make a voluntary grant of the foundation of Allhallows Monastery, for the purpose of raising thereon his new College and University. Stimulated by his exhortations they made the grant; but so far from the College having been built by the plunder taken from Roman Catholic proprietors, the Lord Deputy and Lords of the Council sent letters to every barony in Ireland, urging them to contribute to the erection of the College. And such was their confidence in the way in which that appeal would be met, that in a few days after the issue of those letters, the first stone of the College was laid—he (Sir R. Inglis) thought it was in March, 1594—and such was the liberality of the people of Ireland, that in less than two years from the laying of the first stone, students were admitted. This College was as purely a Protestant institution as the most decided advocate of the cause of Protestantism could desire. It was said by the hon. Member for Kendal that in the charter itself there was no reference to the word Protestant. That was true; but could any one doubt whether Queen Elizabeth had any other object in view in founding that College than the promotion of the Protestant faith? The charter was to be interpreted by the state of the law and the state of public opinion at the time. The College was essentially Protestant, and especially designed for the instruction of the priests of the Established Church. But the hon. Member for Kendal said—"You are inconsistent—you promote the visitation of the Colleges in Scotland, and why do you not promote a visitation of the University in Ireland?" His answer was—prove your abuse before you enforce any process for its correction. The Universities in Scotland never had since the Revolution any authority represented in England by what was called a visitor—there was no intermediate visitor. In England the Archbishop of Canterbury was the visitor of one College, the Earl of Pembroke of another, and the Bishop of Winchester of others; but there were not more than half a dozen Colleges of which the Crown was the direct visitor. In Ireland there was no intermediate visitor. Therefore, in Scotland, if any improvement could be suggested, it was a matter for consideration whether the Crown should be advised to issue a Commission to inquire into the fact, and suggest an appropriate remedy. But in Ireland there was a visitor exactly in the same relation to the University as the visitors of the Colleges of Oxford or Cambridge; and, therefore, the analogy of the hon. Member for Kendal did not at all apply to the case more immediately under discussion. On the whole, he saw no proof of any abuse, to justify any interference on the part of the Crown in the administration of private funds, or even of public funds confided to private hands. He should therefore oppose the Motion.

Mr. Hume was sorry to see that this Motion encountered the opposition of the Government. Considering that their policy during the whole of the present Session had been, or appeared to be, guided by a sincere desire to conciliate the people of Ireland, he thought that, on this occasion, they were but throwing away a good opportunity of so doing, as this would have been one means of succeeding in their object. In reference to the charter of the College, the hon. Baronet (Sir R. Inglis) said that mere words were of little importance; but were the words in favour of the views of the hon. Baronet, he would be the last person to say so. The hon. Baronet tried to justify the present exclusive system pursued in Dublin by the spirit of the charter; but that document did not bear out the hon. Baronet's conclusion. On that ground, if on no other, they should act fairly and liberally. He considered, that, even if the College had been instituted to exclude all classes but one class, the time had now come when, as a public institution, they should consider whether its constitution was fit and proper, and whether the time had not now arrived when that constitution should be changed. That was his view of the matter. It was said, in answer to the hon. and gallant Member who moved for this inquiry, that this was not the time for such a Motion, But, surely, it was a proper time to bring forward such a Motion, when Her Majesty's Government had brought forward a measure for collegiate education in Ireland. The object of his hon. Friend in now making the Motion, was, that they should first see how the assets and funds already applied to the purposes of education in Ireland, were disposed of. Was not that a reasonable demand? Ireland should have her full share of the benefits of academic education, and it was upon that ground that he supported the measure of Her Majesty's Government; but did he not act right in asking, at the same time, for an account of the appropriation of the funds already existing and applied? Nor was this Motion suddenly brought forward. His hon. Friend gave notice of it almost on the very first day on which the Irish Colleges Bill came before the House, and only consented to postpone it from time to time to meet the convenience of Ministers. They should give the Motion the same effect now, as if it had been brought forward before. It was unreasonable on the part of the Government to call upon the House to vote away money for extending academic education in Ireland, without holding themselves ready to give an account of how the present funds were appropriated. A Commission had been issued in the case of the Scotch Universities; but it was contended that that was no precedent. He regarded it as a precedent directly in point. He was himself the person who applied for that Commission, and moved for it when application was made for funds to rebuild Marischal College, Aberdeen. The case now, with respect to Ireland was similar. In the one case, as in the other, there was an application for money; and in the one case, as in the other, should inquiry be made. As long as the exclusive system continued in Ireland—as long as the Protestant party were treated as a separate and a superior class, the people of Ireland never would be, and never ought to be contented. And, if there was an exclusion against the Roman Catholics being admitted to these Colleges, it ought to be removed now. The policy of the Government demanded that it should be removed; for their object was to tranquillize and do justice to Ireland, and unless perfect equality were established, that would be impossible.

Mr. Lefroy would oppose the Motion, believing that its object was to open the emoluments of Trinity College, not only to the different religions in Ireland, but to all religions. The Statutes to which the hon. Member, for Kendal had referred, confined, as explicitly as words could, the emoluments of the University of Dublin to members of the Established Church, and enjoined that every person taking orders, or being promoted to any degree of learning, should take the Oath of Supremacy. The Statute of Charles II. also excluded Roman Catholics, not only from fellowships and scholarships, but even from the University itself. He thought it most unreasonable that because they supported a grant for general education in Ireland, they should be called upon to interfere with the revenues of this University—to interfere with property that had been granted for merely Protestant purposes, and for the support of the Protestant religion in that country. Under all the circumstances of the case, it appeared to him that the Motion of the hon. Gentleman had not been supported by argument at the other side of the House. For himself, he must say that he believed they were bound to support the College of Dublin in all its rights and in all its property. It had not been shown that they possessed any excess of property—it had not been shown any abuse had taken place in this University. If, then, under such circumstances, they interfered with the property of this University, there would be no security for any ecclesiastical property whatever. For these reasons, he gave his decided opposition to this Motion.

Mr. M. J. O'Connell rose to support the Motion. The hon. Members who had defended Trinity College had not displayed much force in their arguments. It was said by the hon. Member who had just resumed his seat, that the Statute of Elizabeth prevented persons of Roman Catholic opinions holding offices in this University. Now he thought that there was some mistake in this, because if Roman Catholics were excluded by the Statute of Elizabeth, why would such pains have been taken to exclude them by the Statute of Charles I., which passed so many years afterwards? He now came to the question of the property of the College. He must say on this point, that he did not think that the opposition to this Motion of the hon. Member for the University of Dublin was well founded; for he could not see what interest the University had in keeping the public in ignorance of the amount of its revenues. What objection there could be to make the public acquainted with the average amount of those revenues, he was totally at a loss to understand. He admitted that there might be a distinction made between the fees of tutors and the fees received as College fees; but still there ought to be no objection to state the amount of these revenues. Well, then, he would now turn to what he considered of greater importance—the religious question involved in this Motion. The hon. Member for the University of Dublin, in enumerating the brilliant men which that University had produced, had mentioned the name of Professor Kane: now, was it not strange that the University was so constituted that there were no means to enable that eminent man to live within the University? It was seventeen years since the Act of Roman Catholic Emancipation had passed, and some means ought to be found for putting an end to this system of exclusion. It was lamentable to see a professorship of this kind open to professors of all nations, and that Roman Catholics alone were excluded. Aliens in blood were admissible, but aliens in religion were not. He hoped that they would have some further expression of the principles on which the Government were prepared to act in this instance. They had already seen their inconsistency in endeavouring to enforce two distinct principles with respect to education in Scotland and in Ireland. The hon. Member for the University of Dublin had alluded to him (Mr. M. J. O'Connell) amongst others as having been educated in the University of Dublin. He confessed he looked back with pleasure to that circumstance, as having enabled him to form very valued connexions; but this did not blind him to the faults of that University. He considered that no system of education in Ireland would ever be satisfactory until that University was opened to the Irish people. He had supported the early stages of the Government Bill, on the ground that he was an advocate for a system of mixed education. He was anxious that the youth of Ireland, of all persuasions, should be brought up together, proper care being taken to guard their faith and morals—learning secular education together, and forming those future friendships which would be the best means of putting an end to religious discord in that country. But he contended that there could be no successful system of mixed education unless the Dublin University were thrown open equally to all classes — and until the advantages and emoluments of the professorships ceased to be confined to a favoured class. Although they might establish new Colleges, the feeling of the country would for a long time be against them, and the established University would be preferred. The hon. Member had alluded to the admission of Roman Catholics as sizars; but he feared that in many instances Roman Catholics who had been admitted as sizars had conformed to the Protestant Church. In supporting the Motion of his hon. Friend, he begged to say that he did so in no hostile spirit to the University of Dublin; for which, with all that he considered to be its faults, he entertained those feelings which it was natural he should entertain to the place where he received the greater portion of his education. He wished that all religious distinctions with respect to education in Ireland should be done away with, and that could not be the case unless all classes were put on an equal footing with respect to the honours and emoluments of this University. For these reasons he supported the Motion.

Mr. Shaw had but little to add to the excellent speech of his hon. Friend and Colleague (Mr. Hamilton); but, in consequence of some observations which had since been made, as well as some of the remarks with which the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Mr. Osborne) had introduced the Amendment, he (Mr. Shaw) would beg the attention of the House for a few minutes. The hon. Gentleman who had just sat down, had borne testimony to the willingness of the authorities in Trinity College to give information, when it was sought in a friendly spirit; as they had proved by consenting to a return within the last week, of the reports, valuations, and surveys of their estates, as made by their officer, Mr. Collis, which had been moved for in that spirit of friendliness by a tenant of their own—the hon. Member for the county of Cork (Mr. O'Connell). But the present was a hostile and invidious Motion, with the avowed object of alienating the property of the University of Dublin to purposes the very opposite of those for which it was founded. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Osborne) had complained that he had described the property in question as the private property of Trinity College, Dublin: he certainly had done so. It was the private property of a public body, held, no doubt, on a public trust; and that body was liable to account for any breach of that trust; but where no abuse had even been alleged, much less attempted to be proved, he demurred to the jurisdiction of that House. The University of Dublin received no grant from the House, and was not in that respect amenable to their control. At the same time, the heads of that institution had no motive or desire for concealment; and to the Crown, either through its visitors, which would be the regular course, or even to the responsible Ministers of the Crown, the College was ready to afford all reasonable information respecting its income and expenditure, and the entire management of its affairs. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Osborne) boasted that he would not be deterred from his attack on the funds of the University by what he termed the cuckoo cry, that "the College had been founded by a Protestant Queen, endowed with Protestant money, and was for Protestant purposes." Neither would he—let him tell the hon. Gentleman—be deterred by the hon. Gentleman calling it a cuckoo cry, from repeating the simple truth, which could not be too often told—that the University of Dublin was founded by a Protestant Queen, endowed with the money of Protestants, and for purposes essentially Protestant—the principal of them being to provide a learned and efficient body of men for the ministry of the reformed faith, as by law established in Ireland. The hon. Member for Kerry (Mr. Morgan J. O'Connell) had been very hasty in contradicting his hon. Friend the Member for Longford (Mr. Lefroy), when his hon. Friend stated, that the Irish Parliament had passed an Act in the 2nd of Elizabeth, excluding from the University all persons who held the doctrine of the Pope's supremacy. He had since got the volume of the Irish Statutes from the library. His hon. Friend had been quite correct, and he would read the provision to the House; it was from the 2nd Elizabeth, cap. 1, sec. 10—

"All persons which shall be preferred to any degree of learning in any university that hereafter shall be within this realm, shall, before being preferred to such degree, take the said Oath of Supremacy."

Why! the legitimacy of Queen Elizabeth was not at that time acknowledged by the Roman Catholics; and, no one who knew anything of the history of those times required to be told that the whole policy then was to exclude Roman Catholics. So, in fact, the constitution of Trinity College continued until the year 1793. And since then, for all the purposes of education and degrees, the studies and honours of the University were as open to Roman Catholics as to Protestants. That fact had been studiously kept out of sight by hon. Gentlemen opposite in these debates; and there were many Members probably on both sides of the House who thought that this was more a benefit in theory, than practically enjoyed by the Roman Catholics of Ireland. But the fact was, that they availed themselves of that privilege in the full proportion of their numbers in the educated classes in Ireland; and many hon. Members of the Roman Catholic persuasion, who had taken part in those debates—the right hon. Member for Dungarvon (Mr. Sheil), the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. Wyse), the hon. Member for Kerry (Mr. M. J. O'Connell), and the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Bellew)—had been educated at the University of Dublin. He confessed that he thought it but a bad return of those hon. Gentlemen, and those Roman Catholics who had derived the full advantages of a university education in Trinity College, who now joined in endeavouring to subvert its foundation; and, although he did not desire to see the system altered at Dublin, he could not be suprised if the conduct of the Irish Roman Catholics suggested some caution to the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, in taking the first step, and admitting to degrees—the great boon now sought from them—the Dissenters in this country, when they witnessed to what unreasonable demands the same concession had led in Ireland. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Osborne) had again attacked him that night for being necessarily ignorant of the affairs of Dublin College, because he had not graduated there; and the hon. and gallant Gentleman professed to instruct him on the subject. Now, he was sorry to be obliged to speak of himself, but the hon. Gentleman forced him to it; and he must therefore beg for one moment to compare the means of a knowledge of the affairs of the University of Dublin possessed by himself and by the hon. and gallant Member. It was true that he had not taken his bachelor's degree at Dublin—but he had first studied for three years in the immediate vicinity of Dublin College, and under very distinguished members of that body, for the entrance course—he then entered the University, and went through a year and a half of the undergraduate course. For reasons of a purely private nature with which he need not trouble the House, he then entered ad eundem at Oxford, and took a Bachelor of Arts degree; but he had since taken the degrees of both Master in Arts and Doctor of Laws in the University of Dublin—besides which, he had all his life resided in the neighbourhood of the University—he had lived in the same House with four of his brothers while they were graduating there, and since had four of his own sons studying under private tutors in the University, and one of them was a graduate. Under these circumstances, he did venture to think that he was likely to know as much of the system and practice of that University as the hon. and gallant Member, who could have had but a sort of cantering acquaintance with the neighbourhood of Dublin for a very few years, as military aide-de-camp to the Lord Lieutenant. The hon. and gallant Gentleman then spoke of some gigantic connubiality—was that the expression? [Mr. Osborne: A gigantic scheme of academical connubiality!] Well; but really it was rather ungracious of the hon. and gallant Gentleman so to inveigh against Irish connubiality; when he should recollect that almost his only pretence for interfering in Irish matters at all was his own recent connubial connexion with that country. But, to be serious, he had not approved of that Statute, procured by Lord Fortescue, which he believed had been refused by his right hon. Friend the present First Minister of the Crown—[Sir R. Peel: Hear!]—entirely repealing the Statute of celibacy, although he thought some relaxation of it was desirable. And as regarded the incomes and duties of the Fellows of Trinity College, the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Mr. Osborne) must excuse him for saying, that he (Mr. Osborne) had betrayed the most remarkable ignorance. First, he had stated the property of the College to be above 50,000*l.* a year. The fact was—deducting what could not with propriety be charged, the professional fees of the tutors for pupils—the whole yearly income of the College was as nearly as possible the same as that House had voted that Session as the future annual income of the College of Maynooth. The junior Fellows did not receive more than about 300*l.* a year, besides what they derived from the payments of their pupils; and the incomes of the senior Fellows, which the hon. and gallant Gentleman had spoken of as nearly 3,000*l.* a year each, he would state to the House, from an authentic paper which he was authorized to read, and which was as follows:—

"A senior Fellow's income fluctuates a good deal—being made up of various items. The salary of a senior fellowship is 100*l.* a year Irish—92*l.* The remainder depends on renewal fines, and on certain fees, varying with the number of students on the College books, and with the number that take degrees. The income from renewal fines is about 800*l.* one year with another; and the fees from students and from degrees may be calculated at about 300*l.*, so that 1,200*l.* will be as nearly as possible the value of a senior fellowship. This is, of course, exclusive of offices. If a senior Fellow also holds a College or University office (such as proctor, senior lecturer, librarian, bursar, &c.), he, of course, has a salary belonging to that office; and I do not think it is fair to add this to the income of his fellowship. However, if you do so—taking the average of all the offices which a senior Fellow can hold, and adding this to the above, the greatest value that can be assigned to a senior fellowship will be 1,500*l.*"

The greatest mis-statement of all was with reference to the duties of the Fellows. The hon. and gallant Member stated that they were very light. The very contrary was notoriously the fact; and the general complaint had been, that the duties were too onerous, and the Fellows not numerous enough to discharge them. The senior Fellows, seven in number, who attain that post after an average of thirty years as junior Fellows, and after having devoted the best part of their lives to the service of the College, have committed to them the entire superintendence and control of the discipline and conduct of the University; besides that, they are sole examiners at the annual public fellowship examinations; and he had before stated in the House, that he had himself heard that eminent man—the late Archbishop Magee—state, that while he was a senior Fellow it took him six months' hard reading each year to prepare himself as examiner for that examination. Then, the junior Fellows were constantly and actively engaged in the instruction of the students; and in addition to their ordinary duties in that respect, they had distributed amongst them the class of divinity students, which amounted to about one hundred yearly, whom they had frequently to lecture in their own rooms; and the divinity course at Dublin, he did not hesitate to say, was much stricter and more diligently enforced than at either of the English Universities. This both answered the objection, that divinity was not made a leading object of study at the University, and was a further proof of the necessity that the main body of the Fellows should be Protestant divines. There was, no doubt, a difference of system between the fellowships of the English and Dublin Universities—each, perhaps, having its own peculiar advantages. In England, the fellowships were much more numerous, and of less emolument, many of the Fellows being non-resident, and holding livings with their fellowships. Neither was allowable at Dublin—every Fellow was resident, and actively engaged in collegiate duties, and if he accepted a living he must resign his fellowship. The English system afforded more of what was termed learned leisure—gave greater opportunity for the pursuit of general science and literature, and consequently produced a greater number of authors; but the Irish, beyond doubt, must insure a higher class of general instructors for the student, and held out a premium for men of the highest talents and attainments to devote their whole energies and lives—first, to obtaining a fellowship, which is open to public competition; then, as junior Fellows, to the education of the students; and afterwards, if they reached the board, to the important duties he had described as belonging to the senior Fellows. Each system had been found to work well in its own sphere; and it would, probably, be dangerous to alter either, without the most serious consideration. That was, however, a question quite distinct from that then proposed to the House for opening the foundation and governing body of the University to Roman Catholics; a proposition which he would conclude by repeating never could be agreed to without a gross violation of the express intention of the founders of the University—shaking the stability of all the sacred and civil institutions in both countries, and perilling the rights of property in every part of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Sheil: Sir, the Motion immediately before the House is an Amendment to the proposition of the right hon. Baronet op-speeches upon the two subjects—one on the Amendment of my hon. Friend, and the other upon the third reading of the Bill. In the first instance, then, I will advert with great brevity to the first point under consideration; then, with equal brevity, to the Bill itself. I coincide with my hon. Friend the Member for Kerry (Mr. M. J. O'Connell), in thinking that education in Ireland should be mixed—I mean secular education. We must in manhood associate in every walk of life—the Catholic and the Protestant merchant must place in each other that entire reliance which is the foundation of all mercantile transactions—to the Protestant and Catholic solicitor, to the Catholic and Protestant advocate, men differing from them in religious opinions, entrust fortunes, life, and honour. At the Bar, where our faculties are in collision, and our feelings are in contact, our forensic brotherhood is not interrupted by theological discriminations; in the noblest of all professions—in the Army, the Catholic and the Protestant Irishmen are comrades, and are attached by a devoted friendship; they stand together in the same field of fight; they scale the same battery, they advance in the same forlorn hope, and—to use a fine expression of the great poet whose remains the First Minister of the Crown lately deposited hard by—from the "deathbed of fame they look proudly to heaven together." And if thus, in our maturer years, we are to live and to die together, shall we be kept apart, in the morning of life, in its freshest and brightest hours, when all the affections are in blossom, when our friendships are pure and disinterested, and those attachments are formed which last through every vicissitude of fortune, and of which the memory survives the grave? But while I think that our altars should not stand as partitions between us, I do not think that from our altars we should turn with indifference away. Mixed secular education ought to be combined with separate religious instruction, which ought to have been provided by the State. You rely upon the system pursued by the National Board; but where there is no similitude, you ought not to resort for assimilation, A village school, where children are taught the mere rudiments of learning, does not afford a model for an academical institution, in which the eternity of matter, the existence of an external world, the origin which are represented by the sublimest writer in our language as the themes of angelic controversy, and of more than angelic apprehension. Religious instruction is peculiarly required by the boy who leaves his home, who is no longer under the guardianship of that best of all sentinels, a father's and a mother's love—who cannot take the penates, the household angels, along with him to a boarding-house in Galway or in Cork. He is encompassed by temptation — his temperament is undergoing the process of perilous expansion. To him a little learning is peculiarly dangerous; it is in the shallows, and amidst the foam of tumultuous passion, that faith goes to pieces. How often have I seen a precocious smatterer in metaphysics rush with a presumptuous familiarity into subjects from which, as we grow older and wiser, we turn as we would from unearthly visitants, that—

> "Shake our dispositions

Against these evils, of which the likelihood is not imaginary, it is your duty to guard. You ought to locate in your Colleges a Protestant and a Catholic ecclesiastic, pious, learned, and persuasive, by whom the great tenets of Christianity might be enforced, by whom the New Testament—in whose moral injunctions we all concur—in whose dogmas we ought to have no acrimonious difference—should be read and expounded according to the interpretations of their respective churches —whose eloquence should charm, whose example should allure, and by whom the minds of their young spirits should be elevated to the political contemplation of those subjects, in comparison with which every object, of an interest merely human, dwindles into evanescent diminution. I do not wish for a chair of divinity—I do not ask for rival theatres of theological disputation—I want a Catholic priest to say prayers for Catholics, and a Protestant priest to say prayers for Protestants. You have made no provision for any religious worship, and I am sure that you are wrong. You leave pious individuals to endow—why don't you endow yourselves? Why pay for geology and not for Christianity? But, said the Home Secretary, who is much more skilled in escaping from an argument than in refuting it, if we endow "the Catholic and the Protestant Church," we must endow the Unitarian, the Quaker, and the Jew. Would not this sophism forbid the payment of a chaplain in a workhouse, a prison, or a barrack? You perfectly well know that the students will consist of Catholics and of Protestants in the south of Ireland, and you ought particularly to adapt your measures to the existing state of facts, instead of resorting to a remote possibility as the basis of your legislation. My conviction is, that you are influenced by an apprehension of exciting the prejudices of the people of this country. In governing Ireland there is nothing which you should be so much afraid of as of fear; and as for keeping up distempered despotism a bad audacity would be needful, so for the purposes of true conciliation, courage is beyond all else required. You ought to have availed yourselves with eagerness of the entreaty of the Catholic bishops. You have done nothing in accommodating this measure to the Irish Catholic bishops; and as they are a body possessed of an almost paramount influence, you have committed a grievous fault in this regard. I presume that your measure has a political object; if so, you have omitted the means by which that object is to be attained. This brings me to the consideration of the course you have adopted with regard to the professors. You think that the Catholic bishops were unreasonable in asking that the professors of metaphysics, of geology, and of anatomy, should be Catholics. I stop not to suggest that you do not think it at all monstrous that all the Fellows and all the professors in Trinity College should be Protestants. The professor of anatomy must be a Protestant. You will admit Catholic subjects without stint, but by Protestant Dissenters they must be orthodoxically cut up. I stop not, however, to point out to you your own inconsistency, and think it better to tell you that you might have taken a middle course. If you had opened a field of competition, and provided that the professors should be selected by public examination, you would have obviated every objection. You would, besides, have given an opportunity to men of great talent and great knowledge who are now unknown to you, to give proof of those accomplisments and acquirements which are lost in the obscurity which it should have been your effort to disperse. You have reserved the right to appoint the professors, because you tell us that you are entitled to possess it. However anxious to avoid all discourtesy, I feel it my duty to tell you that I am at a loss to discover the peculiar claims which you possess to the confidence of the Irish people. I will not dwell upon what has been so often the subject of consideration, of your total misapplication of the patronage of the Crown. I will not advert to the events of such recent occurrence that you cannot imagine that by the people of Ireland they are already forgotten. But I will direct your attention to this fact, that there is not a single Catholic, directly or indirectly, connected with your Government. Sixteen years have elapsed since Catholic Emancipation—the man who carried it is at the head of the Government—there are 8,000,000 of Catholics in Ireland, and yet there is not a single Catholic in office. The Whigs did promote Catholics to office. The Attorney General of Ireland is a great functionary, and is consulted on every important measure. When the First Lord of the Treasury was Secretary for Ireland, he must have been in constant intercourse with the late Mr. Saurin, and must have often abided by his opinion. Under the Whig Government in Ireland, Sir Michael O'Loghlin and Chief Baron Woolfe, of each of whom I may justly say "Multis ille bonis flebilis occidit," held the office of Attorney General. Judge Ball, a gentleman who stood at the top of the Irish bar, and had the highest possible professional reputation; and Mr. Pigot, who is now in the fullest business, and is eminent for his great abilities, held that important office. These gentlemen were in contact with the Irish people, and perfectly understood their feelings and their interests; but you are destitute of all assistance, and you have not a single man about you who can direct you in any one question affecting the great body of the Catholics of Ireland. You may tell me that the Irish Catholics do not support you, and, therefore, you cannot promote them. But is not the fault your own. My hon. Friend the Member for the county of Lowth told you to-night the plain truth—that as long as you maintain Protestant ascendancy, so long no Roman Catholic of high spirit can support you You manifest your fatal policy in your exclusion of Catholics from Trinity College. I come to that question. Much has been said of the intentions of Queen Elizabeth, who, we are told, was an excellent Protestant. She was, I suppose—

"A very heathen in the carnal part,
But yet a sad, good Christian at the heart."

But we ought not to argue the charter of Elizabeth in the spirit in which Lady Hewley's will would be debated in the Rolls Court; and the Government by whom the Dissenters Chapel Bill was carried, ought not to indulge in any conjectures regarding the motives of Queen Elizabeth in granting a portion of the confiscated estates of the Earl of Desmond to the University of Dublin. It is clear that the charter does not state anything whatever of the Protestant purposes of the grant to Trinity College; and there is a remarkable passage in Lord Bacon's essay on the Queen's service in Ireland, from which it is to be inferred that Catholics were admitted to Trinity College; for Lord Bacon recommends the toleration of Catholics, and immediately after expatiates on the importance of "replenishing" Trinity College. He then goes on to say that the Irish should be treated with the utmost lenity—that no distinction between Englishmen and Irishmen should be made—and that the utmost attention should be paid to the education of the children of the Irish gentry. Lord Bacon said—

"It is true, what was anciently said, that a state is contained in two words—præmium and pæna—and I am persuaded if a penny in the pound, which hath been spent in pæna, without fruit or emolument to this State, had been spent in præmio, that is in rewarding, things had never grown to this extremity. The keeping of the principal Irish persons in terms of contentment, and generally the carrying on an even course between the English and the Irish, as if they were one nation, is one of the best medicines of that State; for other points of contentment, the care and education of their children, and the like points of comfort and allurement, they are things which fall within every man's consideration."

But, Sir, I own that I think this question is to be tried by a reference to public policy, by a regard to the great change which the country has undergone, and not by any presumption with respect to the motives of the original founders of Trinity College. The hon. Gentleman the Member for the University (Mr. Hamilton) entered into a detail of the great contributions to science and to literature which have been made by Trinity College. It was unnecessary. The names that shed lustre on Trinity College are multitudinous and bright; and, for my part, so far from being disposed to detract from the reputation of Trinity College, I am surprised that a mere handful of men, like the Protestants of Ireland, should have produced, through Dublin College, so many great and glorious men; and I conclude, that if the benefits of the University were extended to the entire people, if the entire mind of Ireland were brought into cultivation, it would be fertile of such noble and distinguished products. I consider the exclusion of Catholics from the lay fellowships and scholarships of Trinity College as the consummation of injustice. I yesterday inquired, from a friend of mine, who had been a scholar of Trinity College, what had been the extent of his emoluments; and he informed me that he had been for five years a scholar—that during the whole of that time he had his rooms and his commons free from all charge—that he received 10*l.* a year for the first two years, and 40*l.* a year for the last three years. From these great advantages Catholic industry and Catholic erudition are excluded. I shall mention another fact, for facts are better than expatiations. Mr. Mulcaley—for I have no hesitation in mentioning his name—resides in Trinity College, where he has evinced singular ability in acquiring and communicating knowledge. He is a first-rate mathematician, and obtained an honour equivalent to that of senior wrangler in Cambridge; six of the Fellows of the College are his pupils; he is a Catholic, and had the manliness and the virtue to resist all the base allurements with which Protestantism is propagated in Ireland; and for his adherence to the religion in which he was born, and means to die, to the scholarships and fellowships of the University all access has been denied him. As long as you shall keep Trinity College closed, I shall not set the slightest political value upon your three provincial Colleges, which will be stamped with all the characteristics of mediocrity. How dwarf and stunted will be the groves of your new academies, when compared with the rich luxuriance in which Trinity College will be enveloped! You will make the supremacy of Trinity College even more conspicuous by the inferiorities with which it will be surrounded. It would have been far better to have applied 18,000*l.* a year to the creation of new fellowships and chairs in Dublin College, to which men of all religious denominations would have been eligible. You would then have got value—value in contentment, value in conciliation—for your money. That measure would have been large and comprehensive, and would have contributed to place Catholics and Protestants upon that level which, for the purposes of permanent pacification, is indispensably requisite. We insist upon equality, and you should not chide us for so insisting; for, in our place, you would nourish the feelings which it would be unworthy of us not to entertain. Not very long ago, in enforcing the policy upon which Ireland ought, and must at last be governed, I ventured to point to the great position occupied by the Prime Minister, and to say that he was placed upon such a moral height, that in looking on Ireland, he should take no narrow prospect; that nothing little should be discerned by him; that he should be superior to any party consideration; and that in contemplating great objects, he should be inspired by great motives. I will, for a moment, take the right hon. Gentleman down from that surpassing elevation, and instead of being a Prime Minister—instead of being an Englishman, nay, instead of being a Protestant, I will suppose him to have been born in that island which you have so long regarded as a mere provincial appurtenance to your vast dominion, and a professor of that religion which, for the purposes of degradation, was for centuries marked out. Suppose, then, that he were born, not an Englishman and a Protestant, but an Irishman and a Catholic, a native of that unfortunate country to which your fathers did such measureless wrong, but in which the sentiment of nationality never has been, and never will be, utterly extinguished; and furthermore, suppose that he, a member of that vast community of which he was so long the formidable, but always, I believe, the reluctant, and perhaps the remorseful antagonist; suppose he were a member of that community, whose growth, social, and political, and moral, since first he crossed the threshold of Dublin Castle, has been great beyond a parallel—that community by which obstacles once deemed insurmountable have been crossed, and by which, in its career of continued victory, the array of hostility that was marshalled against it has been so often scattered and swept away, of which acquisition of liberty has been followed by so rapid an augmentation of power; which in wealth, in intelligence, in organized determination, has made advances so prodigious; and the future progress of which is as much beyond doubt, as its past progress is beyond revocation. Suppose, I say, that he belonged to those millions—those Catholic millions, who call themselves the people of Ireland, and who to that designation have proved their title; suppose that he belonged to those eight millions, with whom so many attributes of power are associated, and that he was animated by the feelings with which the consciousness of power must needs be combined: and suppose (for I have not done with my hypothesis), that the First Minister of the greatest Empire in the world, at the head of an overwhelming Parliamentary majority, baffled and discomfited in his enterprises of coercion, were to announce and to proclaim that force in the government of Ireland was powerless—that by force agitation could not be put down — that trial by jury was of little or no avail—that conciliation must be resorted to — and furthermore, suppose that the Ministers by whom those acknowledgments had been made were to turn to him, and to ask, "what would content him?" To that interrogatory — to such an interrogatory — what would be his answer? "Equality." I'll dare be sworn, it would be equality—political, official, ecclesiastical, academical — in all regards, "equality." You know, in your heart, you know that nothing else would satisfy you; in your heart's core you know that nothing else will satisfy or ought to satisfy us; and, I tell you, at the close of this, the fifth Session of your Parliament, that if you shall persevere in withholding it, your Government will be a series of frustrations—your half measures—your homœopathic remedies, will but aggravate the national distemper. You will cast oil upon flames—you will but excite and inspirit agitation—and at last, by fatal delays, by ruinous procrastination, by uncertainty of purpose, by letting, "I dare not wait upon—I would"—you will bring the country to such a pass that an outbreak will be inevitable—an eruption of the popular passions will appal you; the might of England will then be put call peace, perhaps; but with tranquillity desolation will be associated; and you will convert one of the finest islands of the ocean into a solitude, in which, in the same grave the liberties, and the happiness, and all the hopes of one country, and the honour, and the virtue, and perhaps the greatness of the other, will be interred together.

Sir R. Peel: Sir, I trust the House will bear in mind what are the circumstances under which the right hon. Gentleman has made this impassioned appeal. What is the position in which we are now standing with respect to the question of Irish academical education, on which he says, to give satisfaction there must be perfect equality? As Minister of the Crown, I am speaking towards the close of a Session, in the course of which we have been prepared, in order to establish that equality, to run counter to the strong feelings—to the strong religious feelings—of the majority, I fear, of the people of this country. In order to do that which we believe to be consistent with justice—in order to do that which we hope will be acceptable to the Roman Catholics, we came forward with a proposition for the endowment, the liberal endowment, of that institution in which the Roman Catholic ecclesiastics of Ireland receive academical education. We attached no conditions whatever to the acceptance of that grant—we proposed no restrictions with which the most scrupulous and conscientious Roman Catholics could quarrel—we asked for no interference with their religious doctrines. In taking powers necessary for the government of that institution, where there could be a question about any interference with the doctrines or discipline of that Church, we committed that interference to Trustees, not appointed by the Crown, but elected by the free choice of the Roman Catholic bishops. To that institution we assigned a provision which was thought to be liberal, for the purpose of improving the edifice in which instruction was to be delivered. We made an annual provision for the purpose of improving the condition of those professors—men of learning, and, I believe, of great respectability, but heretofore miserably endowed, to whom the education of the Roman Catholic youth was entrusted. There was no question whatever about the amount of the grant. If we had had reason to believe that double the amount was necessary, I assure the right hon. Gentleman even a fear of more inveterate opposition, should have deterred us from proposing it. The measure was accepted in Ireland in the spirit in which it was proposed. We held communications in regard to it with the Roman Catholic prelates—we had every reason to believe that, so far as the instruction of the Roman Catholic clergy was concerned, that measure would be received with perfect satisfaction, and with acknowledgments of gratitude. But we did not stop there. We wished to provide for the Roman Catholic youth of Ireland a secular education of the best description, and without stint. True, we have not appointed, by Act of Parliament, chaplains; but where is the difficulty in the way of the appointment of chaplains by the Roman Catholic bishops? The whole charge of the right hon. Gentleman is, that we have not endowed Roman Catholic chaplains. Now, is there in that any inequality? Have we permitted our natural prepossessions in favour of the Protestant Church, to give it in these new institutions any superiority? Not in the slightest degree. In these new institutions the principle of equality has been perfectly preserved. We have given the Catholics every facility for religious instruction. We have given them direct sanction and encouragement. We have admitted that secular instruction will be imperfect unless accompanied by religious instruction as its basis; but we have thought (it may be erroneously) that the best way of providing that religious instruction where there is so much jealousy of interference, was, to give every facility, but to call on parents interested in the moral culture of their children to provide the means, and to call on the respective Churches to give their aid in providing that education. The principle may be an erroneous one. It may be right that we should have endowed ministers of the respective creeds; but, at any rate, the principle of perfect equality has been preserved; and I must say, that it has been preserved for the first time. When I say "first time," I do not mean to apply those words in their common acceptation; but I mean to say, that it is unusual in any country where there is an Established Church to place on precisely the same footing ministers of creeds dissenting from that Church. Yet I hear to-night from the right hon. Gentleman, after all that has taken place in the course of the present Session, imputations on the Government, as if they had treated their Roman Catholic brethren with partiality and injustice. Why, for whom were these new Colleges intended? Who will derive benefit from them? In the north, the Presbyterians; in the south and the west, the Roman Catholics. You ask us to tie down the discrimination of the Government by an enactment. Do you think that the same spirit that presided over the foundation of those establishments will not induce the authors of the Bill to seek to found them on principles which shall be acceptable to the body for whom they are intended? Have we ever denied that the cordial co-operation of the Roman Catholics would be essential, almost, to their success? Do you think that we would lightly disregard any reasonable proposition which they should make? I refer now to the course which we pursued with respect to the Charitable Bequests Act; and I say that there was more real conciliation, more benefit derived from the conduct of the Executive in acting fairly, and unfettered by enactment, in carrying out that law, than if we had consented to your proposition, and had fettered ourselves by an enactment. I consider that true conciliation, and concert, and co-operation, are more likely to arise from the free action of the Executive Government in a friendly spirit, than from the introduction into laws of this kind of an enactment which leaves nothing for the discrimination of the Government. I maintain, then, that with regard to our conduct as to Maynooth, this is not the occasion when the right hon. Gentleman should tell us that the worst principle in our administration of Irish affairs was that we were afraid of fear. But I do not take this rhetorical display of the right hon. Gentleman as an indication of the real feelings of the Irish people. Whatever the right hon. Gentleman may say of the alienation of the Roman Catholics from the Government, I have very strong reason to believe, and I am proud to be able to state this to the House, that among the Roman Catholic laity of Ireland there is a strong feeling of approbation of the policy we have pursued, and a desire to support it. I was sorry to hear the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, because I know the use that will be made of it in this country. I know it will be said, "See what you have gained by your policy—see the effect of disregarding the fears and the opinions of your friends. What hope have you of making an impression on the Irish mind, when, after all you have done and all you have encountered, the leading Roman Catholic of the House of Commons gets up and tells you that unless you go ten times further, the Irish people will be guilty of insurrection?" Sir, those are not the feelings of the Irish people. We do believe that we have made an impression on the Irish mind—not a perfect one, I admit, but an impression. It is easy to say, "Why don't you remove at once all these causes of ill-feeling?" It is very easy for us to make speeches in the House of Commons, and overlook all the difficulties which must encompass and do encompass the course of any Government—whether the noble Lord opposite be at its head or myself in conducting Irish affairs. I have always felt, I always admitted, those difficulties; but notwithstanding the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, I say to the people of England, "Persevere in the course you have adopted—disregard the angry speech which an eloquent man has made—depend on it that a course of justice, of forbearance, of indulgence, will make a proper impression, and you will, sooner or later, reap the fruits of such a policy." And, Sir, nothing deterred by the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, I am perfectly satisfied with the results of the policy we have adopted. Sir, I repeat that we have made those liberal allowances for Maynooth, and for the advancement of secular education in the west and south of Ireland; but we are not prepared to relinquish Trinity College, Dublin. That College is possessed of, I believe, a revenue of about 25,000*l.* a year, a less amount of independent revenue, as distinguished from that derived from fees for education, than that which has just been assigned to Maynooth; assigned permanently, so as to place it beyond the control of an annual grant, partly that it may no longer be the source of annual irritation and religious excitement, and partly that we might by so doing imply our confidence in the Roman Catholic body. We find that Trinity College, Dublin, is an institution where almost all the ministers of the Church of Ireland receive their education, founded by Queen Elizabeth, and intended, at its foundation, for the promotion of the interests of the Established Church; for although in the original charter of Queen Elizabeth there is no express reference to the disqualification of the Roman Catholics, nor any condition in terms expressive of a connexion between the College and the Protestant Establishment; yet if you look at the laws which were in force at the time when the institution was founded, and the proposals which immediately preceded it, when, I think, the Lord Deputy proposed that St. Patrick's or Christ's Church should be converted into a College, can you doubt that, whatever may be the words of the charter, or whatever may be the view entertained as to the moral and religious education, in intention and spirit it was meant to be a College in connexion with and for the promotion of the Protestant religion? At least for more than 200 years Trinity College has been practically in immediate connexion with the Established Church. And yet the right hon. Gentleman says we are violating the principle of equality because we don't open the scholarships and fellowships of Trinity College to the Roman Catholics. I will say nothing now as to the propriety of improving the system of education at Trinity College. I think that, with regard to all such institutions, if you maintain the objects for which they were originally founded, the more extensive you can make them, the better for their stability and credit, and for the public good. Sir, I wish that on both sides of the House we could take more comprehensive views than mere academical ones in discussing this question. I think it will be a great advantage to improve the education at Maynooth, and increase the means of secular education generally in the south and west of Ireland. I think that, abstractedly speaking, to do this will be to confer a benefit on the people of Ireland. But this I look for from this measure, that independently of the academical advantages it will confer, I do fondly trust it will be the foundation of an improved feeling between those who have hitherto been separated by religious differences. When thousands of petitions were brought up in this House, emanating, I admit, from the religious feeling of this country, when I saw those petitions brought up which indicated the Protestant feeling of this country, I was, I admit, proud to be able to state that the Protestants of Ireland did view the Members of Her Majesty's Government, generally speaking, in a different spirit, and with satisfaction, on account of their sympathy with the condition of their Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen. Indeed, I hardly believed it possible that the measures of the Government would have met with so little opposition on the part of the Protestant body. I believe also that the course which has been pursued has tended to improve the social relations between the Protestants and the Roman Catholics. I will take Galway, from which county I presented a petition. That is, perhaps, the most Roman Catholic county in Ireland, but comprising many Protestant Dissenters; but there has been at all times less acerbity of religious feeling there than in almost any other part of Ireland. There has been on the part of the higher classes a desire to live together in peace and amity, and their example has extended to the lower orders; and the consequence is, that there has been less of feud and animosity in Galway than any other part of Ireland. Sir, I presented a petition in favour of the measures of Government from that county, to which the names of Mr. Daly, Mr. St. George, and of other Protestants, who had the strongest feeling in favour of their own religion, but who expressly approved of the course Her Majesty's Government had taken. To that petition was also appended the name of the Roman Catholic warden of Galway; and ecclesiastics and laity came forward with their joint approval of the measure which the Government had submitted to this House. But if, after having endowed Maynooth and founded these Colleges, we had declared our intention of relinquishing Trinity College, Dublin also, do you suppose that the social harmony which prevails in Galway and other parts of Ireland would have been continued? Sir, I utterly deny the charge of the right hon. Gentleman, that the Government have treated the Roman Catholic body on any other footing than that of equality, when we endow Maynooth and establish these Colleges, and at the same time maintain, for Trinity College that Protestant character which has been impressed on it for 200 years. With regard to the Amendment itself, it appears to me in its wording hardly worthy of the able speech which introduced it. It is more confused and unintelligible than might have been expected from the hon. Member. The object of the hon. Member seems to be to destroy the Protestant character of Trinity College; but the language in which he stated his wish is rather confused and unintelligible. He says, "and whether the funds may not be beneficially extended"—[Mr. Osborne: By an additional grant.] By an addition to the funds of the College; and by whom provided? How does the hon. Member reconcile this recommendation with what he said about our putting our fingers into the Consolidated Fund? Surely the hon. Gentleman must have been aware that the hon. Member for Montrose has left his place, or he would not have ventured such a suggestion. What has become of "the pool of Bethesda," into which all the lame and maimed institutions of Ireland were to be dipped, as he was pleased to describe the Consolidated Fund? It appears now that the hon. Member does not wish you to diminish the charge on the Consolidated Fund by applying the funds of Trinity College to the new institutions; but you are to charge the Consolidated Fund in order to increase the revenue of Trinity College. The inquiry is to be made "with a view to ascertain whether the income or funds at present applied solely to the benefit of Protestants in Trinity College, Dublin, might not be beneficially extended so as to make Roman Catholics and Protestant Dissenters eligible, if otherwise qualified, to all scholarships," &c. How can the extension of the funds make the Roman Catholics eligible? [Mr. Osborne was understood to say that he had not drawn up the Resolution.—Mr. Sheil: They are at the same time to be made eligible.] Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman claims the parentage of the Resolution. Has the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Osborne) the face to ask us to vote for a Resolution which I have shown to be inexplicable, and which when pressed for explanation he himself is obliged to disclaim? I had a great many other questions to ask as to the meaning of the Resolution; but, after the frank avowal of the hon. Gentleman that he is not the author of it, and that he cannot explain it, I will spare him the torture which I was about to inflict. I must say, however, that it shows how good a critic I am, that having heard the speech of the hon. Member, and admired it for its ability and lucid brevity, I ventured to say that the man who had made that speech could not possibly have drawn up the Amendment. With respect to the measure itself, and to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Dungarvon (Mr. Sheil), the right hon. Gentleman referred to the part which I have taken in relation to Roman Catholics of Ireland. He has said that I for a long time offered opposition—not an intemperate opposition—to the claims of the Roman Catholics, and that I afterwards felt it to be my duty to bring forward a measure for a complete and unqualified removal of all the disabilities under which they laboured. He has done justice to the motives by which I was actuated. I was well aware of the sacrifice I must incur by taking that course. I was well aware that I must not only forfeit the representation of that University, to be the Representative of which was my chief pride, but that I must incur the risk of alienating friends in whose esteem and confidence I placed the utmost value. I took that course when I was convinced that my co-operation was indispensable to the success of that measure; and I assure the right hon. Gentleman now, that there is no sacrifice which I would not make—so much importance do I attach to the subject—there is no sacrifice, however great or however lasting, which I would not make, if, acting with justice towards Protestants and Roman Catholics, I could contribute to the establishment of social peace and harmony in the country to which he belongs.

Sir V. Blake was understood to say that the petition from Galway, to which the right hon. Baronet had referred, was not signed by the Catholic warden of Galway, because there was no such individual.

Sir R. Peel asked whether the hon. Baronet did not call upon him with a petition from Galway, stating that the petitioners were anxious that Galway should be one of the seats for the new Colleges?

Sir V. Blake admitted that he called upon the right hon. Baronet to recommend that Galway should be one of those seats. The right hon. Baronet would probably recollect that, before the announcement of the intention of the Government to found these Colleges was made public, he took the opportunity of communicating to the right hon. Baronet certain measures by which great advantages would accrue to Ireland. [Sir Robert Peel: A ship canal!] Yes, and also from the establishment of Colleges, and he still hoped that Galway would have a University, although he confessed he did not now expect those advantages from any such institution which it would confer if it were based more on religion.

Colonel Sibthorp said, he felt it his duty as a Protestant to oppose the Amendment proposed by the hon. Gentleman opposite. He admitted that the time might come when the right hon. Baronet at the head to give up Trinity College, Dublin, as he was to bring forward the Maynooth Bill and other measures. Indeed, no course which the right hon. Baronet should adopt would surprise him. These things the right hon. Baronet did upon what he called the principle of expediency, but which he would call disgraceful subserviency. He had lost all confidence in the right hon. Baronet, who had abandoned all those measures to which he had promised to adhere. He would take his course as a sincere Protestant, leaving it to the right hon. Baronet to adopt principles half Roman Catholic, and which might be half Mahometan.

Lord John Russell: The right hon. Baronet (Sir Robert Peel) has hardly treated fairly the argument of my right hon. Friend (Mr. Sheil). My right hon. Friend, as a Roman Catholic, says, "Let us in Ireland have equality." A very fair object for any Roman Catholic and for any Irishman to look to. It was promised—solemnly promised at the Act of Union, and you have never denied—no party has ever denied—that equality is due to the Roman Catholics of Ireland. If that be your principle, so solemnly asserted, let us look with regard to any measure brought before the House, and see whether in respect to that measure equality is given to the Roman Catholics of Ireland. This is a question of academical education. I admit there are great merits in this Bill—great merits, as it tends to promote education in Ireland, and tends to give liberal encouragement to the means of instruction among the commercial and middle classes of that country. I think it has great merit in being entirely free from any religious test. I think that is a distinguishing feature of the Bill, which I am happy to acknowledge. But when I come to consider what will be the state of academical education in Ireland when this Bill has passed, comparing Roman Catholics with Protestants, the case will be this. With respect to clerical education, you may say that Trinity College is a place for the ecclesiastical education of Protestants; and that Maynooth is a place for the ecclesiastical education of Roman Catholics. So far there is an apparent equality. But when I come to consider the means for the general education of the higher classes in that country—I mean an education for the learned professions with a view to obtain-studies of a different nature—we then find what I believe to be the true description, as given by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Shaw), namely, that for the Roman Catholics you establish a certain number of Colleges suitable for the middle classes, which are open to all, and at which persons intending to devote themselves to commercial pursuits, to civil engineering, and professions of a similar nature, may obtain a good education; but with respect to a higher kind of education, you find that that is solely to be obtained in the University of Dublin, and that the University of Dublin is presided over by a body which is exclusively Protestant. Nay more, you find that even those scholarships which are intended for promoting the advancement of students in their future career, are confined in all cases to Protestants; and that with regard to professorships, such as chemistry and botany, Protestants only can be appointed to them. Here, at once, is not equality. You have not made a provision for giving to the Roman Catholics that which you have given to the Protestants. That inequality might be remedied in two ways. You might have a separate institution for Roman Catholics, and give that institution as rich an endowment as Trinity College possesses. That would be equality. But you do not adopt that course. I do not quarrel with you for that. But another way to remedy the inequality that exists is to open Trinity College, Dublin—all of it which is not of an ecclesiastical nature, but merely secular—to the Roman Catholics of that country. The right hon. Baronet has not therefore answered the speech of my right hon. Friend (Mr. Sheil) by comparing Maynooth with Trinity College, instead of stating, as is the fact, that Trinity College would still remain the only place where persons belonging to the higher classes can obtain collegiate degrees. This being the case, my right hon. Friend is perfectly justified in saying, that the Roman Catholics will not be satisfied until real equality is obtained. That is the case with regard to academical education; and so it is with regard to every other object. The right hon. Baronet says, that there are other difficulties in the way. There are difficulties in the way of every Government, I am well aware. One of the difficulties which the present Government has to encounter is their former acts and conduct. But, if they were determined to do that which I think they ought to do, namely, to tell the people of England that Ireland will not, and ought not, to be satisfied without equality, and if they will work that proposition out, whether it be as regards academical education, or whether it be as regards ecclesiastical education, or whether it be as regards political or civil privileges, I think, all these difficulties would very soon vanish before their sight. The people of England would see the justice of that policy. They do not so easily see the justice of a proposition which comes piecemeal before them. They do not see the advantage of endowing Maynooth solely for the education of Catholic priests; they do not see the advantage of a system of education from which religion is totally excluded. These propositions coming singly before them do not strike them with the force that they would do, if you were to bring the whole condition of Ireland before this House and the country, and were to say that you are determined to act according to the principles of justice. The right hon. Baronet finds fault with my right hon. Friend, because he is not satisfied, and because he is not prepared to go back to Ireland quite pleased, and willing to tell his constituents how kind and beneficent the English Parliament has been to them. But unless you can prove that your propositions are intended to comply with the promises made at the time of the Union; and unless, too, you can prove that the Roman Catholics of Ireland have had full justice done them, although they may, in respect to individual measures, say, "This is an advantageous measure, and may be a benefit for Ireland," yet they would not act with sincerity if they did not at the same time say, "But do not suppose that we shall be satisfied until perfect equality is established between Catholic and Protestant." With respect to the present, without confining myself to the words of the hon. Gentleman's proposition, I am quite willing, Sir, that the words contained in the Motion you are about to put, be left out, for the purpose of submitting some proposition for opening Trinity College to Roman Catholics. It is the only way left, after the manner in which these institutions have been determined upon by the Government. With regard to the Bill itself, I shall cheerfully give my vote for the third reading, although it is by no means a perfect measure, and although I still think it wants much to make it complete. But seeing its liberal character, and seeing that it is entirely free from all religious tests, and that you do not intend to inflict that injustice upon Ireland which you seem so resolutely determined to maintain in this country, I shall give it my support.

On the main Question being again put,

Sir R. H. Inglis stated, that it was made a boast, that now, for the first time, an institution, founded by the State, had been established without any regard to religion. Her Majesty's Government would either fail in making a system of education without religion in Ireland, or the professors would circulate their own peculiar doctrines. He moved that the Bill be read a third time that day three months.

Viscount Ebrington could not find for what class of students these Colleges were designed, or whom they would benefit, and not having any confidence that the Government would conduct them satisfactorily, must vote against the Bill. On these grounds he should support the Amendment.

Mr. Speaker said, that the Amendment could not be put in its present form.

Sir R. Inglis; Then I shall content myself with giving a simple negative to the proposition.

The House again divided on the Question that the Bill be now read a third time:—Ayes 177; Noes 26: Majority 151.

Bill read a third time and passed.

MERCHANT SEAMEN'S FUND.] Order of the Day for receiving the Report of the Merchant Seamen's Fund Bill in order to be postponed.

Sir Howard Douglas said, as the Mover of the Resolution embodied in the Report for the postponement of this Bill, he would, with the permission of the House, say a few words in reply to the reference made to him. The Resolution which he proposed was seconded by his hon. Friend the Member for London (Mr. Lyall), and vigorously supported by another hon. Member, now no more, whose untimely death this House must lament, his Friends mourn, and the mercantile marine of this country might justly deplore. So sustained, the Resolution was agreed to by a large majority; and he (Sir Howard Douglas) hoped that Her Majesty's Government would give effect to that Resolution, by moving the postponement of this Bill till the next Session of Parliament. Having been a member of the Merchant Seamen's Fund Committees of the last and the present Session, he had ample means and opportunities of considering, deeply, the important subject of forming a Merchant Seamen's Fund, adequate to the wants and necessities of the mercantile marine. He objected to the present Bill, because it was, in principle, unjust, and injurious to the shipping interest and to the seamen themselves belonging to the Port of Liverpool and other great ports extensively concerned in the Foreign and Colonial trade, as well as many others; and because it would sacrifice their interests to those of minor and less well managed ports; and because by amalgamation of the funds, the rates of pension for merchant seamen would be reduced to one scanty rate of uniform inadequacy. This Bill would abolish local funds; deprive first-rate ports and many others, of the superior advantages which they now possessed in an exclusive management of their own funds, and take from them the means and the power of providing for the widows and children of seamen. But very imperfectly should they discharge their duty to the mercantile marine of this country, the true basis of its commercial and naval power, if they did not devise some more comprehensive measure, by which a fund might be formed, sufficient to provide for the relief and support of merchant seamen, their widows and children, upon an adequate scale, worthy the munificence of this country; to raise generally the condition of British merchant seamen, and hold out additional inducements to them to remain in the service of their own country, instead of wasting their youth and their strength under the flag of Foreign States, returning only when worn out, to seek in their own land, provision for old age, from funds too scanty for the relief and support of those who devoted their use and strength to the service of the British marine. Such a comprehensive measure might, he (Sir H. Douglas) thought, be devised. He was not prepared to indicate the sources from which its means might be drawn, nor to detail the process or machinery by which such a measure might be carried out. This however, he would say, that he relied on the public spirit and liberality of that great shipping and trading community, of which he had the honour to be one of the Representatives, that they would cordially and liberally co-operate with the shipowners of the United Kingdom, generally, with a view to devise some comprehensive measure that might really be adequate to the great and important objects in view, deserving the favourable consideration of Her Majesty's Government, and which he hoped would be met by the liberality of that House, as he was sure it would with the universal approbation of the country. That he had not overrated the public spirit and liberality of that great shipping community with which he had the honour to be connected, he would request the permission of the House to read a passage from the Report of the proceedings of a Meeting of the Committee of the Shipowners' Association of Liverpool, expressly assembled to take into consideration the course which he (Sir Howard Douglas) had taken with respect to this Bill, and with reference to the Motion of which the hon. Member for South Shields had given notice, to recommit that Bill. That meeting came unanimously to the following resolution:—

"This Committee, therefore, earnestly request Sir Howard Douglas to persevere in his intention to meet Mr. Wawn's proposal by a direct negative, authorizing Sir Howard, at the same time, to assure Her Majesty's Government of the entire readiness and anxious wish of this Committee, to concur in any well matured and comprehensive proposal, for ameliorating the condition of the seaman; tending, while in health and strength, to improve his condition, and to retain him in the service of his own country, and to increase the provision made for him when old or disabled—objects which this Committee are prepared to recommend to the shipowners at large, even at the price of submitting to further taxation themselves."

He (Sir Howard Douglas) had read this resolution to the House with pride and satisfaction; and in the admirable terms in which it was expressed, he would appeal to the shipowners of the United Kingdom generally, to meet cordially the invitation which this resolution held out, and would earnestly recommend to the favourable consideration of Her Majesty's Government to meet, in that spirit, any such practicable and comprehensive proposition as the great body of the shipping interest of the United Kingdom might be prepared to suggest, on a future occasion, with a view to the adoption of such a comprehensive measure as that indicated in the Report now under consideration, in lieu of proceeding with this Bill.

Sir G. Clerk regretted the necessity for postponement, but hoped that during the recess a more comprehensive measure might be devised.

Further consideration of the Report postponed till next Session.

House adjourned at two o'clock.

PRIVILEGE.] The Lord Chancellor laid upon the Table the Report from the Committee appointed to search for Precedents in reference to the petition of Thomas Baker for Protection. Read, and ordered to lie on the Table; and to be printed.

The Duke of Richmond would now move that Thomas Baker be called to the bar, to deliver in the declaration he had received.

The Lord Chancellor stated the course he would recommend: The Report was of some length, and it would be some time before it could be printed, and in the hands of their Lordships. He would merely now call the petitioner before them to identify the transaction; after which the plaintiff and his attorney, if their names could be ascertained, should be ordered to attend on Monday. By that time the Report would be printed, and before any other step, such as calling them to the bar, was adopted, there might be a discussion; and those noble Lords who dissented from the course proposed might state their objections.

Lord Campbell entirely approved of the course proposed by his noble and learned Friend.

Lord Radnor had no objection to the course, except that when the petition was presented, a Committee had been appointed to search for precedents; and now, when the Report had only been handed in, and not printed, they were called upon to take a step.

The Lord Chancellor did not consider this a step by which the House would commit itself.

Lord Brougham did not object to calling in the petitioner, which was a very different matter from calling the plaintiff and his attorney before them.

Thomas Baker was then called in, and examined by the LORD CHANCELLOR.

Were you examined before a Committee of this House in the month of April of last year?—Yes.

What was that Committee?—A Committee to inquire into the Gaming Laws.

Were you aware that that Committee was appointed to inquire into the laws affecting gaming?—Yes.

Did you give evidence before that Committee?—I did.

Have you since been served with a declaration in any suit, or with a copy?—I received one, which is now in the hands of my attorneys.

Is your attorney in attendance?—Mr. Barnes is here.

Will you ask him for the declaration? Is that the declaration?—Mr. Barnes informs me it is the copy of one filed against me in the Court of Queen's Bench.

Have you read it?—It has been read to me by the clerk of Mr. Lyons.

Does the statement in the declaration correspond with the language used by you before the Committee?—It don't make use of the whole language made us of before the Committee.

By Lord BROUGHAM.—Do you find any of your evidence before that Committee made use of?—Some of it.

By the LORD CHANCELLOR.—In the declaration do you find those words of yours charged?—Yes.

Do the words charged correspond with part of the evidence given by you before the Committee?—Yes.

Did you ever before any other Committee make precisely the same statement as is contained there?—Not precisely the same.

By Lord BROUGHAM.—Did you make anything like the same statement?—Not with respect to him.

Never?—Never.

By the LORD CHANCELLOR.—Did you make any statement with regard to him except that to which you were sworn, and before a Committee of the House?—Never.

Is that a copy of the declaration which was delivered?—Yes.

By Lord BROUGHAM.—Did you say anything with respect to Mr. Harlow except before this Committee?—No.

By Lord CAMPBELL.—Have you any doubt that this action is brought for the evidence given by you?—I believe it is solely brought for that evidence.

Do you know the names of the plaintiff's solicitors?—Messrs. Ward and Harbin.

What solicitors do you employ?—Messrs. Lyons, Barnes, and Ellis.

Are they in attendance?—Mr. Barnes is.

Then Mr. Barnes was called in, and examined by his Lordship.

Did you receive a declaration of the plaintiff in this suit?—No; it was filed by the plaintiff's attorney, and taken out by my clerk.

Is that a copy?—That is the original.

Who is the plaintiff's attorney?—Mr. Peter Tait Harbin.

By Lord BROUGHAM.—How did you know it was filed?—Notice was served on the defendant.

By Lord CAMPBELL.—With a notice to plead?—Yes.

By Lord BROUGHAM.—What notice?—Eight days. The declaration was filed on the 7th of July.

By the LORD CHANCELLOR.—Do you know where the plaintiff's attorney lives?—The address on the back of the writ is 16, Clement's Inn.

Thomas Baker was recalled, and examined by the LORD CHANCELLOR.

Do you know where the plaintiff lives?—Yes, my Lord, in Leicester Square.

By Lord BROUGHAM.—What number?—16.

What sort of a shop does he keep?—A tobacconist's.

Thomas Baker and the other parties in attendance were then ordered to withdraw.

The Lord Chancellor then moved, that Peter Taite Harbin and John Harlow do attend their Lordships' House on Monday next.

Lord Brougham would not at this stage of the proceeding take an objection to the course suggested, which, however, was not the same matter of course as that of calling the petitioner before them. He purposely abstained from raising the question at that moment; and he trusted that those who agreed with him would also abstain; and he would take such objection as he might be advised, if any further proceeding should be urged against the plaintiff, or if he should be called to the bar. The present, however, was a material step, and he should content himself with protesting against it.

The Lord Chancellor also reserved his opinion, and upon the same grounds. Their Lordships could not be properly prepared to discuss this question till the Report of the Committee should be printed; but for the purpose of saving time, he proposed that the parties should be ordered to attend.

The Marquess of Clanricarde had not had the good fortune of attending the Committee, as he had been obliged to attend a Railroad Committee; but it now appeared that no inconvenience would have been felt if the House had proceeded last night in the straightforward course he had suggested. The same course they were now about to take could have been taken yesterday, and the House might have taken it whether they had found a precedent or not. It was a gratification to him, as he had entered a Protest on the Journals against the step taken yesterday, that the opinion he had recorded had now met with unanimous approval.

Motion agreed to, and

The Lord Chancellor moved that the Lords be summoned.

Lord Campbell was so delighted at the turn the matter had taken, that he would not charge their Lordships with inconsistency, though they were no doubt reversing their decision of last night.

Lord Stanley said, there was this material difference in the two courses; last night it was moved that the parties be summoned to the bar, when they had not determined what to do; whereas now they had the advantage of precedents.

After a few words from Lord Brougham,

The Duke of Wellington said, the great difference in the position of the House that evening, and the position last evening, was this:—a petition was presented by the noble Duke sitting on the cross-benches yesterday evening: he (the Duke of Wellington) for one, believed every word contained in that petition: but they were in a different position that night as a House of Parliament. He last night believed in the statements of the petition, as the noble Duke had vouched for them; but that night they had evidence before them on oath, that this man had given evidence before the Committee; that the evidence was the same as the words contained in the declaration, and that he had never stated anything respecting these matters anywhere else. Therefore this declaration must have reference to the evidence given before a Committee of their Lordships' House, and to nothing else. That was the difference of the situation in which they stood that night; and he thought it would turn out that the plaintiff who had filed this declaration would rather find himself in a difficulty.

Motion agreed to.

Railways and the Board of Trade.] The Earl of Dalhousie laid upon the Table of the House a Minute of the Lords of the Committee of Privy Council for Trade, dated the 10th day of July, 1845, relative to the constitution and mode of proceedings of the Railway Department of the Board of Trade. As the subject was one of considerable importance, he felt himself called on to state shortly, the alteration which it was intended to make, and the grounds upon which they proceeded. Their Lordships would recollect that, at the commencement of the last Session, a Committee had been appointed by the other House for considering the subject of Railway Legislation generally. That Committee sat for many months, and made a very full Report on various matters connected with railways. Upon one point in particular, it reported very fully—viz., the degree of supervision which the Government ought to exercise over schemes before they were brought under the consideration of Parliament. That Report was laid before the House, and adopted, and the Government proceeded to carry into effect its recommendations. It had now become necessary for the Government to consider what provisions should be made for the future conducting of railway schemes. They had found that the circumstances connected with the subject differed materially from those which existed at the beginning of last Session. Having maturely considered the question, and having due regard to the constitution and operations of the Committee of the House of Commons, and to the feeling which had been evinced by Parliament in the course of the present Session, the Government had come to the conclusion, that the Board of Trade should not, in future, prepare or submit to Parliament any Report upon the merits of railway projects. But in relinquishing this function of reporting upon the merits of schemes, previously to their being considered by Parliament, their Lordships must not be induced to consider that the Board had failed in the object for which it had been instituted. He had seen it stated as a curious fact — and curious it, no doubt, would be if true—that only one decision of the Board of Trade had been approved of by the House of Commons, and that that one decision had been reversed by the House of Lords. But what were the real facts of the case? The Railway Department of the Board of Trade had reported on 247 schemes, comprising nearly 8,000 miles of railway; of these 58 had been withdrawn, and 19 had failed upon the Standing Orders, leaving 160, which had been read a second time in the House of Commons. Of these 160, nine still remained undecided, making the number, actually decided on, 151; and of these 151 schemes decided on both by the Board of Trade and the House of Commons, there were only six in which the House of Commons had directly reversed the opinion of the Board of Trade, which six schemes were involved in what was termed the gauge case, and only nine other cases in which the opinion of the Board of Trade had not been confirmed, owing in the mean time to a change of circumstances, or to a compromise between the contending parties; so that, out of 151 schemes which the House of Commons had decided upon, only 15 had been rejected, while 123 of the decisions of the Board of Trade had been absolutely confirmed. He thought he was, therefore, entitled to say that the Board of Trade had not failed in discovering the truth, and that their Reports were not to be considered as waste paper. The Minute of last year proposed that a distinct Committee of the Board of Trade should be appointed for railway business; but it was now intended to discontinue that Committee, and allow the business to be carried on by the ordinary Committee. The same preliminary steps on the part of railway companies which were now required, such as depositing with the Board of Trade a copy of the plan and a statement of the objects of the Bill, would continue to be required. They would also be expected to deliver a copy of the Bill when prepared; and if, upon the examination of its provisions, it should appear to the Board of Trade to be desirable, on public grounds, to direct the attention of Parliament to the nature of those provisions, the Board of Trade would be at liberty to submit to Parliament a Report upon the subject; but in no case to pronounce any opinion upon the merits of the Bill. That was a considerable change from the former system; and he ventured either House to feel, under the remodelled form of procedure, that there could be any invasion of their powers in deciding upon such matters.

Lord Brougham thanked the noble Earl for his very fair and candid statement. The noble Earl said that a new arrangement had been made. It might well be called a new arrangement. It was just such an arrangement as took place in the body natural, when it was consigned to its parent earth, and suffered decomposition in the course of nature. He condemned the system of delay which was pursued in Committees by the opponents of different Bills for the purpose of insuring their defeat; and particularly instanced the case of the London and York Bill, which had now been about fourteen weeks in Committee. He had always been opposed to the appointment of the Board of Trade Committee, considering that their proceedings were calculated to encourage gambling, and being convinced that they could not have the materials before them which would enable them to come to a correct conclusion. He, however, could not see any objection to the plan now proposed.

Report to be printed.

RAILWAY AND OTHER BILLS.] Lord Brougham then asked their Lordships if it was their intention to proceed with the Adjourned Debate on the following Resolution, as amended, which, he thought, would put a stop to a good deal of hardship and oppression, viz.:—

"That where any Party or Parties have appeared and contested any such Bills at the Bar or in the Committees of the House, it shall be lawful for the House or Committees, if in their Discretion they shall think fit, to direct the Expences of such Party or Parties incurred in the Proceedings before this House or its Committee to be paid by the opposite Party promoting the Bill; the Amount of such Expences to be ascertained and certified by the Clerk of the Parliaments or Clerk-Assistant, by like Taxation and in the same Manner and upon the same Terms in all respects, as Costs on Appeals and Writs of Error are directed to be ascertained and certified by the Standing Order of this House, of the 3rd of April 1835 No. 215; and that the Petitioners for any such Bill, or some of them, as shall be approved by the Clerk of the Parliaments, shall, before the same is read a Second Time, give Security to the said Clerk, by Recognizance to be entered into to The Queen, of the Penalty of 5,000*l.*, conditioned to pay all Expences which may be ordered by the

LUNATICS.] Lord Ashley moved the Order of the Day for the House to go into Committee on the Lunatics' Bill.

Mr. T. Duncombe deprecated the further progress of the Bill at so late a period of the Session. His objection to the principle of the Bill was so great, that he would move its postponement until the next Session.

Sir J. Graham, addressing the House, said, that the Government had intended to bring in a Bill similar to that before the House; but knowing the great interest which his noble Friend (Lord Ashley) had taken in the subject, and his perfect acquaintance with it, they had gladly handed over the matter to his charge, but they did not for an instant wish to get rid of the responsibility themselves; on the contrary, the Government took upon themselves the whole responsibility of the measure, which they felt would be of great public benefit. He hoped the House would give its sanction to a measure of so much importance, even although it had been unavoidably delayed to a late period of the Session.

Order of the Day read.

Lord Ashley moved, "that the Speaker do now leave the chair."

Mr. T. Duncombe said, he had to present a petition complaining that a man, named William White, a poor brother of the Charter-house, had been detained in a private lunatic assylum for nine years, although he had certificates of four surgeons that he was of sound mind, and not a proper person to be so confined.

Lord Ashley sincerely hoped the hon. Member for Finsbury, now that he stated the object he had in view in opposing the Bill, would allow the House to go through the preliminary forms, so that the measure might be fully and dispassionately considered and discussed in Committee. He also hoped that nothing which might fall from the hon. Gentleman or any other hon. Member would tempt him to infringe the rules of the House, or induce him to reply in any way that exhibited aught in the nature of irritation or ill-feeling. When he heard the hon. Gentleman say that the Commissioners, in the discharge of their duties, and particularly in their examinations, had conducted themselves with arrogance and intolerance, he must take leave to say that the hon. Member had been most grievously misinformed by those who had made such a statement to him. He would ask him to consult his own heart and his own feelings, and if in his heart and his feelings he found that it would be possible for him, in so solemn an inquiry—an inquiry of so delicate a nature, and affecting, as it did, the happiness of human beings—to behave with arrogance and intolerance, then he (Lord Ashley) would admit that his brother Commissioners and himself were open to the charge. But he would undertake to prove to the House that nothing could be more inaccurate than such a charge. It was quite true that the hon. Gentleman gave him notice that it was his intention to bring under the consideration of the House the case of Captain Digby. He had stated to him in private that if it were necessary for the Commissioners to be put upon their defence, and to show their reasons why they could not authorize the liberation of that party, he feared, from the documents which would be produced, that the case would issue in a painful result. He had hoped that he should not have to weary the House by any further statements; and he felt that he was acting with exceeding boldness when he brought forward this measure. He had hoped that his preliminary observations would have been sufficient; but since it was the will of the House that he should make a further communication on this matter, he would request them to receive the explanation he was now about to offer. It would be necessary, in the first place, that he should describe the constitution of the Commission, and retrace the history of legislation upon this subject. In 1828, Mr. Gordon, then a Member of this House, introduced a Bill which afterwards became the Act under which the operations of the Commission were conducted, and was, in fact, the law under which their operations were conducted up to the present time. If the House would allow him, he would give a short view of the state of the law by which private asylums were regulated previously to 1828, in order that they might see how they had gone on progressively improving in their legislation, and how they might continue to go on progressively improving; for this was a difficult and delicate question, and no step could be taken without deliberation, and every such step must be justified by past experience. Previously to 1828 private asylums were regulated by the Act of Parliament passed in the 14th year of George III. That was a most important Act, but very defective. There was no power contained in it for punishing an offence, not even for revoking or refusing a license. There was a great laxity in the signature of certificates, one only being deemed sufficient, and that one might be and often was signed by a person not duly qualified, or the proprietor of the madhouse (in his medical capacity), to which the alleged lunatic was consigned. Houses licensed under that Act were not required to be visited more than once a year. There was no power under the Act to discharge any patient who might prove to be of sound mind. Licenses could be granted only on one day in the year. Pauper lunatics were sent to the madhouse and admitted without medical certificates, and no return of pauper patients was ever made to the Board. No plans were required of houses previously to the granting of licenses; no returns of the cases of lunatics kept singly in houses for gain; and, moreover, no visits of medical persons to the patients. That, in fact, was the state of the law from 1777 down to 1828, when Mr. Gordon introduced a Bill which remedied these defects. That Act gave power to the Board to revoke or refuse a license. Sundry offences were specified in the Act, not specified in the old Act, which might be punished as misdemeanors. Separate visits by two medical men were required; and these gentlemen were to be members of one of the three authorized medical bodies. These visits must have been paid to the alleged lunatic within a period of not more than seven clear days before his admission into a licensed house. Every licensed house was to be visited at least four times in the year (many of them not having been visited at all under the old law), and in practice now some of them were visited oftener. A power was also given for discharging any patient who might, after due medical investigation of the case, be considered of sound mind. Licenses could be granted on any of the quarterly boards; and certificates were necessary for the admission of pauper lunatics, as well as returns of them regularly made, and lists of them kept, so that each pauper was seen, and, when requisite, examined on each visit of the Commissioners. Plans of all houses were required, and also of such alterations as might, from time to time, be made therein; and returns of patients in single houses under certain well-guarded provisions for insuring secrecy, were to be annually made to the clerk. Then, each house, containing more than a hundred patients, was to have a resident medical officer; and where the number was less than a hundred, was to be visited by a medical person twice a week. Mr. Gordon's Act was passed for three years, and the Commission was appointed for one year, to be renewed annually. That Commission consisted of several unpaid Members, and five physicians, and it was provided that these five physicians should be paid at the rate of one guinea an hour for their attendance, with power to carry into effect the new Act within the metropolitan district. This Act and Commission were renewed in 1832, and two barristers were added on the same terms. About 1834, after having been a member of the Commission, he (Lord Ashley) became the chairman of the Commission, which duty he had discharged up to the present time. Now, this Act was renewed periodically from three years to three years, until the year 1842, when his noble Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Lord G. Somerset) brought in a Bill for three years, the object of which was greatly to extend the operation of the metropolitan Commissioners. Let the House see how that Act extended the duties devolved upon these Commissioners. It extended their duties over the whole surface of England and Wales, instead of confining them to the metropolitan district and a radius of seven miles round it, and directed that all asylums licensed by the justices should be visited twice a year by two Commissioners (a physician and a barrister), who were to examine the licenses and certificates, and inquire and report as to restraint, classification, occupation, and amusements. They were also to report on the condition of paupers on admission, diet, and so forth. They were bound to make entries as to particular patients in patients' book, and empowered to liberate patients in provincial asylums after two visits. The Act likewise directed a physician and barrister (members of the Commission) to visit county asylums once a year, and make inquiries and reports similar to those which he had already specified. Then, for the purpose of discharging any increase in their duties, the number of physicians had been augmented to seven, and of barristers to four. And it was also provided by the Act that the Commissioners should receive at the rate of five guineas a day during the performance of their duties in the provinces. Such were the provisions of the Act passed in the fifth and sixth of Her present Majesty's reign; and immediately after its enactment the Commissioners entered upon their enlarged duties. Now, let the House observe what were the duties which devolved upon the Commissioners. The result of the passing of that Act was, that in each year the establishments to be visited by them were seventeen county asylums, or asylums brought within the scope of the 9th Geo. IV. (the Act of 1828), being twelve county asylums, and five county and subscription asylums; eleven asylums of a mixed character, maintained partly by subscription, and partly by income from charitable foundations; and two military and naval hospitals. These would be visited once a year. Ninety-nine houses licensed by justices in session, fifty-nine of them receiving private patients only, and the remaining forty paupers and private patients, would be visited twice a year. Then, in the metropolitan district, there were thirty-seven houses licensed by the metropolitan Commissioners, thirty-three of which received private patients only, and the remainder (four large establishments) both pauper and private patients. These would be visited four times in the course of a year. So that in the whole, 166 houses, spread over a large surface, were to be visited by the Commissioners, some of them once, others twice, and some four times a year. The result of these investigations was a voluminous Report from the Commissioners, which was presented to the House towards the close of the last Session of Parliament; and he very much feared that the size of that Report, although it was published in the most inviting form, had deterred many hon. Members from perusing it; because if the House of Commons had read the Report, there would have been very little hesitation manifested with regard to the two Bills which he had had the honour of introducing. Nor did he think that he should now have been called on to weary the House by these preliminary remarks. Well, upon the presentation of that Report, he proposed a motion for an Address to the Crown, praying Her Majesty to take it into Her serious consideration. A discussion arose in the House, and Her Majesty's Government stated that they were so impressed with the necessity of legislation upon the subject, that they promised that a Bill should be introduced in the succeeding Session of Parliament, in consequence of which he (Lord Ashley) withdrew his notice. His right hon. Friend (Sir James Graham) had already explained to the House why it was that he was entrusted with the introduction of the two very important Bills before the House. His right hon. Friend was pleased to think that, as he had served so long on the Commission, and performed the responsible and arduous duties of its chairman, he was the proper person to present these measures to the notice of the House. He undertook the task, because he thought it to be his duty so to do when asked by the Minister of the Crown, knowing at the same time how much that Minister was overwhelmed by the pressure of public business, and knowing also the great zeal and diligence which his right hon. Friend brought to bear in discharging the important duties that devolved upon him. The House might be assured that it was not from an overweening opinion of his own competency or ability that he (Lord Ashley) had complied with the right hon. Baronet's request. Quite the reverse. He shrunk from the task—not that he shrunk from the labour, or entertained a fear as to the reception which the Bills would meet with at the hands of the House; but because he did not feel that he had either sufficient influence with the House, or a sufficient command of ability, to undertake a measure which he knew must extend over the length and breadth of the realm, and would introduce a new system on principles which he was quite convinced, if carried out judiciously, would place this country at the very pinnacle among the countries which undertook to legislate for this unfortunate class of their fellow subjects. The result was, the two Bills which he had introduced; the one to provide for pauper lunatics, and the other to render permanent the Commission, and provide rules for private asylums, and for general visitation. He would now explain why it was that these particular provisions existed in the Bills, and particularly the one which he should bring under the consideration of the House this morning. The duties of the Commissioners being so extended in point of surface, and so multiplied in number and variety, it became absolutely necessary to consider the present constitution of the Commission. It was quite clear that with the Commission, as at present constituted, they could not go on much longer in the discharge of duties which were multiplying every day. In the first place, then, it was absolutely necessary to have very many more Board meetings, in consequence of the rapid increase in the business they had to go through. When the Boards were held, they found a greater accumulation of business than they could discharge with that attention which was its due. In the next place, it was equally necessary that there should be more visitations. They found that nothing was so effective for the prevention of abuses as successive and unexpected visitings. But with the Commission constituted as it was, it would be impossible that they could to any great extent increase the number of their meetings. It was requisite, therefore, in order to obtain a due attendance, that they should secure the full, entire, and undivided services of professional men, abstracted altogether from any professional pursuits or practice. The accumulation of their duties had very much altered the capacity of the medical men and barristers to discharge them. So long as the duties were confined to the metropolitan districts, that was, London been much easier for the Commission, as now constituted, to meet and discharge their duties, although they too were in a great degree increased; but the moment the county duties were superadded, and it became necessary that the barristers and medical men should be absent from their private practice in London for whole days together in the provinces, it was perfectly clear, that then the proper discharge of the duties could only be secured by having persons altogether devoted to this work, and no other. It was necessary, also, to consider the progressively increasing expenses of the Commission. Observe how those expenses were growing, as shown by the Parliamentary Papers; from which it appeared, that in the year ending in August, 1844, they were within a fraction of 10,000*l.* In that same year, the payments to the Commissioners alone, who were paid according to the time employed, had increased, as compared with the year 1842-3, by 918*l.* Then, see how many meetings of the Board took place. In 1842 they held fifteen, in 1840 they held twenty-four, and in 1844 they held thirty-one meetings. Now, the sittings of those Boards averaged at the very least four hours each, and were attended by eleven paid members, consisting of seven physicians and four barristers. At this rate, they cost in 1842, 660*l.*, in 1843, 956*l.*, and in 1844, 1,364*l.*, thus showing an increase in two years of 704*l.* for expenses of the Boards alone. On this scale it might be estimated, that in two years' time, viz., in 1847, even if no additional duties were imposed, the expenses would have arisen to 12,640*l.* a year; but, supposing additional duties were required, as proposed by the Bill now before the House, in the same period of two years, or in 1847, the expenses would have risen to 14,850*l.* per annum. Let the House now observe the duties which the Bill, if carried, would impose upon the Commissioners. See the enormous extent of country to be travelled over, and the additional number of days that must be employed in the performance of that duty. In the first place, all workhouses in England and Wales would require visitation, for there were lunatics in the workhouses of every county, with two exceptions only. With a view, therefore, to efficiency and economy, the arrangement of a permanent Commission was salaries of 1,500*l.* a year each. The total amount of salaries to the Commissioners would be 9,000*l.* Now, he would beg the House to observe, that for this they were to have the exclusive and undivided services of those parties. It had been observed that such a provision was not made in the Bill; he could only say, that such was the intention, and he had since introduced the very strongest words which could be used, in order to show that their exclusive and undivided attention was to be given to the duties of their office, and that they were not to receive emolument from any other source, with the exception of private property. Under these circumstances it was necessary to hold out an inducement sufficient to invite into the service men of the highest talent and integrity. The Poor Law Commissioners received 2,000*l.* a year, and it was proposed that 1,500*l.* per annum should be given to the Commissioners under this Bill. Their duties would be of a very harassing nature. They must frequently be absent from home, devoting a considerable part of their time to travelling over the length and breadth of the country. They must necessarily be persons of high character, and would be taken altogether from their practice and profession, devoting themselves exclusively to the services of this Commission, which would be of an extremely difficult and delicate nature. As to the cost of the Commission, there would be a secretary at a salary of 800*l.* per annum, and two clerks at a salary of 100*l.* each; then he estimated the travelling expenses at about 2,150*l.*, and sundries at 430*l.* making together a total expenditure of 12,583*l.* That was the estimated expense of the Commission. As to the provision for superannuation, taking it at the utmost, and supposing the superannuation list to be full, the expense would only be increased 14,583*l.* But, however, putting that out of the question, the expense of the Commission for many years would be 12,583*l.* He would call upon the House to mark how very low an estimate they had taken of the expense, when they considered the additional duties which the permanent Commission proposed by the Bill would create. They had calculated upon only six additional board days—they ought to have at least two a week. [Mr. T. Duncombe: It ought to be every day.] Very well, then that would occupy their time altogether, and they should be rewarded according to their services. The hon. Gentleman could not have said anything that so completely proved the necessity of a constant permanent Commission. But there was a new duty imposed on the Commission by this Bill. The Commissioners were to have the serious, delicate, but indispensable duty of visiting those wretched creatures who were shut up in single houses. It was a duty, the extent of which they could not as yet form a notion of. In half an hour's walk from the door of that House, he would undertake to say that he would find a hundred persons shut up in single houses. The Bill, provided, however, that notice should be given to the Commissioners in such cases, and a certificate signed. [Mr. T. Duncombe: That clause I approve of more than any other in the Bill.] He was very happy to hear it. To execute such a duty as the Commissioners would have to perform in visiting these houses, they must surely devote their serious and undivided services, and they must be proper and efficient men. The duty of visitation was one of the most burdensome that could be conceived. He had on a late occasion visited a house containing a number of private and pauper lunatics, and having reached it soon after eleven o'clock, the Commissioners had not finished the performance of their duty at seven—when he was obliged to come away and leave his Colleagues behind. It was not a common service to be performed, but one of great excitement, difficulty, and responsibility. It was necessary that visitations should be made repeatedly and unexpectedly. As the Chairman of such Commission, he should say, go and visit such and such a place ten or twelve times in the course of a year; and this with a permanent Commission would not increase the expense, but by the present system the Commissioners were paid upon each visitation a guinea an hour during the whole time they were engaged; the Bill before the House, however, would give a stationary income. At present the Commissioners made four hundred and four distinct visits in one year, they travelled 15,000 miles in the same period, they also attended 34 boards, they made 404 separate reports, and they also made 600 entries in the different books, some of which which were of great length. Upon the very lowest estimate, under the present Bill, they must make 560 visits, travel 16,500 miles, hold 40 boards, make 500 reports, and about 900 entries. But this would not be enough, and unless the Commission was able to devote itself to these duties, and multiply both the boards and visitations, no effectual good could be done. If the House thought those duties were to be performed—the visitation of all the workhouses, containing 8,000 pauper lunatics—all the patients in single houses—and, as the hon. Member for Finsbury said, a board should be held every day—if the House thought all this duty was to be performed, his (Lord Ashley's) belief was that, in a very short time, the expense of the present Commission would reach 25,000*l.* a year. A clause was inserted in the Bill which would give a most stringent hold over the proper discharge of the duties of the Commissioners. At the end of every six months they would have to make a return to the Lord Chancellor of the number of visits which they had made, the patients whom they had seen, and the miles which they had travelled. Now, he would just point out to the House some of the provisions of the new Bill, to show how vast an improvement it would be on the existing law. It began by establishing a permanent Commission, and thereby secured the entire services of competent persons, and fixed the limits of expense now regularly increasing. It placed hospitals (or subscription asylums) under proper regulations, by requiring them to have the same orders and certificates as were necessary in licensed houses, and by subjecting them to the same visitation as county asylums. It prevented persons of weak mind from being received in asylums in the character of boarders, in which case they had not the benefit of any visitation, and were sometimes induced to execute deeds affecting their property. It provided an additional security against the improper detention of pauper patients, by requiring that the person signing the order for their confinement should see and personally examine them beforehand; and that the medical officer who certified as to their insanity should see them within seven days previous to their confinement. Neither of these safeguards existed at present. It compelled every person receiving a patient to state his condition (mental as well as bodily) when first admitted, and the cause of his death when he died. It directed every injury and act of violence happening to a patient to be recorded, and required a "case book" to be kept; thereby affording additional security against mismanagement, and showing how far the patients had the benefit of medical treatment. It provided against the liberation of dangerous patients. It authorized the visitors to enforce a proper supply of food (in licensed houses) to pauper patients, who were at present fed at the discretion of the proprietor. It enabled the visitors to order the admission of a patient's friends to visit him. At present they were admitted or excluded at the caprice of the person who signed the order for the patient's confinement. It enabled the visitors to sanction the temporary removal of a patient (in ill health) to the seaside or elsewhere. It enforced an immediate private return of all single patients (received for profit) and authorized the members of a small private committee to visit them if necessary. These returns were almost universally evaded at present, the law rendering it unnecessary to make any return unless the patient had been confined for twelve months. It enabled the Chancellor to protect the property of lunatics against whom a Commission had not issued, by a summary and inexpensive process; and finally, it subjected all workhouses, in which any lunatic was kept, to regular visitation. Now, he would just show the House of what this last duty consisted. By the last returns to August, 1844, just presented by the Poor Law Commissioners, there were 17,355 pauper lunatics and idiots chargeable in the country. Of these, there were in county asylums 4,224, leaving 13,131 unprovided for in any public asylum. Of these last, there were in licensed houses 2,942, leaving in no asylum and under no supervision or care whatever, nearly 10,000. That was the existing state of things; and surely it proved the necessity of immediate interference. The treatment which the pauper lunatics often received was shocking to contemplate. He knew the case of a wretched woman who had been rather violent, and with regard to whom the matron, taking upon herself to incarcerate the poor creature when and in what manner she pleased, bound her with ropes, and leaving her in that state, in a short time the rope had eaten to the very bone; in consequence of which her arm was soon after amputated. In all such places there would be a tendency to restrain and incarcerate frequently. It was easy to put such poor creatures in a strait waistcoat and get rid of them. That case occurred five years ago; but three days ago he received a letter from a visiting magistrate, who said, he was happy to find that the Bill had been introduced, as many of these wretched creatures were farmed out by the workhouses, and kept by their relations. He said, that he had been a visiting magistrate forty years, and a "circumstance came under my observation of a female, who, during her pregnancy, became insane; and the person under whose care the parish officers had placed her had fastened the ligatures so tight round her ancles (the blood being in a sluggish state) that they mortified; and, upon my second visit, I found that her feet had dropped off."

She died afterwards, her reason having been restored; she made no complaint, but "these things would never have happened had she been sent to a proper asylum." He added—

"On my visit to another asylum, I found twenty-five lunatics crowded together in a small yard, with only a boy, under twenty years of age, to take care of them. They were all bound in waistcoats or handcuffs."

He (Lord Ashley) had seen no less than eighty lunatics in one yard, under the charge of a single person, in one of the private asylums in London for the reception of pauper lunatics. He hoped, however, that the Bill which was now about to pass for the erection of county lunatic asylums, would gradually be the means of diminishing these enormities. It was pleasing to contrast with such places the Hanwell and Surrey asylums. In the former he had seen forty-eight patients together, engaged in horticulture, and using sharp and dangerous instruments; and in the Surrey asylum he had seen lunatics brought to use sharp weapons, such as axes, hatchets, &c. He wanted to approximate to that state of things as much as he could before these asylums were built, and therefore he wished all lunatics to be brought under immediate visitation. But if they imposed all these necessary duties, they must have a permanent Commission, and employ men who were well qualified, and willing to give their undivided attention to this difficult work. It was very well to talk of postponement; but many counties at this moment were waiting for the passing of this measure, and had suspended their operations. He would instance Derby, Warwick, Worcester, Nottingham, and Staffor d In Sussex, the magistrates were preparing to fit up an old gaol as a lunatic asylum, and would no doubt do so if this Bill were delayed until next Session. St. Peter's, at Bristol, Haverfordwest, and several other wretched asylums, still received patients. Besides, in many places there was very little visitation, and in some actually none. If these places were visited and subjected to efficient regulations, a great many parties would, no doubt, be cured when placed under proper care, who might otherwise become incurable lunatics. By delay, and want of curative process, out of 700 curable lunatics in a year, barely one-tenth would be recovered; and he would ask the House to estimate the misery and expense of 630 lunatics being added yearly to the list of incurables. It was well known that when persons had laboured under the disorder for twelve months, it rarely happened that more than one-sixth could be cured. The postponing of the measure until another Session would involve at least a delay of six months, during which time, he would ask the hon. Member for Finsbury to recollect the number of lunatics who would be left altogether without superintending care. He would also ask the House to consider the difficulties by which the Commissioners were surrounded. They were compelled, in the Bill before the House, to take a middle course; they were bound to consider the patient, but they were also bound to regard the public. The hon. Member for Finsbury, with great propriety, took up the cause of the patient, and called upon them to take care that he was not confined a moment longer than was absolutely necessary. Other persons, however, held opinions contrary to those of the hon. Gentleman, and called on him to make the law far less stringent; and, as he had before said, it was necessary to take a middle course. He begged to thank the House for the great kindness with which they had listened to him. He could only say, that he took the deepest interest in the fate of this unhappy class of persons. He had been engaged for sixteen years in this matter, and thought the House would do him the justice to say that he was not actuated by any personal motive; all he asked was, that some little consideration might be given to the opinions of those who, without fee or reward, and whose only motive was to ameliorate the condition of the unfortunate lunatic—he only asked that some little consideration might be given to the opinion of such persons. It was very well for those Gentlemen to talk of delay who knew nothing, by experience, of the horrors that were hourly perpetrated; it was very well for persons to talk of delay who had never seen the miseries which were constantly brought under his notice, and who did not know how painful it was to administer an imperfect law. The Commissioners knew the law to be imperfect—they saw the remedy—and they knew that a large proportion of the evils could be removed if only some little consideration were given to their opinions. They now applied to the House, from their own experience, for a remedy which was within the reach of the Legislature. If he was defeated in his effort to obtain the sanction of law for the Bill before the House, without any further delay, it would be to him a source of inexpressible regret; and he implored the House, by all the statements which had been laid before them, by all that they must know of their own knowledge, to lose no time in carrying into execution those means within their reach, of removing the great evils of the present system, which were not only the source of intolerable suffering to the unhappy beings in whose defence he was pleading, but which were a standing disgrace to this enlightened kingdom and this Christian land.

Mr. T. Duncombe said, the Bill would not give that guarantee and security to the public which the noble Lord imagined. He did not underrate the great importance of the measure; but at this advanced period of the Session, and when there was no absolute necessity for it that he could understand, he thought that the Bill should be postponed until the next Session of Parliament, in order that an investigation might take place, not only as to the conduct of the Commissioners, but also with reference to the operation of the existing laws, under which great abuses did exist, and would continue to exist, in spite of the provisions of the Bill. The noble Lord could not tell him how any persons who had been unjustly confined could obtain relief by the Bill before the House; the same medical certificates were to be given, and interested parties would still have the power of imprisoning their victims under the plea of lunacy. He would call the attention of the House to the petition of Mr. Lewis Phillips, who asked for time, and prayed the House not to legislate blindfolded. He (Mr. Duncombe) thought it was better that nineteen insane persons should go free, than that one rational being should be shut up under the plea of insanity. He had made inquiries, and believed every word in the petition of Mr. Phillips to be correct. The petitioner wished to be called to the bar—

"For the purpose of explaining the malpractices and workings of divers individuals desirous of placing Her Majesty's subjects in such places of confinement, without the proper and necessary steps which a British subject ought to be entitled to, and receive protection from a law to guard against any innovation, or tend in any measure to deprive the subject of the freedom he should properly enjoy."

He proceeded to say—

"That he was a partner in a large firm as a glass and lamp manufacturer, in Regent-street, St. James's, in the month of March, 1838, with his brothers, who were carrying on a prosperous business. That on the 16th day of March, 1838, your petitioner was on his usual rounds to the nobility, customers of the firm. That one of the said customers required your petitioner to call at Her Majesty's Palace that morning at eleven o'clock. That your petitioner did call, and the pretext thus arose for incarcerating your petitioner in a lunatic asylum. That without further entering into details, your petitioner was, in consequence of representations by his partners of his insanity to the magistrate, Mr. White, of Queen-square Police Court, given over to their care and custody. That your petitioner conferred with several friends and the police, who advised your petitioner to bring actions against all parties; on his again going to the Palace on the Saturday, the 17th of March, 1838, for the purpose of finding out the names of the parties who aided and abetted in his capture, he was seized at Pimlico by Leadbeater, without any cause, and neither did he intrude, or had any intention of intruding upon any part of the Palace; then conveyed to Bow-street station-house, locked up all night, and at six o'clock Sunday evening your petitioner was informed that he was liberated, and taken to receive some refreshment, by Leadbeater and an attorney; that without any further investigation, on the said Sunday evening your petitioner was removed in a hackney coach, closely guarded, to Dr. Warburton's lunatic asylum, Bethnal-green. That your petitioner was kept in close confinement until Sunday, the 9th of September, 1838, a period of six months, for, as his partners ridiculously stated, attempting to see the Queen. That during your petitioner's incarceration all sorts of practices were used in order to entrap your petitioner to make some confession to justify their conduct in accusing your petitioner of insanity. That some strange female was introduced to your petitioner, in the lunatic asylum, dressed (on the Coronation-day, June 28, 1838, of Her Majesty) in paltry imitation of our Sovereign, to induce your petitioner to believe that it was Her most Gracious Majesty."

Any one might say all this was a delusion, but he was prepared to prove it. The petitioner proceeded to say—"That the officers, both medical and otherwise, assisted in this nefarious scheme. That your petitioner has suffered the torture of mind and body through other acts and filthy observations and questions too disgusting to be mentioned, from the officers, medical and otherwise. That your petitioner has prayed to, and humbly requested those officers to desist from their torments. That your petitioner has been chained down and been brutally assaulted by the keepers of the lunatic asylum for having ventured to expostulate upon such ridiculous and wicked conduct. That on Tuesday, the 4th of September, 1838, one of the partners waited upon your petitioner, and with the resident doctor of the establishment, concocted an agreement for your petitioner to sign, requiring him to leave this country for Antwerp, and to be allowed 3*l.* per week, to be paid to him as necessity might require, through a man who was to follow your petitioner in the double capacity of keeper and servant, until your petitioner's partner should think proper to withdraw him. That your petitioner, on Sunday, the 9th of September, 1838, was again visited by his two partners, accompanied by the resident medical officer, and again urged to sign a dissolution of partnership, which your petitioner, after six months' horrid incarceration and torture, was induced to sign the following agreements for the dissolution of the co-partnership:—

"'September 8, 1838.

"'In consideration of Mr. Lewis Phillips retiring from business on the 11th of September, Messrs. Ralph and Samuel Phillips undertake to satisfy Mr. Lewis Phillips for his share of the property left in the business, by paying him a weekly sum for his maintenance.

(Signed) "'Ralph Phillips.
Sam. Phillips.

"'Witness, James Phillips (resident doctor).'

"'We hereby agree that the partnership which has existed between us be dissolved, and publicly announced in the Gazette of Tuesday next, the 11th of September, to the following effect, that Mr. Lewis Phillips is retiring, and that the business is to be hereafter carried on in the joint names of Ralph and Samuel Phillips.

(Signed) "'Ralph Phillips.
Lewis Phillips.
Samuel Phillips.'

"'September 8, 1838.

"'That your petitioner was immediately, the same hour that he signed the deed, conveyed in a cab with the keeper to Saint Katherine's Docks, and there placed on board the Antwerpen, bound for Antwerp, at which place your petitioner remained about a fortnight. That in consequence of the keeper not being able to read a letter addressed to him, your petitioner was enabled to peruse it, and discovered that another scheme was again concocted to bring your petitioner back to his late place of torture. And your petitioner, in consequence, made his escape, and returned to his mother in England, who with your petitioner's partners assisted to recapture your petitioner in the following manner:—His mother invited him to her house, at 28, Oxford-terrace, Edgware-road, to arrange amicably with his partners, but in lieu of which other parties came, and attempted to seize your petitioner. That your petitioner having endured so much misery, was fully prepared for any design which might show itself; and seeing the manœuvres, immediately forced his way out of the house, crying 'Murder,' the keepers hallooing out 'Stop thief.' That your petitioner did since commence proceedings against all parties; but, on obtaining the advice of Mr. Chitty, special pleader, on the statement of facts, your petitioner found himself without remedy, as care had been taken to keep your petitioner in confinement and without money until the time, as expressed in the Act of Parliament of the 48th and 49th Section of the 41st chapter of 9th George IV., viz., 'which prescribes and directs that such actions must be brought within six calendar months next after the fact committed.' That your petitioner has been obliged to suffer great privations, and has since that time been deprived of all benefit in his business, and that his partners, previous to your petitioner's giving notice of trial, became bankrupts. That your petitioner has been obliged to gain his living in attorneys' offices, and is at present employed in the capacity of clerk to a solicitor. That your petitioner is able to detail further facts relative to other individuals confined in lunatic asylums, and fully to give such information most important to this honourable House in framing a Bill to meet fully the circumstances of any case, not only as to pauper lunatics, but as to the treatment of parties supposed to be insane or otherwise.

"And your petitioner will, as in duty bound, ever pray.

"Lewis Phillips."

Mr. Phillips brought an action against Dr. Warburton, but was advised by Mr. Chitty that, on account of some delay, he could not succeed, and he then indicted all the parties for a conspiracy, when his solicitor was paid 170*l.* to compromise the matter rather than it should come before the public. All this had taken place under the existing Commission. Mr. Proctor, one of the Commissioners, saw him in the asylum, but said that he could do nothing for him, as he must be visited three times before he could be released. He did not mean to attach any blame to Mr. Proctor, but such was the state of the law. It appeared, also, that a poor woman who was confined in Dr. Warburton's asylum, complained to Mr. Proctor, upon the occasion of one of his visits, that she had been ill treated; but as soon as he had turned his back, one of the female attendants told her husband that the poor woman had been making complaints to the Commissioner, when he took her to an upper part of the house, and beat her most cruelly, Mr. Phillips being able to hear her screams. On his return the man said he thought he had cured her of complaining to the Commissioner. Such cases, however, were of constant occurrence. No inquiry had been instituted since 1836, and it was time that the House of Commons should cause inquiry into the subject to be again made, with a view to better legislation. Why, then, were they pressing on this Bill at so late a period of the Session? Some portions of it he had before said were good, particularly that clause which enabled a Commissioner to visit a single patient: but he was not prepared to give such unconstitutional power to individuals as the Bill proposed; neither would he consent to make a Commission permanent, until he was satisfied that it had done its duty during the last twelve or fourteen years that it had been established. There was also a petition from William Bailey, who had been confined for five years, and who he believed to have been perfectly sane. He would not trouble the House by reading his petition; but there was the petition of Captain Digby, who said—

"That he was forcibly and violently taken out of his house, situate at No. 12, Beaumont-street, Marylebone, at night, on Sunday, May 5th, 1844, and conveyed to Moorcroft-house, Hillingdon, near Uxbridge, a private lunatic asylum, kept by the Messrs. Stillwell. That the Committee of the Metropolitan Commissioners in Lunacy visited this asylum on the 27th of May following, to whom your petitioner represented and explained the falsity of the imputation of insanity which had been made against him, and which could be confirmed by two clergymen of eminence, and all his friends with whom he lived in daily intercourse. That the Commissioners on three special visits examined your petitioner, at an interval of a fortnight between each visit; but your petitioner was not released until eight weeks subsequent to those visits, and during the interim was debarred all manner of intercourse and correspondence with his friends, and his request to see his solicitor, Mr. Pemberton, was refused him, and he was kept in confinement during the space of sixteen weeks and two days. Your petitioner, therefore, humbly prays that, previous to any further legislation on the subject of lunacy, a Committee may be appointed to investigate the operation of the present laws, and the conduct of the Metropolitan Commissioners in Lunacy, with the view of ensuring that no Englishman be deprived of his liberty without full and sufficient cause."

Dr. Conolly, of Hanwell, who had seen Captain Digby, was of opinion that he was not insane; and perhaps the best proof of his sanity was the fact that he had been induced to sign a cheque just before he left the asylum, which immediately on his release he stopped the payment of. Those cases frequently occurring at police offices would show the nefarious attempts that were often made to imprison some people upon the ground of insanity. The following occurred in September, last year, at the Worship-street office:—

"Police sergeant, James Finn, 37, attended before Mr. Broughton, by direction of Superintendent Johnson, to show cause why he had immured his wife, Ellen Finn, in a lunatic asylum, she being at the time in a state of perfect sanity. The case was first brought under the notice of the magistrate about a week ago, when the sister of the alleged lunatic appeared before him, and stated that her sister was married to the sergeant in Ireland about eighteen years ago, and that they had contrived, by their mutual industry, to accumulate a sum amounting to nearly 200*l.*, which had been deposited in the husband's name in the savings' bank. That they had lived very happily together until about twelve months ago, when repeated ruptures took place between them, and the sergeant taking advantage of some trivial acts of violence on her part, which his ill usage had provoked, had, by fraudulent means, induced two medical practitioners to certify that his wife was insane, and had thereby procured her incarceration in Dr. Warburton's Lunatic Asylum, at Bethnal-green, where she was then confined. The applicant added, that she felt so completely satisfied as to the entire sanity of her sister, that she had caused her to be carefully examined by a medical man of high eminence, whose voucher she had obtained to that effect. The applicant then handed the magistrate a certificate signed by Dr. Riding, of Euston-square, stating 'that he had seen Mrs. Finn, and, after a careful examination of her case, he was unable to detect any signs of insanity, and considered her therefore not a fit subject for confinement. Upon hearing the above statement, and perusing the certificate, Mr. Broughton directed Henley, the chief usher, to proceed to make inquiries at the madhouse, and, if the woman's statement was well founded, to request the attendance of the medical officer of that establishment, in order that the case might be thoroughly investigated. Mr. Phillips, the medical officer of the asylum, subsequently attended before Mr. Broughton, and stated that Mrs. Finn had been received into the house on the authority of a certificate, signed by two surgeons, that she was of unsound mind; but Mr. Phillips felt bound to express, as his own decided opinion, that she was perfectly sane, and was not a fit object for admission into the asylum. Having the attestation, however, of two medical men to the contrary effect, they were compelled to detain her, but were ready to deliver her up to her friends on being legally authorized to adopt that course. Mr. Broughton made some strong remarks upon the monstrous state of the law, which enabled a person, at his own wanton caprice, to consign another to such a dreadful species of confinement, and gave orders for the attendance of all the parties before him. Saturday the wife, whose address and demeanour were perfectly quiet and collected, was examined at some length by the magistrate, and stated that in consequence of a disagreement that took place between them, her husband, about four months ago, placed her in the same asylum; but after remaining there a week he consented to her liberation, and agreed to allow her 10*s.* a week, on condition that she went over to her friends in Ireland. She accordingly proceeded to that country, but returned after a short stay, and besought the defendant to receive her into his house, and it was in consequence of those importunities that she was again incarcerated in the madhouse. In answer to the complaint the defendant said that his wife had been guilty of the most outrageous acts of violence, having more than once attempted to stab him, and her whole conduct justified his conviction that her intellects were impaired. She was examined by two respectable medical men, one of whom had attended her for nine months; and, as they both testified to that fact, he considered himself justified in the course which he had pursued. Mr. Broughton, the magistrate, expressed it as his opinion that the woman was in as sane and rational a state as any one in court, and he considered that the defendant had been guilty of extreme cruelty and injustice towards her. Fortunately, however, through her sister's interposition, she was now restored to her friends, and he wished to know what arrangement the defendant was willing to make for her future maintenance. The defendant said that he had been paying 15*s.* a week to maintain her in the asylum, and he was willing to allow her half that sum if she would promise not to come near or molest him again, as he had been in danger of losing his situation through her turbulent conduct. Holland, the summoning officer, said that at the expiration of her first confinement in the asylum, Superintendent Johnson, with great kindness, received her into his house, in the hope of being able to effect a reconciliation with her husband; and her conduct during the week she remained there was uniformly good and perfectly rational. After some further discussion, it was finally agreed that the defendant should allow her 8*s.* per week, besides providing her with some clothes and other necessaries, and the parties then left the court."

Now, as to the subject of expenses, that had certainly been increasing since 1828 in a most extraordinary manner. The following was an account of moneys received and paid by the clerk of the Metropolitan Commissioners in Lunacy:—

At a meeting which took place in the city yesterday, the noble Lord the Member for Dorsetshire (Lord Ashley) said that he had been a Commissioner for twelve years; he admitted the horrors of private asylums, and said he would rather be a pauper in the Hanwell Asylum than be placed in a private asylum where his friends would have to pay for him. Why did not the question naturally arise, if the noble Lord had been a Commissioner for so many years, and had been cognizant of the evils which existed in private asylums—why was there no attempt to remedy them before? He (Mr. Duncombe) knew that he had no chance of success; but he should have the satisfaction of knowing that he had done his duty in exposing the defects of the existing law, and calling for a searching and rigid inquiry. The hon. Member concluded bymoving "That all further proceedings should be postponed until next Session; and that, previous to any further legislation on the subject, an inquiry should be instituted into the state of the existing law."

Mr. V. Smith was willing to rest his opinion that the Bill should not be postponed upon the arguments of the hon. Member for Finsbury, which all went to prove the necessity of most active and careful supervision, and the sooner that was effected the better. The Bill did not propose to continue the Commission under which the evils complained of had existed, but to elect a new Commission altogether, with new powers, new duties, and new salaries; and he thought, of all the proposals in the Bill, that of a permanent Commission ought most readily to receive the approbation of the House. An admixture of medical men and barristers on the Commission was the best course that could have been adopted. The hon. Gentleman then passed a high eulogium on the exertions and talents displayed by Lord Ashley as Chairman of the Lunacy Commissioners, and expressed a hope that he would continue to exercise the duties of that office when the new Commission was formed.

Lord Duncan was disposed to support the Amendment; but as it was then four o'clock, he moved the adjournment of the debate.

Sir J. Graham hoped the hon. Member for Finsbury, and the noble Lord the Member for Bath, would be satisfied with the discussion which had already taken place, and would consent to take the sense of the House upon it, with the understanding that the House should go into Committee on Monday.

After a short conversation, Lord Duncan withdrew his Motion,

The House divided on the Question, that the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question:—Ayes 66; Noes 1: Majority 65.

Committee postponed to Tuesday.
House adjourned to five o'clock.

POOR LAW AMENDMENT (SCOTLAND).] The Order of the Day for going into Committee on the Poor Law Amendment (Scotland) Bill, was read.

On the Question that the Speaker do now leave the Chair,

Colonel Rawdon expressed a hope that before the House went into Committee, the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for the Home Department would state the intentions of the Government with respect to the clauses affecting the rights of Irish paupers, as the right hon. Gentleman had been requested to do by a deputation of the Irish Members.

Sir J. Graham said, the best course to adopt would be to proceed with the Bill in Committee until the clauses referred to were arrived at.

Mr. Hume said, if the Members for Ireland objected to particular clauses of the Bill, he should object to the measure altogether. The Government had already postponed a great number of measures, and he was anxious that they should adopt the same course with regard to the present Bill. It was so large, and contained so many provisions, many of them most uncertain and undefined, that it would, if carried, prove to be only an Act to create dissension and litigation. The time would be very brief until next Session, and in the mean time the measure might be fully and fairly considered in Scotland, and many important and necessary amendments suggested. The opinion prevalent among the best informed parties in Scotland was, that if the Bill passed into law in its present form, another measure to amend it, would, as a matter of course, have to be introduced next Session.

Mr. Ewart agreed altogether in what had fallen from his hon. Friend who had just sat down. The measure was one which all parties united in saying could not be satisfactory or successful, and the probability was, that if it now became law, it would have to be amended next Session. The delay would also produce the advantage of enabling those hon. Gentlemen who, though Members for Scotland, had unfortunately the misfortune not to be born in Scotland, to become better acquainted with the subject.

Mr. P. M. Stewart said, he would go a step further than the two hon. Gentlemen who had last addressed the House, and would ask the Government to apply their own principle to the Bill which they had relied on when another Scotch question had been before the House a few nights ago, and to allow their decision upon it to be regulated by the petitions that had been presented from Scotland on the subject. Though the measure was one which was of vast importance to Scotland, he believed there had not been a single petition presented in its favour, whereas numerous petitions from all persons interested in the state of the Scotch poor had been presented against the Bill. All these petitions concurred in representing the great necessity of legislation on the subject of the poor of Scotland, whereas they, at the same time, described the Bill introduced by the Government as an ill-digested and an ill-adapted measure. They stated, that it would not allay the discontent existing against the present measure, and that the poor had no interest whatever in it. That it would have the effect of overloading the Statute Book with eighty clauses, most of which would, as a matter of necessity, be repealed next Session. In fact, the measure was one which would do no good to the poor man, while it would have the effect of throwing him beyond the pale of the Constitution.

Sir J. Graham, in answer to the appeal of hon. Members opposite, would begin by stating, that if ever a measure had been brought before the House which was completely divested of party character, it was the Scottish Poor Law. It was also admitted that the law for the relief of the poor in Scotland, was in such a state as to require immediate alteration. There had been full inquiry, and ample materials for immediate legislation had been obtained. The Report of the Commissioners had been before the public for twelve months, and had been under the consideration of Government during the whole of that time. If, therefore, the measure then before the House could be called crude and imperfect, the fault must lie with the Government who had prepared it, as ample time and full materials had gone to its preparation. Besides, the principle of the measure had been approved of by a very large majority of that House. Neither could it be said that the House had been taken by surprise. The Bill was introduced at an early period of the Session, and the second reading was postponed in order that the counties of Scotland might, in their county halls, have full opportunity of taking the matter into consideration. Neither was the absence of petitions in its favour any evidence of its unpopularity, as people seldom petitioned in favour of Government measures which were generally approved, except their success seemed doubtful. The principal petition against this Bill was from one parish which was peculiarly situated, and which, it was feared, would be affected by the 16th Clause; but that cause of petition was removed, as the clause was to be postponed. He thought that, as the principle of the Bill had been fully discussed and decisively affirmed by the House, and as they had made considerable progress in Committee, there was not any valid reason existing for its further postponement. If any hon. Member wished again to have the opinion of the House, the best plan would be to let the Bill pass through Committee, and take a division on the third reading.

Mr. Lockhart expressed his satisfaction that the right hon. Baronet had not postponed the progress of the Bill.

Mr. Gibson Craig, as they had so far advanced in Committee, could not conceive the expediency of postponing the measure. His own opinion was, that, generally speaking, the Bill had been favourably received in Scotland, although certainly some alterations were called for in it.

Mr. Hastie objected to the further progress of this Bill. The poor in Scotland were never so well looked after as in the present time. Therefore, in postponing the measure, no possible harm could result.

Viscount Duncan trusted that the House would at once go into Committee, when there would be an opportunity of adopting any improvements. He had always found that the Lord Advocate had been willing to listen to suggestions for the improvement of the measure. The 16th Clause had been so much amended, as to remove nearly all the objections to it.

Mr. E. Ellice confirmed what had been stated by the hon. Member for Paisley (Mr. Hastie). The condition of the poor of Scotland within the last eighteen months, compared with what it had previously been, had been made much better by the discovery of the actual state of the law with regard to them. This was not a party question here or in Scotland; he had conversed with men of all politics upon it, and had met with but one opinion—that, if the Bill passed in its present shape, it would be likely to produce very mischievous effects. The allegations of the petitions against it were, that it would deprive the poor of their present remedy against the heritors, and subject them to an irresponsible power in order to put the law into effect. He gave the Government credit for honest intentions; but they only knew the state of the people of Scotland, through a prejudiced channel; with respect to Scotland, they appeared to be subjected to some influence that blighted all they took in hand. Had their measures with respect to the Scotch Church, or any other of their measures with regard to Scotland, been satisfactory to the people? Had they not all met with general condemnation? On a subject of such vast importance, ample time ought to be given for consideration; as the knowledge of the provisions of the Bill extended, the objections to it would increase. He hoped the Government would postpone it till next Session; if not, he hoped other parties in another place would prevent it from passing this year.

Mr. Duncan was constantly receiving communications from Scotland stating objections to the measure. He felt that it was only common justice that it should be postponed to another Session. He had not received a single letter in favour of the Bill. He was anxious for an amendment of the present law; but, instead of this imperfect measure, they had better wait until next year, when they could get a well-digested Bill.

Mr. Hastie opposed strenuously the progress of this Bill, in consequence of the injustice inflicted upon the Irish residents in Scotland by it. By one of the clauses an Irishman was prevented getting a settlement in Scotland; although he might have spent his youth and his manhood in that country, such an industrious man, engaged in manufactures for twenty or thirty years, was liable to be sent to Ireland at a moment's notice. Unless the right hon. Baronet abandoned the clause, he trusted that his hon. and gallant Friend would move that it be committed that day three months. If his hon. Friend did not do so, he certainly would.

Mr. T. Duncombe said, that it was rather singular that only on Wednesday evening last, one of the reasons urged by the right hon. Baronet the Secretary for the Home Department, for the rejection of the Scotch Universities Bill was, that no petitions had been presented in favour of it; but to-night, in answer to the remark that there was no petition in favour of this Bill, he replied, that it was not customary to present petitions in favour of Bills, and, above all, of a measure like the present. He happened to know that there existed a very strong feeling against the Bill in many parts of Scotland, and more particularly in several of the large towns. He had no connexion with Scotland; but petitions had been intrusted to him against the measure from many places, some of which had thousands of signatures attached to them. The Scottish labouring classes generally considered that the Bill would place them in a worse position than before, it being altogether destructive of that right of appeal in their favour, which had only of late been discovered to exist.

Colonel Rawdon said, that almost every Scotch Member who had spoken on this subject had opposed the Bill, and on the part of the Irish Members there was a united action against it. He begged to move that the House go into Committee on the Bill that day three months.

Sir J. Graham would put it to the gallant Member whether, as the objections he and other Gentlemen near him advanced, were objections to details, it would not be better and fairer to discuss them in Committee? He had stated to a deputation of Members, who called upon him at the Home Office, and of which the one, that he intended to make considerable modification in many of the clauses objected to, adding, indeed, that he was not prepared to say, the principle of the Bill as to industrial residence ought not to be entirely abandoned.

Mr. Hamilton thought it well to go into Committee; but certainly, when the clauses in question came before them, they would meet with his opposition unless considerably modified.

Viscount Duncan hoped the Members for Ireland would suffer them to go into Committee, on the full understanding that the clause more especially objected to by them, should, in Committee, undergo thorough investigation.

Lord Claude Hamilton should feel bound to oppose the progress of the Bill, unless some much more distinct statement was made by the Government as to the obnoxious clauses.

The House divided on the Question, that the words proposed to be left out stand part of the question:—Ayes 90; Noes 38: Majority 52.

On Clause 35,

Mr. Gladstone called the attention of the House to the expediency of rendering the law clear, that farm labourers and domestic servants were not liable to be rated to the poor. The present mode of rating generally in Scotland was most inquisitorial in its operation. The parochial boards who managed it were not in any way bound to secrecy, and they fixed upon each person precisely such a rate as they pleased. That system might be made the means of much oppression, and, though he was not prepared to say that the English system, as a whole, was applicable to Scotland, he would throw out that that system might be adopted as the basis of an improved system for Scotland. He hoped that the Lord Advocate would indicate his intention of taking the whole law of rating in Scotland into his serious consideration; for he was persuaded that it would be found impossible to allow it to remain in its present state.

The Lord Advocate said, with reference to what had been stated by his right hon. Friend the Member for Newark, he would admit that there were difficulties in the way of assessment; but he had not selected the mode of assessment referred to in this Bill; it had existed for two centuries and more, and he had not ventured to abolish it. He had had representations from many parishes, assuring him that the system had acted satisfactorily. He had by the provisions of this Bill given to every parish the power of escaping from the difficulties of the present system, and had endeavoured to remove the existing inequalities.

Mr. Poulett Scrope thought, that if any alteration were made in the law of assessment, it should be permanent in its character. Otherwise they should not interfere with it.

Mr. Hume said, if there was ground for postponing a Bill, the want of power to explain how the many cases of difficulty that would arise were to be met, was ground sufficient. The only effect of this measure would be to unsettle that which was now settled. Under this Bill a Scotch proprietor, having 30,000*l.* in the English funds, would be liable to be assessed to the Scotch poor-rate on the full amount of his income; the effect of this would be to drive people from Scotland.

The Lord Advocate said that, under the law as it at present stood, all personal property was liable to be assessed to the relief of the poor in the parish in which the possessor of such property resided; and the Bill now before the House did not, therefore, effect any alteration in this respect in the existing law.

Mr. Escott complained that funded property was liable to assessment. The practice operated most unjustly, and he hoped that it would not be allowed to continue under this Bill.

The Lord Advocate replied, that by the law of Scotland, as it now stood, parties were liable to be assessed to the whole amount of their property; and he did not propose to make any alteration in that respect.

Mr. Escott said, suppose a man worth 10,000*l.* a year were to live in lodgings, for which he paid 30*l.* a year, how could he be assessed in the full amount of his property?

The Lord Advocate apprehended that in such a case the party would escape altogether from the rate.

Mr. Ewart wished to know upon what principle the assessment was to be made; that was, how the income of the party was to be ascertained? was it to be by a return, as in the case of the Income Tax, and if not, in what way?

The Lord Advocate said, under the existing law, parties were appointed to estimate the incomes; and in this respect, also, he left the law as he found it.

Mr. Duncan contended that these were matters which should be decided by the Legislature, and not left to local parties afterwards.

Sir J. Graham said, that the hon. Members who contended for a uniform mode of rating were generally opposed to this Bill. The construction of the Act known as Mr. Poulett Scrope's Act, was to introduce into England one uniform and inflexible system of rating. The Act was very well intended, and was supported by the Government; but it had been found, to a great extent, inoperative, owing to the practical difficulties in the way of carrying it into general execution. It was found that, however desirable that there should be one general system of rating throughout England, yet that, from local circumstances and local peculiarities, it was impossible to carry that object into effect. Circumstances varied in different localities. In Liverpool, for instance, no occupier under 10*l.* a year was assessed to the relief of the poor; in other places no occupier under 5*l.* But by the operation of the Act to which he had referred, every occupier to the extent of 40*s.* a year would be rateable for the poor. The Bill now before the House proposed no alterations, unless to remove doubts in peculiar circumstances. He admitted the difficulties with respect to rating property in Scotland; but unless they adopted the inquisitorial system adopted with respect to the Income Tax, he thought it was much better to leave this to be governed by local circumstances, and the local knowledge of the parties. He had been informed by the hon. Member for Greenock, that in that great commercial and maritime town the mode of rating by "means and substance," had been for a long time in operation, and had given the greatest satisfaction.

Mr. Baine could not concur in the objections to this clause. He was sure that the adoption of a uniform rate of rating would cause great dissatisfaction in Scotland. It appeared to him that the parochial boards would be desirous to give every satisfaction to the ratepayers, and to adopt that mode of assessment most to the benefit of their constituents and the objects they had in view. With regard to the means and substance system, it had been followed in Greenock for a number of years; the one-half being levied on lands and houses, and the other half on the means and substance of the inhabitants other than lands and houses, being very nearly the second plan described in the Bill. The assessment in Greenock was considered in Scotland to be a heavy one, being 6,000*l.* in a town with 38,000 inhabitants. If that mode of assessment were given up, the effect would be to relieve the wealthy inhabitants at the expense of the middle and poorer classes. It was said that it was hard to assess funded property; but, for his part, he could not see the hardship. The mode of assessing on the means and substance was this. A pretty numerous committee was appointed, and among them there were always some who knew something of the circumstances of each individual in the town. They accordingly fixed a sum at which they estimated each man's income, and sent him an intimation of the sum on which they proposed to assess him. If he felt aggrieved, he complained to the board, and they appointed a day on which they would hear the reasons of appeal; and in almost every case an amicable settlement of the matter was come to. They did not assess on incomes below 40*l.*; and on incomes between 40*l.* and 100*l.* they assessed on a reduced scale. On all incomes above 100*l.* the rate of assessment was equal. The best proof that this system worked well was, not that it had existed in Greenock for twenty-eight years, but that all his communications from Greenock were in favour of preserving this mode of assessment.

Mr. Escott observed, that if a parish adopted that first method, funded property would not be included in "means and substance," and would not contribute.

Mr. Darby would support this clause, chiefly on the ground of the statement made by the hon. Member for Greenock; as he thought they ought not to alter a mode of rating which was found to have already worked well.

Mr. Edward Ellice was clearly of opinion that every man ought to contribute to the poor according to what he had—that was, according to his means and substance in the general sense of the term; and he congratulated Greenock that there the people seemed to meet without squabbling to provide decently for the poor. But did it follow that the same sensible course would be followed in every parish in Scotland? There did appear to be a strange obstinacy on the part of the Government—he did not use the word in an offensive sense—in adhering to the term "means and substance" without explaining what was to be understood by the phrase, and how they were to be got at. A meeting had been held in the county of Fife, where resolutions were passed generally favourable to the Bill, but concluding with a strong protest against inserting the phrase "means and substance" without defining its meaning. He objected also to the operation of the measure in cases where resident proprietors were to be taxed upon their whole means and substance, wherever situated, for half the support of the poor in the parish. Take his own case. He was the only resident proprietor in the parish where he resided. The effect of the Bill would be that he would be taxed for one-half the support of the whole poor of the parish, though his property did not amount to one-tenth of the parish. Such a mode of assessment was a premium on absenteeism. He did not say he should leave the parish; but if he did so, he might say, without any egotistical feeling, that his absence would be an injury to the parish.

Viscount Duncan said this discussion showed that it was easier to find fault with a measure than to bring forward a good one; but he thought the House ought to leave the clause as proposed by Her Majesty's Government. The local boards would decide which of the three modes of assessment they would adopt; and then there was a safeguard against the operation of local prejudices by the controlling power lodged in the board of supervision.

Mr. Redington complained that under this clause an Irishman coming to Scotland would have his whole property rated, while, by the 72nd Clause, they refused relief to Irish paupers. The learned Lord Advocate stated that he did not wish to alter the law of Scotland with regard to the rating; he wished that he would be equally unwilling to alter the law of Scotland in regard to the mode of acquiring a settlement.

Mr. Poulett Scrope said, that his Act was declaratory rather than legislative, and that it had improved the system of rating throughout the country.

Sir J. Graham said, that it was the uniform mode of rating proposed in the Act in question, which had proved a failure.

Mr. Edward Ellice said, that as the words "means and substance" were not sufficiently defined, he should divide against the clause.

The Committee divided on the Question, that the clause stand part of the Bill:—Ayes 92; Noes 32: Majority 60.

Clause agreed to.

On Clause 53 being put,

Viscount Duncan proposed as an Amendment, to add the words on "parochial boards" to this clause. He did not propose this in any feeling of hostility to the Bill, but with the view of allaying public feeling in Scotland against the board of supervision. He felt this so strongly that he should take the sense of the Committee on the subject.

The Lord Advocate thought that it would not promote any public object to adopt the Amendment of the noble Lord. He thought it would destroy the independent action and the efficiency of the inspector to have him dependent on the parochial board; but on any reasonable ground of complaint they could always apply to the board of supervision, who would dismiss him. He, therefore, must resist the Amendment.

The Committee divided on the Question, that these words be there inserted:—Ayes 11; Noes 81: Majority 70.

LANDLORD AND TENANT (IRELAND) COMMISSION — PROPOSED MEASURES.] The Earl of Devon said, he had been in communication with Members of the other House of Parliament, and he found it would be impossible to carry into a law during the present Session of Parliament measures which he intended to introduce founded on the Landlord and Tenant Commission, over which he had the honour of presiding. One of those measures proposed a short form of lease to be executed between the parties, at a reduced expense in every respect, the Government being favourably disposed towards reducing the stamp duty. That was a short Bill; but there was another Bill upon the subject of ejectment and distress, and, in fact, embodying nearly all the recommendations of the Commission. He hoped to be able to introduce both at an early period in the next Session of Parliament.

Lord Brougham approved of his noble and learned Friend's intention to postpone the measures to which he had referred. He should have been glad, however, to have seen the first, which was described as a short Bill, introduced.

The Marquess of Clanricarde hoped the measures referred to would be brought in upon the earliest opportunity next Session, and allowed to rest for a short period, so that there might be time to ascertain the opinion of the Irish people with reference to those measures. He had long entertained a conviction, which every year had become stronger, that in legislating for Ireland, Parliament ought to consult the feelings, habits, and perhaps even the prejudices, of the Irish people.

The Earl of Wicklow was sorry that the Bills were not to be brought in this Session, as he thought they should necessarily accompany the Landlord and Tenant Bill. He should now expect the noble Lord the Secretary for the Colonies to announce his intention of postponing the latter measure till next Sesson.

BREACH OF PRIVILEGE.] Order of the Day for the attendance of Peter Taite Harbin and John Harlow read.

John Harlow called to the bar, and examined by the LORD CHANCELLOR.

Where do you reside, Mr. Harlow?—At 9, Leicester-square, my Lord.

Have you brought an action lately against Thomas Baker?—Yes, my Lord.

For what have you brought that action; for false and malicious language uttered before the House of Lords in giving evidence before a Committee of this House?—Yes, my Lord.

Have you anything further which you wish to say on that subject?—The only thing I wish to say is that I am very much injured in my affairs by the statement which was made, and which is entirely untrue.

You are aware that a complaint has been made to this House of your conduct in bringing that action?—Yes, my Lord.

And the complaint is, that it is a breach of the privileges of this House?—Yes, my Lord.

Do you wish to say anything on the subject?—I was not aware that it was a breach of privilege at the time the action was commenced; and I hope your Lordships will give me the means of seeking redress, since I have been so materially injured by that statement.

By Lord CAMPBELL; Then you still mean to go on with the action?—I am not at this moment prepared to say that I will.

You are not prepared to say you will not?—No, my Lord.

By the Earl of RADNOR: Are you prepared to say that you have suffered in your business in consequence of that statement before the Committee?—Yes, my Lord, I can prove it; and the statement was perfectly false.

The LORD CHANCELLOR: You may withdraw from the bar, but you must not leave the House.

Peter Taite Harbin was then called to the bar, and examined by the LORD CHANCELLOR.

What are you?—An attorney and solicitor.

Were you the attorney employed by the last person to bring this action?—I was employed by the last witness to bring an action.

Against Thomas Baker?—Yes, my Lord.

For defamatory language?—For defamatory language, my Lord.

Are you not aware that those words were spoken in giving evidence before a Committee of this House?—The Report states that the words were spoken in a Committee before this House.

And that was the foundation of the action?—It was, my Lord.

Do you wish to say anything further on that subject? You are aware that a complaint has been made of your conduct in that respect; do you wish to say anything to this House on the subject of that complaint?—I would observe, my Lord, that the instructions were laid before an able counsel, who advised on the subject, before proceedings were taken, and the action has been brought in consequence of that opinion.

Are you going on with that action?—It is at present pending.

Do you mean to proceed with that action?—I have not had instructions to discontinue it. Perhaps you will allow me to state, my Lord, that the information which Mr. Baker gave before your Lordships' Committee was perfectly unfounded, inasmuch as the conviction has been quashed, and in the Report Mr. Baker stated that he should be able to prove what he stated to be true.

The LORD CHANCELLOR: That is wholly immaterial to the present question. You may withdraw; but you must not leave the House.

The witness then withdrew.

The Lord Chancellor: I now move, my Lords, that John Harlow has been guilty of a Breach of the Privileges of this House.

Lord Brougham:* My Lords, in rising to address you on what I consider to be beyond all comparison the most momentous question that has been mooted since I have had the honour of a seat in this House, I cannot avoid casting my eye back with some satisfaction over the four years during which I had the honour, by the gracious appointment of my late Sovereign, to preside over the proceedings of your Lordships; and I account it in every view, both general as regards you, and personal to myself, a matter of great gratulation to me, and possibly, I might say, a source of grateful feeling toward your Lordships, that during those four years, though there were many occasions on which the privileges of this House might be asserted, and, although upon no occasion did I shrink from the discharge of my duty when I felt it imperative on me to support to the utmost those just privileges, yet that no occasion ever presented itself on which I was called upon, as Speaker of this House, to make such a Motion as that which it has now fallen to the hard lot of my noble and learned Friend to make—that Motion for interfering with the strong hand of mere force, or, to mitigate the expression, under cover of our privileges interfering by the strong arm of power with the ordinary administration of justice. I rejoice that I, presiding in the highest court of law—that I, presiding amongst the judges of the last resort in all suits, as well criminal as civil—was never called upon to put from the Woolsack a question which should interfere with the ordinary course of the law, and should by the interposition of this House, and with the arm of power, stay the ordinary administration of justice. My Lords, the subject of Parliamentary privilege was not new to me when I entered these walls. I had the opportunity during a long life passed in Parliament, and upon more than one occasion, of assisting in the discussions which took place in the House below, on what was called, and justly called, the great case of Parliamentary privilege, raised in the discussion affecting Sir Francis Burdett. My Lords, I argued that case at your Lordships' bar, and I will only observe, in passing, that there was another felicity which I now find I enjoyed, and of which I was not at the moment sufficiently aware; for though I argued that writ of error at your bar, though I contended against the privileges asserted by the other House, though, pro virili parte meâ, I attacked them, I was not called upon as this attorney is now called upon, to suffer for venturing as an attorney to do his duty to his client. I was permited by that lower House, albeit a Member of it, as your Lordships do not seem disposed to suffer this attorney, to perform my duty to my client, and for half the day I impeached their privilege: I treated with contempt the arguments asserting their usurped right, I exposed, I assailed, I laughed to scorn the assumption of power without right on which that privilege was made to rest. If there be any ground for proceeding here to commit this attorney for doing his duty by his client, in bringing this action for his client, there was then the same power, which the Commons' House of Parliament might have used. They were supposed to have been generally well aware of the extent of their privileges; they were ever abundantly prone to assert them, from the time downward of Holt, who said that they "kept a hawk in the shape of their Serjeant, whom they were obliged to gratify by flying him forth to take his prey from time to time:" with all their disposition in every age of their existence, from the earliest to the latest day, down to the year 1810 (the writ of error was not brought till 1817); notwithstanding that the question was brought before a rival House of Parliament, and that rival House was thus made party to the dispute, nay the judge of its privileges in the last resort; notwithstanding all these feelings, and precedents, and principles, the other House of Parliament suffered that question to be argued, and they allowed me to take my seat every day as a Member of their body, after my assault upon their privileges, without a whisper being urged against my professional privilege when it was used in defence of my client. And this brings me to the body of the argument in the case before us; and I will begin by admitting, whoever may deny them, I am not here to deny that the real just privileges of both Houses of Parliament—for whatever belongs to one House belongs also to the other—are past all doubt. It is the privilege of Parliament—I won't say that it is to be gathered from the assertions or the assumptions of either House—but the privilege of Parliament, whoever may deny it I will not, is this—and it must ever be guarded most sacredly by Parliament, as necessary for its very existence, and much more so to enable either House to perform its duty—its privilege is to remove all obstruction to the discharge of that duty—to liberate any Member of either House respectively by the vote of that House, if he shall be constrained in his person; to inquire, and for that purpose to call all persons before them, treating such persons when called, as witnesses would be treated in all courts of justice ; to examine all who shall be called before them, and if they will not answer, to commit them—if they prevaricate, whether they are examined on oath here, or not upon oath, as in the other House, to commit them for that prevarication—I will add, not for the purpose of punishing perjury, because there is a punishment awarded to that offence by the law, to be inflicted after trial and conviction ; moreover, to break open repositories for the purpose of obtaining evidence, to break open outer doors, to enforce the attendance of witnesses, and to compel witnesses to attend, and when attending, to answer. All these things are clear privileges, together with the absolute freedom of speech to the Members of both Houses — which, by the by, is a statuary freedom, though by a declaratory, not an enacting law—the freedom from arrest absolutely, and from all personal constraint. All these are the privileges which I admit to be sacred, imprescriptible, inalienable, and absolutely necessary ; and it is on that absolute necessity for the very existence of Parliament that I ground my clear and unhesitating admission that such privileges do by law exist. But when I am asked to go a step further, and concede to each House the power claimed by both—claimed inferentially by the other House, and insinuated by this, though clearly asserted by neither —a claim by each to have the power of determining, from time to time, what are its privileges ; and from time to time, as occasion may arise, to declare what constitutes a breach of those privileges ; and to inflict punishment on the parties who shall be declared to have violated them : —here I must needs pause ; for this is taking into our own hands a judicial power ; nay, more, it it is making ourselves lawgivers, declaring our own laws, each House for itself, and without the intervention of the other House, or of the Crown. In the second place, it is making ourselves prosecutors for a breach of the law which we have thus made for ourselves, and when we ourselves are the only parties to the act of legislation. Thirdly, it is making ourselves judges without jury, to try the offenders declared such by ourselves ; so that we, ourselves, proceed by ourselves, for offences, declared by ourselves to be committed against the law made by ourselves for ourselves, and without the assent of the Crown. And, lastly, we are condemning as well as trying parties brought before ourselves, for injury done to ourselves, against a law made by ourselves ; and, as if that did not fill the measure of this lawless power, as I call it, or, at all events, this irresponsible power, we take upon ourselves the execution of the sentence we ourselves pronounce upon our own judgment of condemnation ; following our own prosecution for injury done to ourselves, against our own laws, made at our own good pleasure, by our own mere authority, for our own behoof, but which laws are never promulgated till the case has arisen, and till we make a rule to meet it. This is the final measure of the cup of power, which you call privilege, as you fill it to the brim, nay, even to overflowing ; and it is against this that I most humbly, but most confidently take leave to protest ; it is against this that I enter my solemn dissent, not merely on behalf of the Crown, not on behalf only of the other branches of the Legislature, but on behalf of the people of England, and on behalf of their most sacred liberties, do I enter my protest ; and suffer me to add, without offence, that I enter this protest on behalf of another body—I don't mean merely the lawyers and the judges, and the law and the administration of justice in Westminster Hall, but on behalf of the highest court of law in this land—on behalf of the ultimate court of error—of that court at whose hands is sought remedy and redress from all other courts, if any wrong has been done or error committed —on your behalf, my Lords, and for your sake, who are the hereditary judges of that supreme tribunal, I protest against this anomalous, and inconsistent, and selfish, and repugnant power, which is sought to be assumed and exercised by this House —the highest tribunal of justice in this country—which ought, above all, to set an example of not violating the law, and of not erring against the eternal principles of universal justice. My Lords, you are now called upon, for the first time in the history of Parliament since I have been a Member, and I believe almost the first time in any period of your history, to interfere directly—I say, directly—and with the mere force of your own privileges, to drag a plaintiff before you, and to stop an action lawfully commenced in one of the courts of Westminster Hall, for an injury alleged to be sustained by our fellow-subject, who is a subject also of the Crown. Former privileges were of another complexion. Sir Francis Burdett brought his action against the Speaker for taking him into custody because he refused to obey the order of the House. That was a very different case from the present. Here is a case of civil right which attaches to an individual; it is a right vested in that individual; it arises out of a wrong and a grievous injury inflicted on that individual, upon a complaint in which we have been informed, for we must take the whole together, that his character has been falsely and maliciously slandered by some other person; that he has been greatly damnified by this slander; and that for this same slander he has sought redress, as by law he might, by bringing an action in a court of law against the party so injuring him, in violation of the law. What are your Lordships now called upon to do? To pronounce that the action thus brought is a breach of the privileges of this House! You have examined the party at the bar; you have been driven to an act of no ordinary magnitude; you have gone the strange, the unheard-of length, of making a party disclose what his case at law is, when, for aught that appears, except from the statement of the opposite party—for the declaration does not say that the words were spoken before the Committee—the action may have been brought for words spoken anywhere else. The party called to the bar would have had a full right to answer, "I wish to try my action before a judge and jury, and if your Lordships will allow me, I had rather not disclose my case in the presence and hearing of my opponent." How would your Lordships have liked it, if you had brought an action against a tenant or against an opposing landlord, and if, even before a plea had been pleaded and the action brought to issue, you had been compelled to declare before us, in your adversary's hearing, what you meant to do? With that, however, I have finished; upon it I will say no more. I have protested generally against it, saving for myself a full argument on the other parts of the case. You now say that it is a breach of your privileges to go on with the action. If the plaintiff threaten to proceed—nay, for aught I know, if he says, as he has said at your bar, that he does not intend to stop the action—nay, even if his attorney shall have said that he has at present no instructions to discontinue it—you will straightway vote it a breach of your privileges, and you will instantly send the client and his attorney prisoners to Newgate. That is what this House is about to do, and to do for the first time. The House so acting is in a very different position from the Commons' House on more than one remarkable point, inasmuch as the other House does not examine any man upon oath, whereas you always do; inasmuch as they have no judicial character, and you are judges in the last resort and in the highest tribunal; and inasmuch as this very action may be brought ultimately before you in your judicial character on a writ of error. Yet you, the court of the last resort, say that you will not permit the plaintiff to prosecute this action, you will not allow him to lay the foundation of his coming before you as a court of appeal. You say, "We will not permit you to go on, we will punish you if you go on with this action in an inferior court, from which, in case of error, lies an appeal to us." There is another difference. I can well understand a person consistently saying in another assembly, "We will not allow an action to be brought; we will stop it by main force, because an action brought will be referred to the Judges; from their judgment there may be an appeal, and it will at last come to the House of Lords, so that we shall commit our privileges to a rival assembly, and hand over our rights to a rival candidate for civic and judicial honours; we will not, therefore, part with our power; we will not give the staff out of our own hands; we will not leave it to the Judges to determine what they believe to be our privileges." But this does not apply to you. If you are afraid of the court below, an appeal lies to yourselves. If in that court there should be evidence admitted that ought to have been rejected, or rejected that ought to have been admitted; if the sentence be in any particular unjust or illegal; if the judge's charge to the jury be in violation of the law; if his sentence on the verdict be unjust; if in any way whatever you think you have not had justice below, a writ of error brings the case here, and then, whether you will or not, then, although you may be parties to the suit, ex necessitate, you must be the judges; and ex necessitate, you have in your own hands the power of ultimately righting yourselves, which the Commons never can have; on the contrary, if aggrieved in the courts, they must resort to you, and trust in you for redress. So far, then, as to the material points of difference between the two Houses of Parliament, with respect to stopping the action. It is said, that you cannot carry on those investigations which are essential to the proper discharge of your functions, unless your witnesses are protected. And no doubt they must have protection—they must be protected, going, stopping, and returning, from all violence and from all illegal interference. They must feel, too, that they can give their testimony without the slightest apprehension of danger to themselves, from any violence, from any unlawful act; but I am yet to learn that it is at all necessary they should be protected against the ordinary course of the law, if in giving their evidence they have committed an infraction of that law under which they do not cease to act when they enter your gates. It is said, how fruitless to examine a witness, if he is liable for the evidence he gives, to be questioned in a court of justice. But does that prevent him from speaking the truth? If you compel him to state that which slanders his neighbour, and his neighbour brings an action, provided what your witness has spoken be the truth, he must get a verdict. He, therefore, runs no risk, is liable to no danger, for the law is his protection. Only see how marvellously inconsistent is the argument, that, in order to give him protection, this House must stop the action, and commit the parties to it. A witness swears before a Committee of this House to certain facts, and swears falsely; though your Lordships do not prosecute him, he is still liable to be indicted for perjury by any two individuals who heard him give his evidence, though they should be the doorkeepers or any other attendants on your Lordships' House. Such is the end of the doctrine of protection. The protected witness is indicted for perjury; —what is the issue upon the indictment? The truth or falsehood of the thing sworn. And what is the issue here, if a justification be pleaded to the action for slander? The truth or falsehood of the thing sworn; the very self-same issue; the one being a civil case, an action for damages; the other a criminal case, a prosecution for perjury. So much for the consistency of the advocates of privilege. No man pretends to deny, or even affects to doubt, that your protected witness, who must on no account be vexed by an action for slander, may be harassed with an indictment for perjury, presented by any one who chooses to buy sixpenny-worth of parchment, and send a bill before the Grand Jury at the Westminster Session-house. But then it is said, that is not a private suit, it is a prosecution at the instance of the Crown. But the name of the Crown is used, and that is all. The real party is the private prosecutor. But, suppose it is, as this mere quibble would describe it, a Crown prosecution, and at the instance of the Attorney General himself, how does that mend the matter? Is it, indeed, come to this? Are our boasted privileges only good against the people? You have no privilege as against the Crown. Your "spear of privilege," as Sir F. Burdett called it, falls impotent from your grasp as against the Crown; but, as against the subject, as against the private plaintiff in an action, as against the people, it is omnipotent. It has been considered that the great advantage of privilege was to shield the people against the Crown; but now it turns out that it is impotent for the people and omnipotent for the Crown; that it is powerless against the Crown, and all-powerful against the subject. Then I pray you to consider a little what the consequence of all this will be. I don't mean to menace you with any formidable consequences; I speak only of logical consequences in the argument of strictly legal consequences. You commit the party and his attorney. But does that put an end to the action? Or you refuse the defendant leave to plead, can that stay the proceeding? No such thing; the action remains; the action goes on. I find that a gentleman of the bar, who is not named, gave an opinion under which this action was brought. He gave sound and lawyer-like advice; but for doing so, he is liable to be visited, as well as the plaintiff and his attorney, with the displeasure of your Lordships' House, and sent to prison. Still the action is not stayed, even for an hour. It goes on as much as before; Parliament is prorogued; another attorney is found to carry it on, unless Parliament should meet in order to incarcerate him; and even if it did, another would still be found; but if Parliament imprisoned one after another, until they had all the attorneys of the country in gaol, the action would still be in court, awaiting the decision of the Judges. You say you should not allow the party to plead, because it leads to the discussion of the case before the Judges. But suppose there is no plea, then there will be interlocutory judgment signed as of course for want of a plea; a writ of inquiry will issue also of course; the sheriff must act according to the exigency of the writ, and the damages must be assessed; and if a writ of error be brought, that will only bring the cause here, and here proceed it must, for we can hardly proceed against ourselves for breach of our own privileges. Non meus hic sermo—this is what has been stated by Mr. Justice Patteson and the Lord Chief Justice in the arguments on Howard's case. I have such high legal authority for saying that that is the law of the land, and that such will be the consequence of your proceeding. Therefore, you have but one course—face it, follow it; do all or do nothing. Don't be powerful by halves, any more than just by halves. Don't have your privileges any more than your rights by piece-meal. If you have a privilege, defend it—if you have a right, exercise it; and what does that mean?—why, that you should commit judges and jury, and at once set Parliament in irreconcilable conflict with the courts of justice. Irreconcilable, but also mortal conflict! For it will be your privileges and yourselves that will be involved in destruction! But in the tempest which you shall have so bootlessly, so recklessly, so senselessly conjured up, there will, through its turbulence, and its lowering darkness, shine forth a light to which all good men's eyes will be directed for comfort and for safety; not the lurid light of privilege which the law had extinguished, but the pure and steady light, tainted by no corrupt vapours, blown about by no factious blast, the light which the law derives from the untarnished sources when justice flows. Then we shall no longer have to perform the easy task of being both parties and judges—then we shall no longer stand upon that bad eminence to which our demerits have raised us, of being the only power in the country which is itself to determine in its own favour—then we shall be no longer the only party who will not appeal to that law which is equally for the protection of all, or appeal to those Judges who administer the law equally for all. And, after all, seeing that one branch of the Legislature ever appeals to the law, no one supposes this resort either lowering to its dignity, or perilous to its rights. The Sovereign is always judged by the law, and surely his existence as part of the Constitution is at the very least as ancient as yours. I know that antiquaries have held that there was great doubt if a Parliament existed, as it is now constituted, before the period of legal memory. There was the Wittenagemot of Saxon times, and, more recently, the Colloquium, which, after the Norman Conquest, obtained the French name of Parliament, a name that abroad expressed not a legislature, but a court of justice; yet antiquaries have maintained that it was not until the period of Henry III., some years after the great charter was passed by the Barons, not by the Commons, that there was what was then called a House of Parliament. Be that as it may, for I disdain to inquire into such trifles, there was, at all events, a King. No one doubts that. If the Houses of Lords and Commons existed not, there was a Crown, and although the ancient Executive Government of the country possessed much influence and great power, yet I do not find that the Sovereign then ever arrogated to himself anything like the privilege which you pretend to. So it was under the Plantagenets, and afterwards under the Tudors and the Stuarts. So it is to this day. If a subject has been encroached upon by the Crown, the subject goes before the Judges, who administer the law, and the Sovereign meets him without any pretence of a privilege to supersede the law. If a wrong is committed against the Crown, the Crown prosecutes, by its law officers, and abides the decision of the Judges of the land. Then why should not Parliament deem itself as safe with respect to the rights and privileges it claims in going before the Judges as the Crown does, which never dreamed, from the beginning of the time when it exercised any privilege, of adopting any other course than that of going like a subject before the Judges! The Crown is constantly in the habit of issuing Commissions before which witnesses were examined, who require protection as much as those coming before Committees of this House; indeed, Committee and Commission are convertible terms. If, as before a Committee, a witness examined by a Crown Commission should slander his neighbour, and in doing so perjure himself, that neighbour may indict him for perjury, or bring an action for reparation in damages: and I should like to know whether there ever existed an Attorney General, not excepting Noy, nay, supposing Noy to have been Attorney General when Jefferies was Chief Justice, he never would have dreamed of saying in such a case, as is said in this, "Unless our witnesses are protected we cannot carry on our inquiry, and instead of going before the Judges we call upon you, the Sovereign, to proceed upon the privilege which is vested in you, and commit those persons who have dared to bring this action against a witness examined by your Royal Commission." No man was ever insane enough to give such advice even in those days when the prerogative of the Crown was exercised in its strongest and most oppressive form. Protect your witnesses, we hear it said; this is the whole end and object of the present ill-omened proceedings. I too say, protect your witnesses; but protect them lawfully—protect them as all courts protect theirs. No power can stop an action brought against a witness in any of the courts, and yet it is quite as necessary to protect witnesses in other courts as in this House. We hear it currently said, that privilege is the protection of Parliament against the Crown; and it arose, certainly, in times very unlike the present, when the Sovereign and the Commons were in habitual conflict. But now the Crown and both the Houses are ranged as regularly on the same side of every question. If Pym, and Hampden, and Coke, the leaders of the Commons—for the claims began at first with the leaders of the popular party in the House of Commons—if these illustrious patriots had lived to see the time when there is no longer any apprehension of the Crown; when the Crown and the Ministers, and both Houses of Parliament, all understand each other, and work together so harmoniously; when the only possible cases of privilege must be, not against the Crown, but for the Crown—for Parliament and the Crown in this particular, have become one and the same—we should not have heard the Cokes, and the Pyms, and the Hampdens asserting these claims. The stern voice of prerogative, it has been well said, has now given place to the soft whisper of influence, and all privilege of Parliament insures to the use of the Crown. But admit that Parliament, as against the Crown, might have recourse to these high privileges, I may remind your Lordships of the excess to which the Commons carried their success in the year 1641, when they established the claim. In that year the Commons clothed themselves with the power of seizure and committal—the next year, 1642, an order was issued by the single House of Parliament, without the Crown's consent, without the consent of the House of Lords, for marshalling the trained bands; another order was issued for raising two troops of horse, to defend the Parliament, to protect its privileges; and a third order was issued to levy money for the sake of protecting those claims of privilege which were made by the Commons themselves. But the trained bands and the troops of horse were used not only to protect the privileges of the House, they were used to put down the Lords, to imprison the King, and to overthrow the monarchy by destroying the King's person; the votes of money were to afford the sinews of war, in order to secure privileges which the House grasped at in defiance of all the privileges and all the rights of the Crown. Nor is it unfruitful to the present purpose when we are asserting our privilege on the ground of former precedents, that is, of former acts done by our own House, that we should recollect what kind of things those precedents would justify. If I were to read to your Lordships all the privileges which you have still existing in your Journals and your Standing Orders, some of you would start to hear them recited. I shall not go back to the time when, I find that an honest gentleman from the Principality of Wales, in the reign of James I., of learned as well as high prerogative memory, for presuming to say that the King's son-in-law, the Elector Palatine, was "good man Palsgrave," and that his daughter, the Princess Elizabeth, married to the Elector, was "good wife Palsgrave," was sentenced without trial to be carried on a horse from Cornhill to Charing-cross, with his head to the tail of the animal; to be placed twice in the pillory; to be fined 5,000*l.*, and to be imprisoned in Newgate for life. But I will go to more recent times. After the Revolution of 1688 and 1689, you made Resolutions, in the shape of Standing Orders, that the servants of Members of Parliament of both Houses should have the same privilege of exemption from action and arrest which their masters had. Another Standing Order, never repealed or modified, is that no person shall touch the goods or chattels of a Member of this or the other House of Parliament, taken in execution; they are all to be given up to the owner, the privileged debtor. Then there is an order of this sort: lives of living Peers may be written; but there is an Order, made 7th George I., declaring it to be a high breach of the privileges of this House in any man to presume to write the life of a deceased Peer, without leave of his heirs, executors, or administrators; and I recommend this Order to the attention of my noble and learned Friend, who is understood to be writing the lives of Lord Chancellors, and who is a mighty stickler for our privileges on the present occasion. There are other privileges which I might mention, and which show how inconsistent we are towards the public, and how little we enable the people whom we punish for offending, to know what law of privilege they may safely break, and what law they must obey. The Orders of this House prohibit the bringing an action or suing out any process against any of its officers as well as against any Peer. I would recommend your Lordships to consider with yourselves, necessary as it is, that we should be protected against the Crown, whether we should not have as good protection from the law of the land in its ordinary exercise, as from any privileges, that is, any power, we can exercise. Suppose the Crown to be against you, now, when in the words of the great writer I have already quoted, "the stern voice of prerogative has yielded to the milder whisper of influence, and the blandishment of authority has supplied the place of power." The advocates of privilege say this power is absolutely necessary. What will you do with the Crown against you? My answer is, you will do better with the Judges, as against the Crown, than with your own privileges as against both. If the Crown is against you, I defy you to carry your high privileges against it. There is a Standing Order on your Journals, which is never executed, giving your Lordships the power of directing all constables and justices (that is, magistrates), to do what you please in suppressing riots in the vicinity of the House, and in keeping the streets clear. Suppose there is a riot, and suppose the justices, who are the King's justices, not yours, decline to obey. Or suppose you find you cannot, though willing, suppress the riot, with the assistance of all the constables in Westminster and all the justices in Middlesex, what will you do? You say, indeed, "justices and others," and others comprises commanders of the forces. Will you send a message to my noble Friend (the Duke of Wellington) and to the Horse Guards? If you send to my noble Friend a petition or a suggestion, he may think it right to send some troops to suppress the mob; but I do not so clearly foresee what he would do if you sent an order. He would know very well that the troops are not the troops of your Lordships, or of the other House of Parliament; and he would further know that he is not your servant, but the Sovereign's. My noble Friend knows that it was in the interference of the Parliament with the army, which belonged to the Crown, that the great rebellion had its origin; and he would be the last man to follow such an example, or help you to follow it. But happen what may—come the assault on us from what quarter it may—I think it most clear, my Lords, that we need have no fear from the Judges of the land; they are, amongst all men, and all bodies of men, the first to show a respect to this House; and they will be the last to shrink from supporting your privileges when the acts of your servants or officers are discussed in courts of justice. Let us ever bear in mind the respect due to the law, of which we are the highest depositaries; ever be ready by the law to have all our rights decided, by its oracles all our claims adjudged. To the courts where it is purely and calmly admitted, let us all willingly resort for justice, and never lose sight of the good maxim, that in keeping together the great social pyramid of England, its strength resides not in the apex of the Crown, not in the region of the people, not in the broad low base of the multitude, but in that middle region in which justice is administered according to law by lawyers; and above all, by lawyers who are no politicians. It is because they are chosen out and set apart as a peculiar people, zealous of good works of justice—it is because politics never cross the threshold of their courts, or interrupt the calm and equable tenor of their way—it is therefore that your Lordships ought to rely with confidence on the protection which your privileges will receive at the hands of those who administer justice in our tribunals.

The Lord Chancellor said, that he quite agreed with his noble and learned Friend, in considering that this question was one of very great importance; but before he addressed himself more immediately to the question itself, he wished to point out to their Lordships the situation in which he stood with respect to it. A noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond) presented a petition from a party, complaining that an action had been brought against him in consequence of evidence given by him before a Committee of their Lordships' House. It was their Lordships' pleasure that the question should be investigated, and a Select Committee was appointed to inquire and search for precedents; and he (the Lord Chancellor) felt it to be his duty, in consequence of that preliminary step, to bring forward the Motion which had given rise to the present discussion. In the position which he occupied in their Lordships' House, and in the character with which he was clothed, he now stood forward to lay before their Lordships, plainly and shortly, without adverting to any inflammatory topics, what was the real position of this question, what was the nature of it, and what the authorities upon which it rested, in order to enable their Lordships to come to a decision, and, after they had duly considered this important question, to pronounce what course they ought to pursue. His noble and learned Friend had referred to several precedents, which were, he (the Lord Chancellor) admitted, of a very absurd and extravagant kind. Undoubtedly both their Lordships' House and the House of Commons had, under the show of supporting their privileges, conducted themselves, upon more than one occasion, in a very arbitrary and tyrannical manner. The Sovereigns of this country, at different periods, had also abused their power and authority; and their Lordships would give him leave to add, that the people themselves, when, by accidental circumstances, clothed with authority, had in more than one instance exercised that authority in an arbitrary, tyrannical, and despotic manner. But these were not the questions for consideration at present. The question was, whether, under the circumstances of this case, they ought to interfere by interposing their authority to stop proceedings against this individual. The first thing to consider was, what were the circumstances and facts of the case? This witness was summoned before a Select Committee appointed to inquire into the Law of Gaming, and the state of that law at this moment. He was compelled to attend by their Lordships' summons, and to answer the questions put to him. There was no pretence to say, as far as appeared at present, that those answers were not fairly and honestly given. The proceedings of the Select Committee were not open to the public; but in consequence of the evidence, some way or the other, having been made public, this action was brought against the witness. His noble and learned Friend seemed to doubt whether there was sufficient evidence in what had been stated at the bar to-day to show that the action was brought to recover damages in consequence of the evidence given before the Committee. That question was investigated by the Committee appointed to search for precedents; and every Member of that Committee was satisfied that the action was brought to recover damages on account of the evidence so given, and on account of that evidence alone. They had the declaration before them; they compared that declaration with the evidence given before the Committee. It corresponded in every word; it corresponded in questions, and it corresponded in answers. It did not consist of one or two phrases, but of a long succession of testimony, consisting of questions and answers so as to render it impossible for any man to doubt that the action was brought upon the evidence so given before their Lordships' Committee. He apprehended that it was not necessary to call the parties to their Lordships' bar, except for the purpose of giving them an opportunity to explain their motives, and set themselves right before their Lordships. The parties had not thought proper to adopt that course; therefore it was that he (the Lord Chancellor) made a Motion that the parties had been guilty of a breach of their Lordships' privileges, in order that when their Lordships should have received everything that could be advanced upon the subject, they might come to a decision upon that point. It had been said, and very correctly said, both now and on former occasions, that no action of this kind could be maintained in the courts of Westminster Hall; that when the plaintiff got into court, he must be nonsuited as a matter of course; and therefore his noble and learned Friend (Lord Brougham) suggested how unnecessary it was for their Lordships to adopt these proceedings, and how unwise it was not to allow the law to take its course. The answer he (the Lord Chancellor) would give to this was short and simple. Here was a witness compelled to give evidence; an action was brought against him; he (the Lord Chancellor) would assume, that when the action was brought into court, it must naturally fail, and he would assume that the plaintiff would have to pay the costs of the defendant. But every one acquainted with the administration of justice, and of the course of proceeding in the courts of law, knew that, notwithstanding the verdict or judgment was in the plaintiff's favour, and notwithstanding he might be entitled to recover costs from his opponent, yet the consequence might be, that he would still have to pay a considerable amount of costs out of his own pocket. He would be entitled only to what were termed taxed costs, and those taxed costs fall very short, in the course of the administration of justice, of the real costs the party is put to; so that this individual, who had been compelled to come before the Committee to give evidence, was to be dragged into a court of justice in a case in which it was admitted he must succeed, and after going through all this disagreeable proceeding, he must be saddled with costs, it might be to a large amount. But this was only part of the case. Everybody who knew anything about the administration of justice, knew how many accidents there were liable to happen in the progress of a cause. His noble and learned Friend had said that the party must plead to the action. Allow that he did; if he made any slip in that pleading, the consequence would be, that he would have judgment against him, and the whole costs of the suit must be defrayed out of his own pocket. So that their Lordships had not only to consider that this was a case in which, if the cause were tried, the defendant must necessarily be successful; but that it was one in which he would possibly, even in that case, have to pay extra costs; and further, it was a case in which he was exposed to the risk of some slip or error being committed in the course of the pleadings, and in consequence of which he might not only have to pay all his own costs, but the costs of the party who had dragged him into court. Was it not of importance to protect a witness who was placed in such a situation? What could be of more importance to their Lordships, in the exercise of their important powers as legislators, than to appoint a Committee to inquire into facts, to serve as the foundation of their legislation? It was their Lordships' constant practice to inform themselves by a Select Committee of those facts necessary in order to guide them in their proceedings. How important was it that they should secure the first and great duty of a witness—to speak the truth; to do which he ought to be unfettered: but if the witnesses called to give evidence before their Committees knew that they were subject to an action for what they stated, what practically must be, in the long run, the result? Why, most surely this—that they would only answer those questions which they felt themselves obliged to answer, and would withhold everything they were not obliged to disclose: whereas the interest of good legislation was, that everybody called as a witness before a Select Committee should answer fully and freely, and, to the extent of his knowledge, disclose all he knew for the benefit of their Lordships and the country, as a guide to their legislative proceedings. His noble and learned Friend seemed to consider it most extraordinary that they should interfere for the purpose of stopping a suit in a court of justice. It did appear to him (the Lord Chancellor) very whimsical, considering the station of his noble and learned Friend, his eminent attainments, and the fact that he had himself presided at the head of the Court of Chancery, that he should have urged an argument of that description. Why, it was the everyday practice in the Court of Chancery to interfere for this purpose. If any action was brought against an officer of the Court of Chancery, in the performance of his duty, for anything done by him under the direction of the Court, does the Court of Chancery allow a court of law to take cognizance of the matter? No; the course was, for the parties so proceeded against to apply to the Court, and the Court immediately proceeded to stop the suit—an injunction was immediately issued; and if the party dared to proceed after an order had been given to discontinue the suit, he was immediately put in prison, and remained in custody until he conformed to the authority of the Court. But his noble and learned Friend said that if the party were taken into custody, the action might still proceed. Was that the case? By no means. The moment the Court interposed the action ceased; and if either of the parties, solicitor or plaintiff, disobeyed the injunction, both were put into prison. The action could not go on without agents. The action slept, as a matter of course, until somebody undertook to carry it on; and if any other person did so interpose to carry it on, then another step would be taken, and he would be proceeded against, and the same consequences would follow. This was analogous to the course their Lordships were now pursuing, and which was now under their Lordships' consideration. If the parties were, by their Lordships' order, which was now prayed for, ordered not to proceed further, and if they nevertheless did proceed, they would be committed for contempt. They might be so committed in the first instance, for having instituted the action. If any other parties took up the action, the same consequences would fall upon them. This proceeding of the Court of Chancery was not confined to the officers of the Court, but extended to any one not regularly an officer, who acted under the authority of that Court. Whenever an action was brought against a receiver appointed by the Court for anything done by him in his character of receiver, the instant an injunction was prayed for it was issued; and if not obeyed, the party was immediately committed. The same case applied to Commissioners of Revenue. Then his noble and learned Friend asked, what were they to do next if the parties persisted? Let the parties try whether their Lordships would do anything. The Court of Chancery always knew what to do; and what did the Courts of Common Law do? They allowed the authority of the Court of Equity, and so would those courts of law allow this authority which was about to be exercised by their Lordships. Then his noble and learned Friend supposed that there would arise some conflict of jurisdiction between the House of Lords and the courts of law; but there was no occasion for any such conflict. All that their Lordships had to do was, to commit the party for contempt; and if any attempt were made by the party to bring the case before the courts of law, those courts would acknowledge the privilege of their Lordships' House under which the committal was made, and would immediately refuse to interfere. It was possible that some warrant might issue, and that there might be some defect in it; and that the Court of Queen's Bench might, on account of that defect, interpose and run counter to their Lordships' authority and to their jurisdiction; but the Court would not run counter to their Lordships on principle. Lord Denman said, in the late case in the Court of Queen's Bench, that the Court was bound to respect the privileges of Parliament, and that the Judges had no right to inquire into the authority of the House of Commons; every court and both Houses of Parliament were the guardians of their own privileges. If there were entered upon the record the allegation of privilege, and if there were no defect in the warrant, in that case the court would not interpose. What did Lord Denman say? He said, that there had been an excess—not an excess of authority in issuing the warrant —but that the officer had done what the warrant did not justify. Their Lordships need not be afraid that the courts of justice would interfere with their privileges; becaus it was one main principle of the courts of law, that the privileges of the two Houses of Parliament were to be respected, and that the courts could not call them in question. His noble and learned Friend (Lord Brougham) had said, that the privileges of the two Houses of Parliament were identical. He (the Lord Chancellor) admitted that his noble and learned Friend was perfectly correct in that proposition. But what did the House of Commons do the other day? They were precisely in the same condition as that in which their Lordships were. They had interfered to prevent a party proceeding against a person who had been examined before a Committee of that House; and the only reason why the House of Commons had not proceeded was, that the parties had submitted to the authority of the House, and the action was discontinued. But if their Lordships went upon precedents, there was the case of Biggs, which occurred in 1768. A justice of peace, by the order of their Lordships' House, dispersed a mob that had collected around the House and disturbed their Lordships' proceedings: he seized an individual and carried him before the Lord Mayor; an action was brought against the magistrate for false imprisonment; that gentleman brought his case before their Lordships; the plaintiff and his attorney were summoned before the House; the plaintiff submitted to their Lordships' authority, whereupon he was discharged; but the solicitor choosing to persevere in the action, he was committed to Newgate; but after having been confined nine or ten days, he also submitted to the authority of the House; he was then brought to the bar, reprimanded, and discharged. It was much the same in what was called the Umbrella Case. A good deal of ridicule had been thrown upon that case on account, he believed, of the absurdity of its name; but it was perfectly the same case as the rest in point of principle. It was an Order of the House, that no person should be allowed to appear below the bar with a stick or umbrella. A person came with an umbrella. The messenger removed it to its proper place. The party brought an action in an inferior court, and the House protected the messenger. Why? Because what the officer did was done in the discharge of his duty. All the cases went to show that the authority now claimed to be exercised had been exercised in former times, and had always been considered an essential privilege of this House; and that, whenever called in question, it was necessary that their Lordships should assert their privileges, otherwise they might by some be considered abandoned, and thereby they would be lost. His noble and learned Friend seemed to consider that their Lordships should only interfere when there occurred some direct obstruction to their Lordships' proceedings. That was not the principle upon which Parliament or the courts of law had proceeded. They had proceeded upon quite a different principle. If anybody libelled a court of justice with respect to any past matter, what was the course pursued? The court committed the party for contempt. He could cite the authority of Lord Hardwicke in support of that proposition, that any libel upon a court of justice subjected the parties to committal for contempt. The same was said by Chief Justice Willes, in the case of a prosecution against Hamilton, a publisher; he said, that although it was not a direct obstruction, yet it was a contempt, and the party must be committed. The other House of Parliament laid down the same doctrine as was established by the courts of justice, by the King's Bench, and afterwards by the Exchequer Chamber, on a writ of error being brought in the case of Sir Francis Burdett, and, indeed, in every other case. There was no direct obstruction to the House of Commons in the Burdett case. It was a publication by Sir Francis Burdett, which was considered to be a libel by the House, and, therefore, a breach of its privileges. When the case came before the King's Bench, they expressed the same opinion, and it was afterwards ratified and confirmed by the Exchequer Chamber. There appeared to him (the Lord Chancellor) no foundation whatever for the distinction which his noble and learned Friend had drawn, that there must be a direct obstruction to the proceedings of their Lordships' House, in order to justify their interposition, and in order to consider whether their privileges had been violated. Constructively, he considered anything which brought disrespect upon their Lordships' House, or which checked their proceedings in any way, was a breach of the privileges of the House, and called upon their Lordships to interfere. He had now stated this case to their Lordships as shortly and clearly as the circumstance would admit. He had stated the facts out of which it had arisen, and what the consequences would be if their Lordships allowed a witness examined before their own Committee to be proceeded against, with a view to have his evidence called in question in a court of justice. He had shown their Lordships that the courts of law acted upon the same principle to prevent parties from proceedings in such actions; and he had referred also to precedents which would justify their Lordships in interfering in the present case. He had done this in order that their Lordships might have the power to take the whole of the circumstances into consideration before they came to any determination upon the subject.

Lord Brougham explained, that he had not meant to deny that by precedents their Lordships had the power. All the drift of his argument went to deny the expediency of the House ever interfering except to stop positive obstruction. With respect to the analogy of the Court of Chancery granting an injunction, as quoted by his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack, that had no bearing upon the present question. The reason the Court of Chancery stopped proceedings was, because the case tried was in that court, which would not allow another court to interfere with its jurisdiction. And why? Because the Court of Chancery would itself do justice and give redress. If the House would say that they would give this party redress without going before a jury, that would be a different case altogether.

The Lord Chancellor: The party might come to the House and complain; and if the House was satisfied there was good ground for complaint, it would be competent for their Lordships to give him leave to proceed. In Chancery the case was referred to a master.

Lord Campbell said: It had been said that great unpopularity would attach to any proceedings which their Lordships might think proper to take in the maintenance of their privileges. Of that unpopularity he was ready to take his share; for he had no hesitation in declaring it to be his firm belief, that a firm and constitutional course in the vindication of the privileges of Parliament was most certain ultimately to turn to the benefit of the people. His noble and learned Friend who first addressed their Lordships was extremely eloquent in defence of the course which he advised their Lordships to take; but his arguments did not touch the real question at issue; they seemed rather to be directed towards the great object of bringing their Lordships' privilege into disrepute. The House should bear in mind, and the public ought to be aware, that their Lordships had no personal interest at all in the power they were now asserting. It was not for immunity, or for personal distinction or advantage, that they were contending. It appeared to him an incontrovertible fact, that if the privilege of Parliament was not productive of beneficial results, it could not, for a moment, be supported or prolonged. He thought he was able to show to their Lordships that the maintenance of those privileges which that House had so long enjoyed was, and had been, productive of good to the community at large. His noble and learned Friend had, he thought, somewhat unfairly referred to what had been done in former ages; but if he would examine Floyde's case, to which he had referred, he would find that it was not a case of privilege, but a case of prosecution before the House of Lords, as a court of justice, for a misdemeanor, where the party arraigned was heard, was found guilty, and received sentence. The House of Commons at first wished to establish their own power as a court of record; but their Lordships asserted their privilege as a constitutional tribunal: they tried the case, decided it, and passed the sentence that was required: the House of Commons consenting to leave the case in their hands, under a protest, leaving "the rights and privileges of both Houses in the same state and plight as before."* His noble Friend, in commenting upon privilege, had observed that the same rights and privileges were claimed for the goods and servants of Members of Parliament. Now in former times that privilege was indispensable, and therefore was exercised; but since it had become unnecessary, Parliament had voluntarily renounced it. In former times Parliament seldom sat above a few days. In the days of the Plantagenets Parliament met more than once a year, but only for a few days at a time, at Christmas, Easter, and Pentecost. They were summoned to meet at distant places, at York, Winchester, or Westminster: the Members of Parliament had this privilege, and regard being had to the manners and customs of those ages, unless the same privilege extended to the horse a Member rode, and to the servant who attended him, it would have been impossible for either Peers or Commoners to discharge their duties as Members of Parliament. But now no such privilege, in respect to the goods of a Member of Parliament had been claimed or exercised for 200 years; and with respect to the servants of Members, both Houses had unanimously agreed, by an Act passed, he believed, in the 10th year of George III., that that privilege, being no longer necessary, should be abandoned. So that in former times even there had not been that abuse of privilege such as his noble and learned Friend had described. But then his noble and learned Friend would have their Lordships confine the summary exercise of their jurisdiction to cases where there was physically an obstruction to their proceedings. But was that the principle acted upon by the two Houses of Parliament, or by the courts of law? Suppose, after a case had been determined in Chancery, and judgment had been pronounced, the losing party should say that the Lord Chancellor had received a bribe, and had acted corruptly in pronouncing sentence; or suppose that he, this losing party, were to publish a libel, stating that his antagonist had committed perjury, or had suborned witnesses—would not either of these cases obstruct the administration of justice just as much as would an insult offered in the very face of the court? But upon that subject he (Lord Campbell) would refer their Lordships to the emphatic language of one of the greatest Judges who had ever adorned the Bench, he meant Lord Ellenborough, in a case where the same doctrine was contended for, that it was only in cases of positive obstruction that the two Houses of Parliament had a right to interfere. That noble and learned Lord asserted the privileges of Parliament to be necessarily independent, as requisite for the personal security of Members, and also as involving the right of self-protection. Lord Ellenborough said—

"I do not mean merely the power of resisting acts and wrongs committed against itself, for poor and mean would that Parliament be which did not possess the power of resisting affronts, or of resenting injuries that might be offered to it. This is an inherent right in Parliament. The right of self-protection necessarily implies the possession of means to render that self-protection real and efficient; but such privilege would not be sufficient to effect the object for which it was granted, if it did not extend to the power of punishing insult when offered. Can the Parliament, therefore—can either of the two Houses of Legislature, be so utterly devoid of the means of enforcing their own dignity, as not to be able to punish in a summary manner a contempt that can be reached at once by the courts of law, which possess much less dignity?"

That was the opinion of Lord Ellenborough. He (Lord Campbell) had now to draw the attention of the House to the fact, that lately the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, that institution of which his noble and learned Friend near him had so much just reason to be proud, had determined that this power belonged, as of inherent right, to the Legislature of every Colony under the Crown. In a recent case they had held that the sitting power belonged to the House of Assembly of Jamaica, and had decided that the power of committing for contempt inherent in every assembly possessing legislative authority, whether the proceedings stayed tended indirectly to obstruct, or directly to bring their authority into contempt. That had been decided by the Supreme Court of Appeal from the Colonies. But then his noble and learned Friend had gone so far as without qualification to say, that their Lordships ought to submit any case in which their privileges were called in question to the decision of the Judges, so that if an action were brought against his noble and learned Friend himself, for anything he had said in his place in the House of Peers, their Lordships ought not to interfere, but allow the case to be submitted to a judge and jury. He (Lord Campbell) protested against that doctrine; for he was persuaded that neither this nor the other House could effectively fulfil their legislative functions if it were suffered to prevail. His noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack had shown that the two Houses of Parliament were the sole judges of their own privileges. The Constitution placed that confidence in them, and believed that it would not be abused, and that they would only declare and preserve those privileges which their ancestors possessed—that they would not seek to enlarge them, or to raise up new ones. Trust to the Judges, said his noble and learned Friend (Lord Brougham). He (Lord Campbell) had the greatest respect for his noble and learned Friend who spoke the other evening upon this subject (Lord Denman), whose absence on this occasion he much regretted; but he could not consent to make him arbitrator of all their Lordships' privileges. He had, he repeated, a high respect for him; but he had a still higher respect for the aggregate wisdom of the House of Lords, and for the aggregate wisdom of the House of Commons upon such questions. But this question of privilege might come not before Lord Denman, but before some most respectable puisne Judge who had never sat in Parliament; who knew nothing of Parliamentary law, of Parliamentary custom, and to whom privilege would be altogether new and strange. It might happen that their Lordships' privileges would have to be pronounced upon by a man who had passed his life in drawing pleas, declarations, and demurrers, and not only that, it was by no means improbable, in case his noble and learned Friend's doctrine were suffered to prevail, that the question of privilege might be brought before some inferior tribunal, before a county court or a borough court. Their privileges, then, might come to be decided by the sheriff, or the under-sheriff, or by a clerk in the under-sheriff's office. His noble and learned Friend had drawn a distinction between their Lordships and the other House of Parliament, and had said that the remedy was in their Lordships' hands, because the case might come before them by a writ of error. No man knew better than his noble and learned Friend that many circumstances might intervene and prevent such an appeal from being made, by some of those irregularities which often rendered it impossible to get a case placed upon the record, and consequently it would never get before a Court of Error. "And then another difficulty arises—What do the Judges of Westminster Hall know of your Lordships' privilege; how can they tell in what they consist, and wherein we exceed or fall short in asserting them? They are not described in any of their books; they are not, many of them, to be found even in the Journals of either House; they are recognised as of usage only, and are transmitted down by each House of Legislature to their successor. Suppose the Judges were not distinguished by that impartiality which happily characterizes the occupants of the modern Bench. It would be a very perilous matter to trust our privileges to a tribunal such as might sit on the judgment seat. Your Lordships must also look to the danger of having Judges who are seekers after popularity. Lord Bacon somewhere says, 'A popular Judge is a deformed thing, and the plaudits of the people are fitter for mountebank players than for magistrates.' There have been, I need hardly remind your Lordships, periods when both this House and the other House of Parliament have become extremely unpopular; and under such circumstances it might happen that insuperable difficulties would be found, in case your privileges came before the courts of law, in getting a judge or a jury to give a decision favourable to them, be the justice of the case never so obvious." His noble and learned Friend, in referring to the case of Burdett v. Abbott, said that he had stood in great peril of being committed because he appeared of counsel for Sir Francis Burdett. But his noble and learned Friend was in no such peril, because the House of Commons had given leave to the defendant to plead; and, instead of stopping the action, had allowed it to proceed. Under the peculiar circumstances of that case the House of Commons thought, whether wisely or unwisely, that it was right to wave their privileges, and to let the action against their Speaker proceed, rather than stop it short by any exercise of authority. But he would now quote to their Lordships a few instances of the conduct of Judges in cases of privilege; and although they knew what the present race of Judges were, they knew not what those might be who should follow them; and it should be observed that the Judges who now sat on the Bench were to lay down precedents for the future. It was once referred to the Judges, whether during the Session of Parliament the King had not a right to prescribe what business should come before Parliament, and in what order it should be taken. The Judges, unâ voce, declared that such was the right of the Crown, and that any member acting differently would be guilty of high treason. This took place in the reign of Richard the Second; and the Chief Justice, Sir R. Tresilian, was afterwards most deservedly hanged. The same Chief Justice was also asked whether the House of Commons had any right to impeach the King's Ministers; and he answered that those who impeached any of the King's Ministers in Parliament were to be punished as traitors. But he would now give a specimen of what was done in the seventeenth century, in the reign of Charles I. In 1628, there was a Parliament in which an ancestor of the noble Earl sitting opposite (the Earl of St. Germans), one of the most illustrious men that ever adorned the House of Commons, who, together with Selden and Stroud, and he (Lord Campbell) believed with Pym, requested the Speaker to put a question in the House of Commons. The Speaker refused, because, he said, "he was commanded otherwise by the King." The Members insisted, but the question was not put. As soon as that Parliament was dissolved, Sir John Elliot, and Pym, with Stroud and other Members, were arrested, and the Attorney General filed a criminal information in the King's Bench, and as a preliminary he summoned all the Judges; a proceeding not uncommon in those days, to summon the Judges in order to commit them to an opinion, so that they could not afterwards give judgment contrary to the side of the Government. So the Attorney General, when this prosecution was instituted, summoned all the Judges, and put the question, "Whether a Parliament man, committing an offence against the King or Council, not in a Parliament way, might, after the Parliament ended, be punished or not?" All the Judges, unâ voce, answered, "he might, if he be not punished for it in Parliament; for the Parliament shall not give privilege to any, contra morem Parliamentarium, to exceed the bounds and limits of his place and duty;" and all agreed "that, regularly, he cannot be compelled out of Parliament to answer things done in Parliament in a Parliamentary course; but it is otherwise when things are done exorbitantly, for those are not the acts of a court." So according to this answer the Judges were to consider whether the act was done in "a Parliament way," and if not they were to hold the party liable, and might convict and fine him for the words spoken. After this the prosecution proceeded. Sir John Elliot and the others pleaded to the information of the Attorney General that what they had said was in Parliament. To this a demurrer was put in and the question was argued. The Chief Justice said, "All the Judges in England have resolved, with one voice, that an offence committed in Parliament criminally and contemptuously, the Parliament being ended, rests punishable in another court." Mr. Justice Jones: "And what court shall that be but the Court of King's Bench, in which the King by intendment sitteth?" Mr. Justice Whitelock added, "That any offence committed in Parliament against the King or his Government may be punished out of Parliament." To this Mr. Justice Crooke added the opinion, that "not only criminal actions committed in Parliament are punishable here, but words also." So, by the judgment of one of these Judges it appeared that any attack upon the Minister of the day, or any hint of a suspicion that the Government had not acted with perfect wisdom or honesty, if spoken in Parliament, was to be subject to a prosecution in the courts of law. The result of the prosecution was, that five members were found guilty and sentenced; and Sir John Elliot was ordered to pay a fine of 2,000*l. The noble Lord opposite would, no doubt, find among his muniments the receipt for the fine paid by his ancestor, and which might be regarded as one of the brightest jewels in the coronet of his descendant. Even in the seventeenth century, however, this prosecution and judgment were deemed so outrageous, that the judgment was reversed; and the Judges held that no words spoken in Parliament should be punishable. The defendants in the case he had quoted relied upon a Statute passed in the reign of Henry VIII.; which enacted that no Member should be called in question for any Bill or speaking in Parliament. That plea was, however, as he had shown, overruled, and the parties were fined; the Judges holding, in spite of that Act, that they had cognizance of what was said and done in either House of Parliament. Another case following this was Rex v. Williams, which was an information by Sir R. Sawyer, then Attorney General, against Sir W. Williams, Speaker of the House of Commons, for, under order of the House, publishing and putting his name to a book called "Dangerfield's Narrative." The plea put in was, that the defendant had done so by order of the House; but that plea was overruled, the Lord Chief Justice declaring it to be an idle, insignificant plea; and Sir William Williams was fined 10,000*l.*, of which he actually paid 8,000*l.* These were all cases which had occurred within a recent time; and although the present Judges were worthy of all confidence, he for one would never consent to the privileges of Parliament, which were held for the good of the public, being put in jeopardy by being submitted to them. In the practice of the courts of law, if an action was brought in one court to call in question what had been done in another, the court of exclusive jurisdiction uniformly interfered. For example, in the Court of Exchequer, where an action was brought in another court for what had been done by order of the Exchequer respecting the King's revenue, they would not suffer the action to proceed; as was seen in the case of Campbell v. Cawthorne, before Lord Chief Baron Macdonald. Lord Chief Baron Eyre followed the same precedent. When he (Lord Campbell) was Attorney General, he had often gone into the Court of Exchequer, and moved that proceedings be stayed in other courts upon matters over which the Exchequer had a fixed jurisdiction. Then what said the Court of Common Pleas? A learned Serjeant was arrested when leaving Westminster Hall and getting into his coach. He applied to the Court, and they discharged him, intimating that if the plaintiff should bring an action against the Sheriff for an escape, they would commit him. That Serjeant was Scroggs, afterwards the celebrated Judge Scroggs. In the Court of Chancery, as their Lordships had heard from his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack, the practice had been uniform. There were cases in point so far back as Vernon's Reports down to those decided by Lord Eldon, and by his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack. The Court would not allow an action to be brought against a receiver appointed by and acting under the orders of the Court, as was seen in the case of Angel v. Smith, 9 Vesey, 333; and so also the Court of Chancery would not suffer the regularity of its process to be decided upon by any other tribunal, even when there was a complaint that its officers had exceeded their authority. In Frowd v. Laurence, 1 Milne and Kean, Lord Eldon granted an injunction against an action, and so in the case ex-parte Clarke, decided by his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack. Now, he (Lord Campbell) contended that this was as much the law of that Court as of the Court of Chancery, or the Court of Exchequer; and the practice had been immemorially exercised. There were precedents for its exercise. They might be few in number, because few such actions had been brought. It was only in these speculative times that attorneys ventured to take such proceedings. He had considered it his duty thus to lay before their Lordships the result of his researches. He was convinced that the House not only had the power, but that they were bound to exercise it for the public good; and that if they allowed these actions to proceed, not only their dignity, but their usefulness, would be impaired.

The Earl of Wicklow thought, if their Lordships proceeded in their present course, serious and lamentable injustice might be inflicted. He did not deny that this was a breach of privilege; when he said that, he meant a breach growing out of a disregard of their privileges. It was a breach of privilege, as stated by his noble and learned Friend, to have their proceedings reported at all, or that the minutes of evidence taken before a Select Committee of their Lordships, and furnished to the Members of the Committee, should be made public. He believed, that up to a late period, if an individual Peer sitting on a Committee, to whom the evidence taken before it had been furnished, had chosen to circulate it himself, an action might have been brought against him, and he would not have escaped with impunity. By communicating to the House of Commons the Papers drawn up for their own use, their Lordships gave a kind of sanction to the making public and selling of these Papers. In the present case an individual who complained that he had sustained great injury to his character, applied to the laws for protection; their Lordships interfered, and would not allow him to obtain that justice which the laws might possibly afford him. It might be said that the courts were bound to respect their privileges; and, therefore, that the individual would sustain no injustice by their Lordships' interposition. But, at least, their Lordships ought not to refuse him the opportunity of laying his case before the court, and then, if the court refused to entertain his complaint, it would still be no fault of their Lordships, while their privileges would nevertheless be respected. If it had been made clear to him that in a similar case to this, the four courts of this country would stay an action, he would admit that their Lordships could not have been asked to pursue a different course; but he had listened in vain to the precedents read by the noble and learned Lords opposite for satisfaction on that point. Had the Courts of Queen's Bench, Exchequer, or Common Pleas ever stayed an action when brought by an individual against a witness on the ground of slander offered in the evidence?

Lord Campbell: There never was such an action brought since Westminster Hall was built.

The Earl of Wicklow: The noble and lerned Lord might say so; but how did he know that they would not allow such an action if it were brought? He looked on this question as a matter of discretion altogether; there could be no doubt they had a right to take this step, but was it expedient to do so? The noble and learned Lord said these cases would multiply. Why was that to be expected? Because these privileges were not popular in the country. When they were required in defence of popular rights against the Crown, the public was with the Houses of Parliament, and ready to support them. Now, there was no fear of these rights being attacked by other quarters; but there was a deep-rooted dread in the country of the assumption of undue privileges by Parliament. The noble and learned Lord had brought forward a number of cases to show that this question should not be submitted to the Judges. He was surprised that the noble and learned Lord, of all men, should maintain that position, for how had the present embarrassments been produced? By the advice of the noble and learned Lord himself, when Attorney General, who recommended the House of Commons to appear to an action—a most constitutional course, no doubt; but the noble and learned Lord, who was the author of it, was the last man who should have taken the tone he had done to-night. In the present case, an individual complained of a grievous injustice which had been done to him by slanders on his character, and brought an action; then their Lordships interfered, and said they would either oblige him to stay quiet and rest under the imputation, or commit him to prison.

Lord Campbell remarked, in reference to what the noble Earl opposite had stated, that it was true he had given advice in the case of Stockdale and Hansard, that the defendant should be allowed to plead; and he was prepared to take on himself the responsibility of that advice. But after what had been done in the case of Burdett and Abbot, he certainly at that moment had not the courage to advise a different mode of proceeding. He had then the most complete conviction, which was shared by almost all the lawyers in the House, and others whose assistance he had had, that as soon as the Court of Queen's Bench was informed by the Speaker that the publication then complained of was by order of the House, the Court would be perfectly satisfied, and would immediately give judgment for the defendant. It was to the great astonishment of himself and all the lawyers in the House of Commons, he believed, without a single exception, that a different decision was given. That most distinguished lawyer, whose loss they now deplored, Sir W. Follett, the present Lord Chancellor of Ireland, who was then a Member of the House of Commons, all concurred in believing that that judgment was erroneous. It was on account of that judgment that he would decline again to put the privileges of either House of Parliament to hazard. He now regretted the advice he had given, and deemed it the more incumbent on him, from what he had done on a former occasion, to warn that House of Parliament to which he had the honour to belong, to avoid such a precedent. Wherever an action was brought in direct breach of their privileges, as his noble and learned Friend allowed the present to be, his earnest advice would be that, for the good of the public, they should interpose vivâ manu, and stop it.

On Question, resolved in the Affirmative.

The Lord Chancellor then moved to resolve—

"That the said John Harlow having been guilty of a Breach of the Privileges of this House, be committed for his said Offence to the Custody of the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, until the further Order of this House."

On Question, agreed to; and ordered accordingly.

The Lord Chancellor then moved to resolve—

"That the said Peter Taite Harbin has been guilty of a Breach of the Privileges of this House."

Lord Brougham remarked, that an attorney was placed in a very peculiar situation. He could not refuse a client who came to him; but now their Lordships were about to say that no attorney should undertake the defence of a weak party against one who was greatly superior in strength. The expenses consequent on committal to the custody of the Black Rod were very considerable, and must operate with great force in deterring attorneys from undertaking the defence of clients. Here it was to be remarked that the attorney in his declaration only stated that he had received no instruction to discontinue the action, and not that he would not discontinue it. With respect to the case of Burdett and Abbott, no one could suppose that either Parliament or the courts of law would act in the same manner and on the same principles as in that day. Not a day passed in which attacks both in Parliament and the courts of law did not appear, which, if they had been published at that time, would have been visited with imprisonment. There was an attack only the other day on the Lord Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench, for wilfully stating a falsehood in the charge to the jury, for the purpose of injuring the editor of a newspaper. If one-tenth part of what was now published every day had been published in the time of Burdett and Abbott, there could not be a doubt but the authors of it would have been sent to prison. It would be wrong, however, to suppose that their Lordships abandoned their privileges because they did not exercise them every day.

The Duke of Wellington thought there was one point of this case very remarkable, and, he believed, attributable to the attorney—the declaration, which was the foundation of the proceedings, only stated that the evidence complained of was given in a room before a certain number of persons, not that it was given in a Committee of the House of Lords.

Lord Brougham said, that was the fault of the special pleader, not the attorney.

Lord Campbell thought their Lordships would act most unjustly if they were to commit the tobacconist, and allow the attorney to escape. His noble and learned Friend said it was the duty of the attorney to bring every action that he was asked to bring. He (Lord Campbell) thought that a most mischievous declaration; the attorney ought to examine the case, and see whether there was good reason to bring the action. The tobacconist might not be aware that he was likely to incur their Lordships' displeasure, and he (Lord Campbell) had some compassion for him; but was not the attorney perfectly aware that he was setting their Lordships at defiance? When that attorney said he had no instructions to withdraw the action, was not that tantamount to saying he would not do so?

Lord Brougham said, he had a communication to make to their Lordships, that the plaintiff had instructed the attorney to discontinue the action. He really thought, under these circumstances, that their Lordships should proceed no further.

The Earl of Wicklow said, the plaintiff had declared that he did not know at the time of instituting this suit that it was a breach of privilege.

The Marquess of Clanricarde reminded their Lordships that the question was not as to the plaintiff, but the attorney.

The Lord Chancellor observed, that the plaintiff's declaration stated that the words were spoken before a certain Committee, but omitted to say "of the Lords," whence it was clear that he felt, if he had inserted those words, he would have committed a breach of privilege, and been brought into peril. He thought, therefore, that the attorney, who had no doubt made him aware of this, was the more guilty of the two.

Lord Brougham doubted if the attorney would know so clearly what a breach of privilege was. There was a great privilege lawyer behind him—the late Attorney-General—who said nobody knew what the privileges of the House were—even the Judges were completely ignorant of it; and nobody knew what they were but the House itself; by which his noble and learned Friend meant himself and one or two others.

On Question, resolved in the Affirmative.

The Lord Chancellor then moved—

"That the said Peter Taite Harbin having been guilty of a Breach of the Privileges of this House, be committed for his said Offence to the Custody of the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, until the further Order of this House."

On Question, agreed to, and ordered accordingly.

Costs in Local and Personal Bills.] Lord Brougham, with reference to the discussion on the Standing Orders, said, as some difference of opinion had arisen whether they should proceed by Bill or Resolution, he had, in order to obviate delay, prepared a Bill, which he now presented to their Lordships, to enable the Houses of Parliament to order recognizances for costs in local and personal matters.

Bill read 1ª.

Their Lordships then adjourned.

The following Protest on Privilege of Parliament, was entered on the Journals.

Dissentient—

1. Because this House is now, for the first time, interfering to stop by force an action brought against a party for a wrong done to a fellow subject in slanderous words, alleged to have been falsely spoken, and is thus interposing its power, under the name of privilege, between the subject and its strict legal right, sought to be made good in a court of law by the course which the law has prescribed.

2. Because, whatever right the House may be supposed to derive from precedent, that is, from former instances in which it has exercised similar powers, there can be no doubt that in former times both Houses of Parliament were wont to do many acts, under the name of asserting their privileges, acts which, in the present day, and for a long time past, both Houses of Parliament have wholly abstained from doing, and which would now be considered by all mankind to be gross and wanton violations of all justice.

3. Because, though the right, however founded, or however proved, to do such acts as these, or even such acts as the present of a far less objectionable kind, were admitted, yet it is always a question of expediency and discretion whether or not this power, even if it be possessed by right shall in any given case be exercised; and it ever behoves both Houses of Parliament to be most cautious and abstinent in the use of powers like these, which are assumed by them over parties charged with offending against themselves, and are used by them in their own case without the intervention of any impartial and judicial authority.

4. Because it is, in a peculiar manner, the duty of both Houses to abstain from such acts when they reflect that there is no code of privilege promulgated whereby the people may know against what law they offend; that the law is in each case declared, possibly made for the first time, after the alleged breach of it has been committed, and made in the heat of the strife occasioned by the alleged offence; that the Members of the two Houses always differ among themselves both as to the law and its application; and that they who promulgate it are at once the lawgivers, parties, prosecutors, jurors, judges, and executioners; while in this instance alone no power of extending mercy to the offender exists in the State.

5. Because it behoves this House in a more peculiar manner to avoid placing itself in so strange and anomalous a position, seeing that as it is the Supreme Court of Justice in the last resort in all cases criminal and civil, so it ought to be most anxious ever to set the example of strictly just, regular, legal procedure, and should most carefully shun all violations of law and justice, and should especially be slow to interfere with pending actions, which may in their result come before itself as a high court of appeal.

6. Because the cases in which it is expedient and justifiable, from absolute necessity, to interfere with the rights of individuals and the ordinary course of the law, are of a description wholly different from the present, being actual obstructions offered to the proceedings of the Houses, and which must be removed without any delay, else the arm of Parliament would be paralysed; and because no objection could ever be raised to such an exercise of power, and of rightful power, either by the two Houses or by any other tribunal. But constructive contempts like the present are of a wholly different description, and no harm whatever can arise from allowing them to be dealt with by the course of the law as administered in the regular courts of justice, those courts to which the Sovereign, as well as the meanest of his subjects, must always resort for the establishment of rights and punishment of wrongs—those courts to which the Houses of Parliament may most safely resort as the abodes of strict justice—courts pure from all taint of corruption, free from all bias of influence, uncontrolled by the threats either of regal authority or aristocratic insolence, or popular violence, and to which neither faction nor fear can ever gain access.

7. Because the argument that witnesses must be protected from vexatious and costly suits is wholly inapplicable to the case, inasmuch as no one pretends to doubt that they may be prosecuted at the instance either of the Crown or any individual, whether a Member of the House or not; and if so prosecuted, never could recover one farthing of their costs, though ever so honourably acquitted.

8. Because no punishment which can be inflicted either by a prosecution or by the House upon a witness for the most wanton and the falsest slander of an individual, can afford any reparation whatever to the party thus injured, as the House has not by law the power, if petitioned, to give any such compensation.

9. Because the protection of witnesses before the Houses of Parliament never can be regarded as more essential to the public weal, than the protection of witnesses before the courts of civil and criminal judicature; yet no one pretends to doubt that an action may be brought against any person for slanderous words falsely spoken by him in giving his evidence before these Courts; and though no damages could be recovered if the words were spoken in answer to a question put in the cause, yet it is quite certain that the action must take its course, and that nothing could be done by the Court to stop it; so that the witness must be exposed to exactly the same vexation and expense which are alleged to form the only ground for interfering to stop the action in the present case.

10. Because the order to prevent a defendant from pleading, or the commitment of the plaintiff for a constructive contempt, never can really stop the action, which may proceed through all its stages whatever be done to the parties; unless indeed the greater and unheard of violence were committed of arresting the Judges and their officers, and destroying the record, and tearing the proceedings from the file.

11. Because all the arguments drawn from alleged analogies in a Court of Equity, are wholly wide of the question, inasmuch as the granting an injunction to stay actions at law, or to prevent receivers and other officers, or quasi officers, of the Court being sued for acts done under its authority, are not granted discretionally, but are matter of strict right; and inasmuch as such injunctions only prevent the party against whom they issue from obtaining his remedy in one form, reserving it to him in another, nay, securing it to him in the Court which stays the action; whereas the present proceeding deprives the party of all remedy whatever, the House having no power of authority to grant him redress.

12. Because it is a great aggravation of the mischief so justly complained of, that for the last nine years the other House of Parliament has sold all the Papers printed by its authority, allowing a discount to encourage the trade in those publications: and that though this House has not as yet engaged in this branch of business, yet it communicates its prints to the other, which sells them with its own.

13. Because the inexpediency, injustice, and cruelty of exercising the alleged privileges of the House are strongly illustrated by the peculiar circumstances of the present case. A complaint is made by a Peer that an action has been brought against a witness. The defendant is publicly described as a most respectable person, who had served well in the Peninsula; to the plaintiff is applied the most severe and even coarse expression; while in no court that tried the case could such praise or censure of the character borne by the parties ever be heard for an instant, much less proved in evidence; and while it is also manifest that precisely the same course must have been pursued had the respectable man been the slanderer, and the censured man been the injured party. Under the prejudices excited by such statements, the parties are examined at the bar. The plaintiff is compelled to disclose his case to the defendant. He describes himself as grievously injured, and as severely suffering from the effects of the attack made upon his character by the defendant. He further declares that he was wholly ignorant of the privileges of the House, wholly unconscious of having acted in breach of them by bringing his suit—a thing the more easily believed when we reflect that the nature of parliamentary privilege was distinctly stated, in debate, to be wholly unknown to the Judges of the land, and only understood by the House itself. Finally, the attorney, who has been seized and imprisoned for following his client's instructions, declared that he acted under the advice of counsel; and afterwards informed the House, through a Peer, that he had received directions to discontinue the action—yet both client and attorney are imprisoned, the attorney after this communication was made; and nothing whatever is done against the counsel who deliberately advised the whole proceeding.

14. Because nothing can be more unlike all the judicial proceedings to which the present has been compared, than the course now pursued, inasmuch as whenever the law has declared that a court shall not proceed in any case by reason of another jurisdiction being interfered with, a particular mode of preventing this proceeding is provided by the known law; and in another and important particular, the present proceeding is extremely unlike that of injunction, to which it has been likened, for an injunction is commenced to stay proceedings in one court, in order that justice may be done in another which has possession of the suit; nor is any one prevented unless he disobey the order so given; whereas we issue no order, but at once proceed to punish the party before he has been guilty of any disobedience, or had any opportunity of doing what we desire he should do, and we punish him on the sole ground of his having broken some privilege unknown to him, and which we admit is understood by nobody but ourselves.

15. Because, finally, it is all along assumed in the course of these discussions, that whatever privilege we do not in any case exercise, we cease to possess; whereas there are many privileges most undeniably belonging to us, some which in former times were constantly exercised—some which we still declare to be ours on the face of our Standing Orders—and none of which have now for a long time past been exercised at all; and in illustration of the varying usage which exists respecting such privileges, it may further be remembered that a very great change has come over this question, even within the last 40 years; as no one can affect to think that either the Houses of Parliament or the courts of justice would at this day punish summarily for contempt those acts which frequently were thus visited within that period of time, including the very publication for which Sir Francis Burdett was sent to the Tower, and which raised the last great discussion of the Privilege Question in Parliament, in the courts of law, and in this place.

BROUGHAM.
WICKLOW.

The Speaker took the Chair at twelve o'clock; but only formal business was transacted till five o'clock.

THE CASE OF JOSEPH MASON.] Mr. H. R. Yorke said, that he wished to ask the right hon. the Secretary of State for the Home Department, when the order of liberation was sent to Norfolk Island in behalf of Joseph Mason, who was transported upon a conviction for burglary at the York Spring Assizes, 1843, which conviction turned out to have been altogether and entirely unjust? Also when the said Joseph Mason might be expected in England?

Sir J. Graham, in reply, stated that after a conference with the Judge who tried the case, and after further investigation, being satisfied of the innocence of Joseph Mason with respect to the crime for which he was convicted and sentenced to transportation; and that another party was guilty of that crime, he had considered it to be his duty to advise the Crown to give a pardon to this person, and this was accordingly done on the 1st of January last. He had given directions also that Joseph Mason should be immediately provided with a free passage to England. He believed that the first intelligence of the return of this person would be by the arrival of the individual himself.

NEW ZEALAND.] Mr. Hawes said, that he was anxious to put a question to the Under Secretary for the Colonies. It would be recollected that a few nights ago a question was asked of the hon. Gentleman, as to a conflict having taken place between Her Majesty's troops and the natives of New Zealand; and the hon. Gentleman then stated that the Government was without official intelligence on the subject. He now wished to ask whether any information had reached the Colonial Office since that time.

Mr. G. W. Hope replied, that since the question was put to him respecting news from New Zealand, which it was stated had been made public, he could now state that the Colonial Office received despatches yesterday of the same date as those referred to; and the accounts received by the Government agreed with those which appeared in the Times and other newspapers three or four days ago. The despatches stated, that a renewed attack had been made on the settlement in the Bay of Islands, by the chief who had formerly pulled down the flagstaff there. There was nothing now but an attack of a decidedly insurrectionary character. It was suspected some days before that an attack would take place; but not at the time when it did take place. The natives were about 1,000 in number, and advanced in different bodies; and they showed in their proceedings considerable military discipline. The attack took place upon those who had charge of the blockhouse, near the flagstaff. Those who had charge of it, were taken by surprise, as they were absent, being out on a working party. The person who had the command, was not aware of the approach of the natives, until he turned round and saw it in their possession. A party of seamen and mariners were landed from Her Majesty's ship Hazard, then in the bay, to attack the natives; they were but a small party, and the officer commanding them, Captain Robertson, was severely wounded. They drove the natives from the blockhouse; but another accident then occurred, as the magazine in the blockhouse blew up and did much mischief. After a long and determined attack, the natives were everywhere repulsed. The gun, however, in one of the stockades had been spiked, while the other had been blown up, and the ammunition was nearly exhausted. No lives of any of the settlers were lost, with the exception of one gentleman, who was killed, by the explosion of the magazine. The loss altogether, taking troops, settlers, and seamen into account, was thirteen killed, and twenty-three wounded. The loss of the natives had not been ascertained, but it was very considerable. The settlers were then removed to Auckland; but the missionaries still remained in the Bay of Islands. In justice to the natives, he must say that, after the settlers retired, they forwarded a woman and child which they found in a blockhouse, under a flag of truce, to the settlement. Many of the natives were armed with American rifles, which they obtained by barter, and most of the remainder were armed with muskets. Troops, previously to this melancholy event, had been applied for, to the Government of New South Wales; and the North Star had arrived at Auckland from Sydney on the 23rd of March, with two hundred and ten troops and artillery on board. The last accounts were dated the 26th of the same month; and they certainly showed that the effects of this conflict were looked upon with great alarm in New Zealand. It did not appear that those proceedings grew out of any accidental circumstance, such as from a collision or dispute between the natives and the settlers, but from a determined attempt on the part of the chief he had alluded to, to deny the sovereignty of the Queen. Such was the object in view, as far as he could ascertain, and not so much to make an attack upon the settlers. He might add that the arrival of troops from New South Wales had done much to restore confidence.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH.] Mr. Hume observed, that he had a Motion for to-morrow, respecting the recall of Lord Ellenborough from India; but he felt, under all the circumstances of the case, bound to abandon the Motion.

THE BOERS IN SOUTH AFRICA.] Mr. Hindley wished to ask a question of the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, respecting some recent proceedings in the vicinity of the Cape of Good Hope. Had any accounts reached the Government with respect to an attack which, it had been stated in the public papers, had been made by the boers, from Natal, on the natives in or near the boundary of the Colony of the Cape of Good Hope? and also, whether the Governor had left Cape Town for the frontier in consequence of this?

Mr. Hope replied, that no report of an official character from the Governor had reached the Colonial Office, giving an account of the proceedings alluded to. He must state, however, that, from what he had seen in the public papers, it appeared to him that a wrong impression had gone abroad as to the facts of the case. From the facts that had reached him, it appeared that the collision did not take place within the boundary of the Colony of the Cape. The Griquas, upon whom the attack had been made, were an independent tribe living beyond the Cape; and therefore not within the limits of the jurisdiction of the British Government. A number of missionaries had settled with the Griquas, as with an independent nation, and the attack made upon Phillipolis, the capital of that country, did not appear to have been made by persons from Natal; for the places were 300 miles distant from each other. The boers who had made the attack were those who, since the abolition of slavery in the Colony, had emigrated to the north of the boundary of the Cape; and it did not appear that there was any connexion between them and the boers at Natal. The conflict had taken place before the Colonial Government could interfere to prevent it. At present there was a considerable force at the Cape, and this had been increased since 1842, by a regiment of cavalry 500 strong; and no doubt Sir P. Maitland would take proper steps to protect the Griquas against further attack; but it should be remembered that they were not Her Majesty's subjects.

Mr. Hindley asked whether the right of sovereignty was claimed by this country over the boers?

Mr. Hope replied, most unquestionably. The boers who had emigrated, had always been regarded by Her Majesty's Government as subjects of the British Crown. Steps had been taken long ago at Natal for this purpose, and a Lieutenant-Governor had been appointed to govern that place.

THE BLOCKADE OF THE RIO DE LA PLATE.] Mr. Milner Gibson asked whether General Rosas, of Buenos Ayres, had the right to stop the navigation of the river Plate, and to prevent communication with Paraguay by those waters; and whether the British Government had acknowledged the right of General Rosas to close the navigation of the river Plate to foreign vessels?

Sir R. Peel said, that General Rosas, in the assertion of belligerent rights, had intimated an intention to establish a blockade of the waters referred to; and the British Government had expressed its disposition to assent to the blockade, on the condition that it should be generally enforced. The French Government had, in the first instance, claimed that French vessels should be exempted; and Great Britain then of course refused to permit the blockade. Subsequently, however, France, it was understood, had professed her willingness to have her vessels included in the operation of the blockade; and Her Majesty's Government then also assented on the condition, as before, that the blockade was to be, so long as it lasted, of universal application. As to the Paraguay, General Rosas, occupying both banks of that river, claimed the right of preventing navigation upon it. With reference to the Plate river, the blockade of that river required the consent of the other Powers, and Great Britain had assented on the conditions he had stated.

If the hon. Gentleman, however, required fuller information on the subject for the guidance of merchants, his best course would be to apply to the Foreign Office.

THE BALLYHASSIG AFFRAY.] Mr. E. B. Roche, in reference to an unhappy collision at Ballyhassig, begged to ask the right hon. Baronet opposite whether any orders had been issued precluding, as was most desirable, the police from attending any fair or other popular assembly in Ireland, unless a magistrate were present? He had no hesitation, from his knowledge of the population about Ballyhassig, in saying, that had but one magistrate of influence or station in the country been present on the occasion of the late lamentable affray, no loss of life would have taken place, nor would that loss of life have occurred, had the police not gone to the fair.

Sir Thomas Fremantle must abstain from saying anything that might be construed into an opinion, respecting the late unfortunate transaction, pending the inquiry now being prosecuted by a competent tribunal. He might observe, however, as to the presence of magistrates on the occasion, that he believed several magistrates had been present during the day, though none remained till the time when the unhappy affray occurred, which was at nine o'clock in the evening. With reference to the order suggested by the hon. Gentleman, he must decline at present giving any answer respecting it.

NEW ZEALAND.] Viscount Howick wished to ask the right hon. Baronet at the head of the Government, whether he proposed to lay the instructions sent out to Captain Grey on the Table of the House, before they were called upon to vote the Supplemental Estimate for New Zealand?

Sir R. Peel must answer now, as he had answered on a former night the same question, that Captain Grey not being as yet in New Zealand, there would be, with reference to the large proportion of the instructions forwarded for his guidance when he arrived, great inconvenience in making those instructions public at present. There might be circumstances to prevent Captain Grey from reaching New Zealand for a time, a contingency which Government had framed arrangements to meet, and which rendered it additionally unadvisable to make public as yet the instructions sent out for him. Part of the instructions relating to the New Zealand Company, however, had been communicated by Lord Stanley to a deputation from that Company; and he (Sir R. Peel) had no objection to lay the instructions which referred to that Company before the House.

Viscount Howick begged to ask whether the extracts promised by the right hon. Baronet were such as would give the House a general notion of the policy which the Government proposed to act upon for the future, with reference to New Zealand? He, and those who thought with him, considered that the past calamities of the Colony arose from the past policy of the Government; and before Parliament separated, they believed it to be absolutely necessary—should the future policy of the Government with New Zealand, as far as it could be collected, not promise to be more satisfactory than the past—to have another discussion on the subject. He hoped the right hon. Baronet would give, at all events, such extracts from the instructions as would enable the House to form a general judgment as to the policy they contemplated, ere it was called upon to meet a heavy additional demand, occasioned entirely by the past errors of Government.

Sir R. Peel said, that the noble Lord, when the extracts promised were laid on the Table, would be able to form a judgment how far they gave an insight into the contemplated policy of Government with reference to New Zealand, and could act according to his then view of the matter. He must confess he did not consider they would enable the House to form a judgment as to the general policy assigned to Captain Grey; but, he must repeat, he did not hold it consistent with his public duty to give, at present, any fuller information on the subject.

COAL TRADE (PORT OF LONDON) BILL.] The House in Committee on the Coal Trade (of the Port of London) Bill.

On Clause 2,

The Earl of Lincoln said, that in this clause he had to propose certain amendments. He need not go into a long statement of the necessity of widening the streets, not only of the city of London, but of other large towns. The evidence which had been given before a Committee of the House was conclusive on this subject, and on the necessity of providing funds for this purpose. It was particularly mentioned, that the greater part of Whitechapel was badly drained, overcrowded, and that the streets, courts, and lanes admitted of no current of air. As early as 1812 there was a Report on this subject; but in 1838, a Committee was appointed, which consisted of several metropolitan Members, and they recommended the tax on coal. In the following year another Committee was appointed, with a still larger proportion of metropolitan Members, when the question was over and over again considered, and all were in favour of an increase of the existing coal tax. The coal merchants, with one single exception, gave evidence in favour of this tax. He had himself made inquiries of some of the most influential coal-masters, and they had shown, by the weekly returns of the coal market for several successive years, that as the rise was by threepences, the duty of 1*d.* could not be felt by the consumer. If the duty were now remitted, it would only go into the pockets of the coal merchants. The noble Lord concluded by moving, as an addition to Clause 2—

"In order to provide a fund for the opening of poor and densely-populated districts in the Metropolis, or for keeping open spaces in the immediate vicinity of the same, as a means of promoting the public convenience, recreation, and health."

Mr. Williams wholly objected to the proposition of the noble Lord. He had as decided objections to a tax upon coals as he had to a tax upon bread, because, in this great metropolis, it was quite as much a necessary of life. The great bulk of the tax was paid by the poorer classes, and that was the reason why it had been so long maintained. Upwards of a million sterling had been raised from the tax within the last few years; 200,000*l.* had been spent upon that enormous job the Fleet Market, which had been of no use to any one. Why did they, in this case, depart from the mode of raising all other municipal taxes? Merely because the greater part of the tax was paid by the poorer classes. He had not the slightest objection to the plan of improvement proposed by the noble Lord; but why should not the cost of it be raised by a house-tax? There were thousands of people, who, residing in the vale of the Thames, would be subjected to the tax; and what possible good would their improvements in Southwark do to them?

Mr. Hume would ask who could possibly benefit from the proposed improvements, except the owners of the property in the neighbourhood where they were carried on? and undoubtedly they were the parties who ought to bear the cost. The noble Lord had alluded to three Committees who had been in favour of the plan; but not one Coal Committee which had sat within these ten years but had made every endeavour to get the tax abolished. Even the last Committee, of which the noble Lord had been chairman, were nearly unanimous against his plan; and he did not consider it fair that he should bring it forward in the House, where he hoped to carry it, by the aid of Her Majesty's Government. He would, indeed, be sorry if the House should support the noble Lord. He would give all the opposition in his power to the further continuance of the iniquitous tax.

Mr. Masterman was sorry that the noble Lord had determined to renew the tax. The city of London required no further aid, and the tax would expire with the year, and he thought the time had come when the poor of London should cease to pay the additional tax upon an article of such necessity as coal. He felt it to be his duty to vote against the proposition of the noble Lord.

The Earl of Lincoln was, indeed, surprised to hear his hon. Friend oppose his proposition, and the more so at the grounds on which he rested his opposition. He had not intended to inform the House of the manner in which his proposal originated; but he felt himself compelled to do so after what had fallen from his hon. Friend. The tax was about to expire, when he was waited upon by a very influential gentleman connected with the City, who represented that the repeal of the tax would benefit no person in the world except the coal merchants. He agreed with him in that opinion, and having consulted with his right hon. Friend at the head of the Government, he adopted the scheme. He was the more astonished at what had fallen from his hon. Friend, because it was not a long while since he headed a deputation to his right hon. Friend, when a proposal was made, not for continuing that small tax, but to impose an additional duty of 1*s.* 6*d.* a ton for the sole purposes of the city of London. His right hon. Friend certainly had told his hon. Friend behind him that considering the taxes already levied in the metropolis for the sole benefit of the city of London, it would be most unfair to subject it to an additional duty for that purpose, and he declined to accede to the proposition. His hon. Friend and another hon. Gentleman connected with the city of London, the hon. Member for Preston, had attended before the Committee, and not only advocated, certainly more ably, than he (Lord Lincoln) could do, the continuance of the tax; but argued against the supposition that the remission of it would be a benefit to any but the coal merchants. He (Lord Lincoln) told his hon. Friend, that the city of London having got a million and a half for improvements, he thought it right to look to Whitechapel, Southwark, and Lambeth, in which there were poor and densely-populated districts which much required improvement, and that if the penny was to be granted at all, he should propose that it should be appropriated to the benefit of those places. And yet now, after all that had passed, his hon. Friend came and said, that under the circumstances he should oppose the tax being imposed at all.

Mr. Masterman said, in explanation, that he had said in the Committee that if the tax was to be carried, the city of London would expect a portion of it of course.

Viscount Howick said, that this bill would tax the consumers of coal in the valley of the Thames, in order to make improvements in which they had no interest whatever. He knew the condition of the labouring classes in that district, and he was aware that in Staines, and Datchet, and Windsor, the high price of coals was a serious evil to the working classes. When he looked to the condition of the working classes in that district, as compared with the condition of the same class in his native county, he could not avoid remarking the inferiority of the condition of the labouring classes in the valley of the Thames, and he attributed much of that to the price of fuel; he was, therefore, opposed to this tax upon coal for a purpose in which a great number of the consumers had no interest. Another objection to the tax, was its indirect operation as regarded the poor man, who in consequence of buying his coal in small quantities, would be obliged to pay twopence instead of a penny a ton as a tax. It would be highly desirable to expend a considerable outlay in improving localities densely populated; but there were sources available for that purpose infinitely preferable to this, one of which would be the levying of a house tax, or of a tax upon the ground-rents in the particular districts selected for improvement. To adopt either of these modes would enable the Government to raise a sufficient tax from the owners of property, instead of an insufficient tax from the labouring and poorer classes. The value of property in the improved districts was increased to the full amount of the tax, if not in a much greater ratio. These were his grounds for opposing this tax. It was highly objectionable as concerned the labouring classes who paid the tax throughout the valley of the Thames. He thought the Government might have commuted the whole tax; and he, for one, would not consent to the continuance of even a portion of it.

Sir R. Peel said, that the object contemplated by his noble Friend was not the mere ornament of the metropolis, but that his proposal was simply to constitute a fund for public improvements, which could not be appropriated without the sanction of Parliament; and when his noble Friend asked the House to let him appropriate this fund, he was desirous expressly to provide by it the means of promoting the health and comfort of those districts of the metropolis where, from the crowded state of the buildings and dwelling-houses, there was the greatest liability to disease. Of late years very general attention had been called to this important subject. He (Sir R. Peel) would confine himself now to the metropolis, and to the particular parts of it, the salubrity of which it was proposed to promote; and, in so doing, he felt it his duty to call the attention of the Committee to specific facts, connected with the state of those parts of the metropolis. Dr. Southwood Smith, a gentleman of great talent and experience, had directed his attention to this subject, and had personally observed the condition of the metropolis in its several districts. He had attended for many years at the Fever Hospital, and observed:

"The records of the London Fever Hospital prove, unhappily, that there are certain localities in the metropolis and its vicinity which are the constant seats of fever, from which this disease is never absent, although it may be found to prevail less extensively and with less severity in some years and some seasons than in others, but still in which it is incessantly committing its ravages."

The work from which the right hon. Baronet quoted then went on to state that the author's experience, during the present year, afforded a verification of the correctness of these statements. The metropolis had been visited by an epidemic, which was still raging, but which did not prevail in every part of London; nor did it prevail even in every fever district; for there were districts in this town known by that name. The author was asked why he called these districts by that name; to which the reply was, that—"There are many districts in which fever is always so prevalent that the localities in question may be regarded as the ordinary seats of that disease."

Farther on it was stated, that—

"From the commencement of January to April in the present year, we have actually received into the wards of the hospital five hundred fever patients, and during a considerable portion of that time applications for admission have been refused, at the rate of thirty or forty a day, in consequence of there being no accommodation for them."

And again—

"In some districts there is hardly a single house in which fever has not prevailed, and in some cases hardly a single room in a house in which it was not to be found. I have observed this in particular to be the case in certain localities about Bethnal-green."

Now the object of the present measure was to provide a fund for the purpose of counteracting, and, if possible, wholly removing these evils. A Committee had suggested that the best mode of so doing was to put a duty upon coal. The noble Lord suggested a tax upon property, on the property of those who would be benefited by the contemplated improvements. That certainly appeared, at first sight, both judicious and rational. Nothing, however, was more difficult, when they came practically to deal with the question, than to say precisely who were the parties so benefited. If they could tell him who were the parties who would be benefited by improvements such as contemplated in Bethnal-green and Whitechapel, and enable him to apportion properly and equitably those burdens which, on account of the benefits which would accrue to their property from improvements, they would be liable to bear, he would willingly wave the proposition now before the House, and adopt the suggestion which had been made. The improvements contemplated would be beneficial to several districts, not only in a healthful but also in a moral point of view. The Government, therefore, proposed—having no other means at present at command liable to less objection—to continue for a definite period the tax of one penny a ton upon coals, a tax which was now in existence. When it became a question, when there was a duty already existing of thirteen pence a ton, and which was to endure until the year 1862, with the exception of a penny a ton of that duty, which was about to expire, what was to be done with that small duty so about to expire; the Government proposed that the penny a ton should be continued for the same period as the other twelve-pence, in order that—the twelve-pence being applied to other purposes—the additional penny might be appropriated, not to the purposes of the Government, but for the purpose of constituting a fund from which the districts of the metropolis, called the fever districts, should be supplied with the means of necessary and permanent improvement. Looking at the parties to be benefited, looking at the evils under which these parties now suffered, at the fevers and other diseases which existed amongst them, and contrasting these sufferings with the absolute good which would arise from giving, for a certain number of years, such a sum as 11,000*l.* a year to form a fund for the mitigation of the evils alluded to, he could not but think that the actual practical physical good which would accrue from such an appropriation would greatly predominate over all the objections to the tax. Those were the grounds on which he gave his cordial support to the Motion of his noble Friend.

Mr. Alderman Humphery would not have said one word, had it not been for the fallacy of the noble Lord's proposition, when he said that the poor were to be benefited by the penny tax being taken off. He would like to know if the taking off the duty would reduce the price of coals to the poor? Now, by every improvement which took place in London the poor received a positive benefit. As one instance of this, he would like the noble Lord to see the number of those employed in the manufacture of bricks, called for by the various improvements at present in progress. As to the benefit which it was said the poor would derive from the abolition of the tax of an additional penny a ton on coals, he would like to know how many poor families consumed more than one ton a year? In that case the saving to each family would be a penny a year.

Mr. Hawes said, that all parties were agreed that this was in itself a bad tax. The right hon. Baronet said, that it was extremely difficult to suggest any other tax as a substitute for it, and as the Government were anxious that great sanatory benefits should be conferred upon certain districts, they were reduced to the necessity of continuing this tax. He, however, wished to know if the Commission had ever seriously inquired whether a substitute could or could not be found? So far as he had learnt, he believed they had not. It was worthy of remark, that upon that Commission were few persons connected with the metropolis. Nor was he ready to believe that the residents of the metropolis would not consent to the imposition of some other tax as a substitute for this, for the purpose of affording a fund by which to effect improvements. A great deal had been said about the price of coal. As far as the price was concerned, much effect might not be produced, either one way or other, by the remission of the duty. He objected to the continuance of this tax, because he believed that a little more investigation would have led to the discovery of a better source of taxation, for the purposes contemplated—a source free from the objections which were chargeable upon this tax; and which, if it pressed heavily upon individuals, would fall upon the rich and not upon the poor; whereas the coal-tax was distinctly a tax pressing upon the poor for the benefit of property, wherever its proceeds were to be expended in improvements.

Sir Charles Lemon was understood to say, that the Committee did inquire whether a substitute could not be discovered for the present tax, but had come to the conclusion that such could not be found.

Mr. Hutt regretted that the noble Lord (the Earl of Lincoln) had come forward as the advocate of such a measure as this. It was a proposition for laying a tax upon the poorer classes, in opposition to every principle of sound policy. He objected to the principle of the tax—not to its amount; but the question of principle had been altogether abandoned by the noble Lord. Already the amount of taxation to be paid by coal coming from the north of England was disgraceful to the legislation of the country, and the noble Lord would gain but little credit from attempting to increase it. He trusted the House would, notwithstanding the confidence which the noble Lord reposed in his majority, after the discussion which had now taken place, rally round sound principle, and defeat the Government.

The Committee divided on the Question, that the words be inserted:—Ayes 69; Noes 42: Majority 27.

Remaining clauses agreed to.

House resumed. Report to be received.

POOR LAW AMENDMENT (SCOTLAND).] House in Committee on the Poor Law Amendment (Scotland) Bill.

Clauses to 64 inclusive, agreed to.

On Clause 65, which enacts that all assessments imposed for the relief of the poor shall be applicable to the relief of occasional as well as permanent poor; provided always, that nothing therein contained shall be held to confer a right to demand relief on able-bodied persons out of employment,

Mr. Hastie inquired, whether there was not a decision of the Scotch courts that the able-bodied poor were entitled to relief?

The Lord Advocate observed that there was such a decision; but still the prevailing opinion was, that able-bodied persons were not now entitled to relief by law. The present Bill would leave the law as it now was.

Mr. Aglionby thought it a great evil to leave the law in doubt; and the weak, impotent, and destitute, ought not to be the only objects of the Bill, if the able-bodied could not get work. The word "occasional" would not include them; for that only designated cases of temporary sickness and the like, as opposed to "permanent" poor. Let the workhouse test or any other be applied; but the able-bodied poor, when out of work, must not starve.

Mr. Pringle said, there was no wish in Scotland to have the present system changed. Able-bodied poor out of work must go elsewhere to find it; by law the parish could not, however willing, relieve them. If it were done, it would change the whole habits of the people, and the Bill would be a perfect nuisance; and in some places the people would live in a state of idleness.

Mr. Borthwick was sure the workhouse test would not suit Scotland; it was only calculated to destroy the independence of the people. The able-bodied poor were not now entitled to relief in the sense in which other poor were; but it was neither the law nor the practice in Scotland to exclude them from all relief when starving. The best way would be to move the omission of the proviso.

Mr. Ewart thought the law, being ambiguous, ought to be settled by this Act; but the present clause seemed to exclude able-bodied poor from relief, even when only occasionally destitute.

Mr. S. Crawford agreed that the proviso had better be excluded. If the able-bodied poor had a right to relief, it ought not to be taken away, particularly when the clearance system had been prevailing, as it had been proved to be, in some parts of Scotland.

Mr. Ewart moved that the proviso—

"That nothing herein contained shall be held to confer a right to demand relief on able-bodied persons out of employment"— be omitted.

Mr. Hastie said, that in Paisley the authorities had had the greatest possible difficulty in keeping the public peace in times of distress, when they were told that by the law in England no man could be allowed to starve, and when they had an impression that under the law of Scotland they had a legal right to demand relief. He called upon the Government in this clause to determine whether the able-bodied should or should not have the right.

Mr. Borthwick said, that by the law of 1579 in Scotland, as by the law of the same year in England, the able-bodied poor were to be provided with work, and the proviso in this clause would do away with the old law.

The Committee divided on the Question, that the words proposed to be left out stand part of the clause:—Ayes 73; Noes 21: Majority 52.

Mr. Hastie moved the following proviso:—

"Provided nevertheless, that it shall be lawful for the Parochial Board of every parish, or combination of parishes, to allow out of the funds raised by assessment or otherwise for the relief of the poor thereof, such relief to able-bodied persons within such parishes or combination of parishes as the Board may deem necessary, during the existence of temporary distress, arising from the inability of such person to obtain employment; Provided always, that such relief to the able-bodied has the approbation of the Board of Supervision."

The Lord Advocate said, he must oppose this clause upon the same grounds as the previous proposition. If it were dangerous to introduce the principle of able-bodied relief, under particular circumstances, into counties, it was equally so as regarded town.

After a few words from Mr. Ross and Mr. Baine, in support of the clause,

The Committee again divided on the Question that the clause be added:—Ayes 31; Noes 67: Majority 36.

Clause agreed to.

On Clause 71,

Mr. Sharman Crawford moved to expunge the proviso at the end of the clause, enacting—

"That it shall not be competent for any Court of Law to entertain or decide any action relative to the amount of relief granted by parochial Boards, unless the Board of Supervision shall previously have declared that there is a just cause of action, as hereinbefore provided."

The hon. Member said he could not consent to create any obstacle to the poor man obtaining relief by appealing to the higher court of justice; and he must, therefore, press the Amendment.

Mr. P. M. Stewart hoped that some explanation from the proper quarter would be given of this anomalous clause. It was unconstitutional in principle, and its operation would be most unfair and unjust to the poor.

The Lord Advocate said, the clause was one which would confer the greatest possible benefit on the poor of Scotland. It would take them out of the hands of those professional persons who had their interests under their control at present; it would relieve them from the tedium and risk of lawsuits, and would save the parish funds for the relief of pauperism. The case stood thus at present: if the parochial board should not listen to the pauper's application for relief, he could go to the Supreme Court, and he could get relief there, because, being a pauper, he could sue in formâ pauperis; but in order so to sue, he must obtain a certificate from a body of professional persons, who, by the practice of the court, were appointed to investigate the matter, and report whether the party applying had a good case or not. Then, having got their certificate, he could go before the court; but he might be there many long years. What did this clause give him? It enacted that, if the parochial board should not have given the pauper what he thought adequate relief, instead of remaining content with that decision (as must be done in England), he should be enabled, by the simplest application—by a mere letter—to the board of supervision, to call upon them to consider his case and inquire into it; and he (the Lord Advocate) ventured to say that a board constituted as that would be, partly of lawyers and partly of persons not lawyers, would be as capable of saying whether the pauper had a good case, and giving him a certificate to sue in formâ pauperis, as the lawyers who at present reported to the Court of Session. But more than this, the board of supervision was empowered to fix the amount of relief which the pauper should receive, and that amount of relief he would receive unless it were taken from him by the court of law, and he could get that without expense or delay. Was that no benefit? If the matter were carried into a court of law, he (the Lord Advocate) ventured to say, that no long time would elapse before it would be found that the court very seldom overthrew the decision of the board of supervision in his favour, if any parish should have the temerity to enter into litigation on the subject.

Mr. Aglionby thought the learned Lord Advocate had not answered the objection of the hon. Member (Mr. S. Crawford). The hon. Member objected that where the board of supervision should have refused a certificate, the pauper would be barred from suing in formâ pauperis, unless he obtained the certificate of the learned persons of whom the Lord Advocate had spoken, and who would never grant a certificate after the refusal of the board. The pauper would also be barred of his interim aliment, and it was for these reasons, which the learned Lord Advocate had not refuted, that the proviso appeared to him (Mr. Aglionby) to be worse than useless. To expunge it would not lead to litigation either on the part of attorneys or paupers, and he thought it ought not to stand in the Bill.

Mr. Hastie observed, that this clause provided one law for the rich, and another for the poor. The rich man could go at once to the Court of Session, whilst that step was denied to the poor man.

Mr. Wakley could not support the clause, for he believed that it tended to make this Bill one of the most cruel Poor Laws that ever was enacted. The Bill itself inflicted the greatest possible injury upon the poor of Scotland; and, looking at this clause, and those clauses further on with regard to settlement, he feared that he had done wrong hitherto in giving his support to it at all. He trusted that the Bill would not be allowed to pass this Session, at any rate, and he would beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman why such a proviso should be allowed to remain?

The Committee divided, on the Question, that the proviso stand part of the clause: —Ayes 79; Noes 35: Majority 44.

On Clause 72,

"That from and after the passing of this Act, no person shall be held to have acquired a settlement in any parish by residence, unless such person shall have resided for five years in such parish:"

Lord Duncan moved that the term of five years should be substituted for seven years.

The Committee divided on the Question, that the word "five" stand part of the clause:—Ayes 108; Noes 8: Majority 100.

The Committee again divided on the Question, that the word "continuously" be inserted after the words "five years": —Ayes 88; Noes 25: Majority 63.

Amendment agreed to.

The Lord Advocate proposed an alterationunder which the Irish were to be enabled to obtain a settlement in Scotland after certain residence, and under certain circumstances. It had been said that as the Scotch were allowed to obtain a settlement in Ireland without any condition, the Irish, upon a principle of reciprocity, should have the same benefit in Scotland. But the share of nothing which the Irish gave to the Scotch, was no reason for the share of something which the Irish claimed from them. But be that as it might, a fixed residence ought to be demanded from every stranger before he gained a settlement; and under the Bill, as it now stood, the Irish were treated in the same manner as other strangers. He proposed to strike out certain words of the clause in order that, if a person had been absent five years, without having resided say twelvemonths out of that period in the parish to which he belonged, his right of settlement should not be continued.

Colonel Rawdon thought the proposition of the hon. and learned Advocate was a fair one. He desired to see the Irishman in Scotland placed upon the same footing as the Scotchman in Ireland.

Mr. George Hamilton said, he thought the proposition a fair one. It was fairer than the speech, and better than the reasoning, of the Lord Advocate; the learned Lord had neither done justice to the Irish, nor to the administration of the Irish Poor Law. It was quite true that there was no settlement or right to relief founded upon settlement in Ireland; but then it should be recollected that the want of a settlement in Ireland did not preclude relief—and the relief afforded was not an occasional but a permanent relief. That relief was afforded in Ireland to Scotchmen equally as to Irishmen—destitution was there the only qualification for relief; and, practically, every destitute person was considered to have a right to relief, whatever country he belonged to. Instead, therefore, of there being no reciprocity, as the Lord Advocate had stated, the Scotchman in Ireland was actually better off than in Scotland. In Scotland the Scotchman could not claim relief, unless he had a settlement of five years' industrial residence. In Ireland he was relieved, without settlement, if he was destitute. The Irish system, therefore, was the more liberal of the two—and Scotchmen had no reason to complain. At the same time he thought it not unfair that a stranger, after acquiring a settlement, should forfeit it by a long absence; and he was, therefore, satisfied with the proposition of Government.

Viscount Duncan observed, that in England the law of settlement was very stringent; that in Ireland there was no law of settlement; and he now wanted to know if it were intended that five years' residence in Scotland should constitute a right to relief. He would ask, were they prepared to allow as many as pleased of the disabled Irish to establish themselves in Scotland?

Viscount Clements said, that a great many Scotchmen were employed in Ireland in confidential and lucrative situations; therefore no undue impediment should be put in the way of the Irish acquiring settlements in Scotland.

Mr. Lockhart thought the alteration introduced into the clause affecting the Irish paupers, merited the most serious attention of hon. Members opposite.

Sir W. Somerville hastened to express the satisfaction with which he witnessed the favourable change made in the Bill so far as the natives of Ireland were concerned. He was quite certain that the sentiment of hospitality which inspired that alteration, was felt, to an equal if not a greater degree, amongst his countrymen for strangers. Indeed, he could quote instances in which, amongst the applicants for relief in a district in the south of Ireland, preference had been given to Scotchmen over Irishmen, purely from a generous desire to relieve the stranger first.

Sir J. M'Taggart objected most strongly to the proposed alteration in the law of settlement in Scotland as regarded the Irish. In the district with which he was connected, and which he consequently best knew, the Scotch very seriously felt their irruption. On looking at the roll of the poor in his own parish, he found that four-fifths of those receiving relief were Irish. The influx was principally from Donaghadee to Portpatrick. One day, when he was crossing over from Ireland to the latter port, he said to an Irish labourer, who was a passenger in the same vessel, "Well, Pat, and what takes you to Scotland?" "Oh, an sure your Honour," replied the fellow, "it is not want, for we've plenty of that at home." He objected to any alteration in the clause.

Colonel Rawdon said, that after the alteration made by the learned Lord Advocate, he should certainly not persist in bringing forward the Amendment of which he had given notice.

Mr. P. M. Stewart approved of the alterations proposed by the Lord Advocate. He thought that after five years' industrial labour, a man earned a right to settlement; and he believed, that if the law was properly observed by residents in Scotland, they would have none but useful Irishmen in that country.

Mr. G. Craig complained, that the provisions of this Bill should be abandoned in this wholesale way. He must say, he thought the Scotch Members were not treated with proper respect, when important alterations were introduced of which they had received no intimation.

The Amendments proposed by the Lord Advocate were then agreed to.

The Committee divided, on the Question, that the clause as amended stand part of the Bill:—Ayes 95; Noes 16: Majority 79.

Clause agreed to. House resumed. Committee to sit again.

PETITIONS PRESENTED. By Bishop of London, from Lerwick, and Old Meldrum, for the Suppression of Intemperance, especially on the Sabbath.—By the Marquess of Breadalbane, from Free Church at Holytown, and from Inhabitants of Stanley, against the Running of Railway Trains on the Sabbath.—By Lord Campbell, from General Convention of Royal Burghs of Scotland, for the Adoption of a Measure to abolish Exclusive Privileges in Trade.—By Marquess of Breadalbane, from Presbytery of Inverary, and of Lorn, for Improving the Condition of Schoolmasters (Scotland).—From Congregation of Free Church of Bridge of Allan, for the Adoption of a Measure to change the present System of Parochial Schools (Scotland).

TENANTS' COMPENSATION (IRELAND) BILL.] Lord Stanley said, that he would hope to be excused for the irregularity of referring to anything that took place in a Select Committee; but at its last meeting he stated, on the part of the Government, that seeing the strong feeling manifested both in Committee and in the House, it was the intention of the Government to propose various and not unimportant modifications in the measure. From the pressure of business upon the Attorney General for Ireland, and from various circumstances, there had been great difficulty in engrafting such Amendments on the Bill; and though he (Lord Stanley) did not give up the hope of presenting the Bill in the present Session, as amended by the Committee, yet looking to the state of the Session, and the opposition to be expected, he thought it fair to noble Lords concerned upon the subject to say, that he did not intend, upon that Bill, in the course of the present Session, to take the opinion of the House as to any further step.

PRIVILEGE.] Lord Brougham presented a petition from John Harlow, now in custody, stating that since the publication of the Report of the Committee before which Mr. Baker gave evidence, the petitioner had suffered in his trade and character by the circulation of that Report; that proceedings in a criminal court were at that time pending in relation to the matter to which Mr. Baker's testimony referred, and Mr. Baker was afterwards examined as a witness in those proceedings, but never attempted to prove what he had stated before the Committee; that the statement was false and untrue; and the petitioner trusted the House would be graciously pleased to make some allowance for his feelings being so wounded; that he would not have taken the present proceedings, if he had been aware of their being a breach of privilege, and he had accordingly instructed his solicitor to withdraw the action; and the petitioner humbly expressed his extreme regret at having committed a breach of privilege, and hoped the House would be graciously pleased to pardon the offence he had so unintentionally committed. The noble and learned Lord added, that it was impossible to express greater contrition for the grave and inexpiable offence of having resorted to the law of the land. It was not known by the petitioner to be a crime; it was known only to Parliament; it had never been promulgated in any law. He moved that John Harlow be discharged out of custody on payment of his fees; for so, he was sorry to say, it must be.

The Lord Chancellor, on the facts stated in the petition, was willing to accede to the Motion. As the noble and learned Lord was not acting as counsel for this person, the latter must not be held answerable for what he had said.

Lord Campbell thought it would not be exactly fair to the petitioner to make him answerable for the sarcasms of his noble and learned Friend, and he should, therefore, concur in the Motion.

The said John Harlow was then brought to the bar, and reprimanded in the following terms by

The Lord Chancellor: You have been taken into custody for a breach of the acknowledged privileges of this House, in bringing an action against Thomas Baker, for words which he spoke in the course of giving evidence before one of the Committees of this House. For that offence you have been committed to custody. You have presented a petition in which you have expressed your contrition, and you have also stated that you have given orders to discontinue the action. Their Lordships are disposed to deal leniently with you, and have, therefore, ordered that you be discharged out of custody on paying your fees.

Then he was taken from the bar.

Lord Brougham said, that, after the rebuke which he had received from his noble and learned Friend the junior law Lord, and almost the junior Peer in that House, he should take care not to fall into the same error again; for he might, peradventure, be committed himself for a breach of those privileges which were so notorious to-night, but which were stated to be unknown yesterday. He begged now to present a petition from Peter Taite Harbin, the attorney who had brought the action, stating that he had submitted the case to a gentleman of great legal acquirements, and by his advice had commenced the action; that he was not aware that he had committed a breach of privilege; that he regretted the course which he had taken, and had now abandoned the proceedings; he hoped, therefore, that their Lordships would pardon the offence which he had unintentionally committed, and order his discharge out of custody. He (Lord Brougham) begged, therefore, to move that the petitioner be discharged upon payment of his fees. He did not move that they should take the learned counsel into custody who was accessory before the fact, and who had certainly been guilty of as great a breach of privilege as the petitioner; but their Lordships would consult their interests by leaving him alone.

Lord Campbell thought enough had been done for the public good; and he had no doubt his noble and learned Friend (Lord Brougham), who felt so warmly on the subject, would pay the fees both of the attorney and the tobacconist.

Lord Brougham: I think I have done quite enough for the privileges of this House, in keeping my gravity during the operation which has lately been performed.

The said Peter Taite Harbin was then brought to the bar, and reprimanded in the following terms by

The Lord Chancellor: You have been taken into custody for a breach of the acknowledged privileges of this House. There are circumstances which would have led me to suppose that you had advisedly committed this offence. I will not, however, take upon myself to say that you have done so, for you have stated yourself that you did it in ignorance, and have expressed your contrition for the offence. You have also stated that you will discontinue the action, and their Lordships are of opinion that you ought to be discharged on paying your fees.

Then he was taken from the bar.

Lord Campbell gave notice that he would, early next Session, unless the Government or some Peer entitled to more weight than himself—being the junior law Lord and junior Peer in the House—did it before, introduce a Bill to enable their Lordships, and the other House of Parliament, when an action was brought in violation of their privileges, to stay such action in the same manner as actions were now stayed when they were brought for publishing Papers under the orders of their Lordships' House. Such a measure would give them the power which the Court of Chancery now had to stay proceedings.

SPANISH COLONIAL SUGAR.] The Earl of Clarendon: In calling the attention of your Lordships to the correspondence which has recently been laid upon the Table, and in asking your Lordships to agree to the Resolution which I shall have the honour to propose, I trust I need not assure the House that I am actuated by no party motive. Indeed, I am sure that my noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, will do me the justice to believe that no consideration whatever could induce me to treat of our relations with other countries in the spirit of a partisan; for, with respect to foreign affairs, I hold that our own domestic differences should always be laid aside, because we have all, be our political opinions what they may, a common interest in exhibiting ourselves to the world united, and in an attitude to command respect; and we are all equally concerned in advancing the interests, and, above everything, in upholding the dignity, and maintaining unsullied the honour and good faith of our country. Differences of opinion will of course arise as to the means by which these great national objects may be most effectually secured; but they should always be approached with the caution befitting their importance, and be discussed, not in the spirit of party, but in the spirit of men having a common purpose and a common interest in view. Such being my opinion, and feeling confidence, as I do, in the just and honourable character of my noble Friend, your Lordships will readily believe that a painful sense of duty alone could have induced me to call your attention to the correspondence which has lately taken place between my noble Friend and the Spanish Minister; involving, as I think it does, a question of national faith, and requiring, as I am sure it does, some further explanation, not alone for our own satisfaction, but in order to prove to the world that your Lordships, as well as Her Majesty's Government, are scrupulously mindful of the international duties of the country, and that no interested motives nor apprehended sacrifices could, for one moment, make us hesitate to recognise the solemn obligations of a Treaty; for I need not remind your Lordships, that by a Treaty the honour of a country is deliberately pledged, and that, as the engagements of a Treaty impose on the one hand a perfect obligation, so they produce on the other a perfect right. The breach of a Treaty is, therefore, a violation of the perfect right of the party with whom we have contracted, and is as evidently an act of injustice as to rob a man of his property. Treaties are the only means by which we can provide for international objects, and secure protection for the subjects, and advantages for the commerce of our country; and considering our extended relations in every part of the world, it is evident that no country is equally interested with our own—setting aside the duty which honour imposes—in maintaining inviolate the obligations of a Treaty. It may suit other Governments, whose ways are not always those of justice and integrity—and I could name instances—to evade such obligations when they find them onerous, and to defend themselves by sophistry and casuistical arguments, by which they deceive nobody, and least of all themselves; but such a course is not suited to us—our national character is placed on too high an eminence—our honour is too unsullied—our good faith in all our dealings is too universally acknowledged for us to tolerate the suspicion even, that either because we are dealing with a Power from whom we have nothing to fear, or because the consequences may be injurious to ourselves, we are about to evade the performance of a promise which, with reference either to its letter or its spirit, we are in duty bound to fulfil. I will not affirm that such has been our conduct; but I do say that the answer of my noble Friend is, to my mind, neither satisfactory nor conclusive to a claim which, as I read the Treaties, appears to me perfectly unquestionable. The Duke of Sotomayor, the Spanish Minister, in a decorous and well-argued note, claims, under the existing Treaties between the two countries, that the sugars of Cuba and Puerto Rico should be admitted to the same advantages as the sugars of the United States and Venezuela. The Duke of Sotomayor says—

"These Treaties have not only always been faithfully observed on the part of Spain, but the most favourable construction has always been put upon English claims, reliance being had on just reciprocity, as the necessary condition of the validity and consistency of those claims."

And here I must bear testimony to the perfect correctness of this assertion; for I myself, when at Madrid, had occasion to plead these Treaties in defence of some important British rights, and my claim was unhesitatingly admitted by the Spanish Government. Indeed, as I well considered the Sugar Bill of this year in its relation with foreign countries, and took some part in the debate upon it here, I feel almost ashamed of myself for having neglected to remind your Lordships of these Treaties; but I must say, I think it very little creditable to those by whom a Bill, involving such new and, as I consider, such dangerous principles, was prepared, that they should have been altogether ignorant, as they manifestly were, of the existence even of the numerous Treaties which bore directly upon the subject which it was their duty to investigate. In the early portions of my noble Friend's reply to the Duke of Sotomayor, I entirely agree. I think he is quite justified in saying that the course which her Majesty's Government have adopted in respect of the United States and Venezuela, proves that they have no wish to escape from the obligations of a Treaty, and claim no right to limit the operations of a commercial engagement. I think my noble Friend is quite right in passing over the Duke of Sotomayor's declaration, that his Government is determined to suppress the Slave Trade, not only as irrelevant to the question, but because, notwithstanding the Treaty that has recently been concluded, the Spanish Government cannot be considered to have any sincere desire to suppress the Slave Trade so long as they retain General O'Donnell as Captain General of Cuba. I possess authentic information, with which of course I shall not now trouble your Lordships, proving how largely General O'Donnell not only promotes, but actually participates in the Slave Trade, contrary to the wishes and the interests of the great majority of plantersin that island, but with the full knowledge of the Spanish Government; which is, therefore, indirectly abetting, and not sincerely endeavouring to suppress the Slave Trade. I think also that my noble Friend was quite right in not entertaining the Duke of Sotomayor's argument in support of his claim, founded upon the admission of the produce of the Philippine Islands; for that concession was manifestly made in furtherance of the principle (if principle it can be called) of our Sugar Bill, and, as my noble Friend says, most justly, had no reference whatever to the Treaties in force with Spain; for it is quite clear that Her Majesty's Government never gave them a thought, and were to all appearance ignorant of their existence. From all the rest of my noble Friend's note, I am compelled entirely to dissent; and I regret that his rejection of the Spanish claim should be based upon arguments so untenable, and that his name should be appended to a document which will reflect such discredit upon the country. Now I beg your Lordships' attention to Articles of the Treaties. [Lord Clarendon then read the 38th Article of the Treaty of 1667; the 9th Article of the Treaty of Utrecht, signed 13th of July, 1713; and the subsequent Treaty of Utrecht, signed December 9, 1713, by which it is stipulated that—

"The subjects of the respective Powers shall enjoy at least the same privileges, liberties, and immunities as to all duties, impositions, or customs whatsoever, relating to persons, goods, and merchandises, &c., and shall have the like favour in all things as the subjects of France, or any other foreign nation the most favoured, have, possess, and enjoy, or at any time hereafter may have, possess, or enjoy; and they shall not be bound to pay greater duties, or other imposts whatsoever for their imports or exports, than shall be exacted of, or paid by the subjects of the most favoured nation," &c.]

I defy any form of words to be more explicit than this; and yet my noble Friend says in his Note, he is satisfied that they are of no effect whatever in establishing a right on the part of Spain to that which she now claims, because by an Article in a Treaty of 1670, it appears that the West India Colonies of both countries are excepted from these general privileges, and the subjects of the two Powers are respectively forbidden to trade with those Colonies. It is perfectly true, that owing to there having been no new Treaty made between England and Spain since 1796, or rather since 1667, except Treaties ratifying and confirming prior stipulations, the words of the Treaty of 1670 remain unchanged; but it is equally true, that by the altered circumstances of the world, and of the relations between the two countries, they have, as I hope to prove to your Lordships, become entirely obsolete. The non-intercourse with the Spanish and British West Indies, and the granting of licenses to trade there by the respective Kings, are as much fallen into desuetude as the prohibition to the subjects, captains, and mariners of each confederate to sell and trade in the ports and havens which have castles, fortifications, and magazines; and the best proof of that is, that the respective subjects and mariners do sail, and have long sailed into ports having magazines and fortifications, and do trade freely, and have long since traded freely, and without any question of license, in the dominions of the respective Powers in the West Indies. To take our stand, therefore, upon the dead letter of a Treaty, which is so manifestly at variance with its spirit, and is so completely falsified by the everyday practice of many years, is, I must contend, a quibble in its worst form, and an evasion of an obligation so palpable, that I think it would not be listened to in any court of equity; and I am sure it would be utterly scouted by men of honour in their individual transactions with each other. It seems to me that in framing this part of his note, my noble Friend must have totally lost sight of the actual as well as the ancient relations of England with Cuba and Porto Rico. He appears to have forgotten that the prohibition which he refers to has never been at any time strictly maintained; for in this, as in all other instances, the wants and the interests of men have proved more powerful than the laws made to restrain them; and accordingly it will be found on reference to a work of great authority—that of Bryan Edwards—that in the early part of last century, so large a trade was carried on between Jamaica and the Spanish Colonies, that it employed 4,000 tons of British shipping, and furnished a market for 1,500,000*l.* worth of British goods; and that this commerce has always since been carried on with more or less interruption on the part of the respective Governments. My noble Friend appears not to be aware, that in 1767 the Spanish Government, becoming alarmed at our reaping the exclusive benefit of this trade, permitted

English goods to be sent to the West Indian possessions on payment of very moderate duties; that in 1766 the chief ports of Jamaica and Dominica were opened by Act of Parliament to all foreign vessels of a certain description; and that some years later the House of Commons passed a Resolution that the continuance of free ports in Jamaica would be highly beneficial to the trade and manufactures of the kingdom. Sugar and coffee, the produce of foreign Colonies, were then permitted to be imported in British vessels, and to be warehoused in this country, and re-exported free of duty; but if intended for home consumption, they were to pay the duties legally due at the time on the importation of such goods. Sugar and coffee, the produce of foreign plantations, were permitted to be imported in foreign vessels into the Bahama and Bermuda Islands under the Acts 27 and 30 George III.; and such goods, if carried from those islands to any other part of the British dominions, were to pay the duties which at the time were payable on foreign sugar and coffee. Your Lordships will, therefore, see that the intercourse between the Spanish and British West Indies has been clearly legalized by Acts of Parliament, even when our own navigation laws were de jure in full force. But I must also beg the House to bear in mind what are our actual relations with the Spanish West Indies:—That we have Consuls at different places in Cuba and Porto Rico, who have been long established there—that our exports to Cuba exceed 3,000,000 of dollars — that we import from thence to the amount of more than 9,000,000 of dollars, which is nearly double the exports of that island to the United States—that between 400 and 500 British ships trade annually with Cuba—that our commerce with Porto Rico is, in proportion, quite as great as that with Cuba, and that the shipping engaged in it, which, five years ago, amounted to nearly 1,100 tons, is annually increasing—and, lastly, that for upwards of twenty years since the alteration of our navigation laws, it has been legal, not only for an Englishman in English ships, but for a Spaniard in Spanish ships, to import into this country the produce of Cuba and Porto Rico. My noble Friend appears to have forgotten also that we do not hesitate to take annually a vast quantity of the copper of Cuba. Here we levy no differential duties: in this case, the old restriction to trade with Cuba is not thought of, because we want the copper—which is produced in a manner ten times more destructive to the life of the slave than the article, in order to prohibit which, we revive this restriction, and declare that the sugar of Cuba is inadmissible. But inadmissible how? Not for the purposes of exchange, for we take any quantity of it in exchange for our commodities—not for the purposes of manufacturing, for our warehouses are full of it, and our refineries depend upon it — not for the purpose of trade, for we buy the products of Germany and Russia with it; but it is solely inadmissible for the purpose of home consumption; and a dead letter of a restriction is dug up and brought to life, for nothing but the purpose of preventing Her Majesty's subjects from eating this polluted sugar. Yet with all these facts staring us in the face—facts which prove that the letter of the Article quoted by my noble Friend has fallen into complete desuetude, and that, consequently, we should alone be governed by the spirit of the Treaty of 1670, by which all the merchandise of Spanish subjects is placed upon the footing of the most favoured nation; I say, that with all these facts before us, to refer to a Treaty 170 years old, and to argue that under its provisions there is a sort of mare clausum round these islands, which renders them inaccessible to our traders, not as to their general products, but with respect to one commodity only, and one particular use of that commodity—does really exhibit an intrepidity in special pleading, which, as I said before, would be unavailing in any court of equity or honour, and which, I fear, would not have been resorted to in dealing with any Power from whose resentment we had any thing to apprehend; whereas the very weakness of Spain should have been an additional argument in favour of a generous and liberal interpretation of our engagements with her. My noble Friend lays great stress upon the Fourth Article of the Treaty of 1814, by which it is provided that—

"In the event of the commerce of the Spanish American possessions being opened to foreign nations, His Catholic Majesty promises that Great Britain shall be admitted to trade with those possessions as the most favoured nation."

And he argues, first, that it is evident from these words that the Spanish West Indian Colonies were not then open to Great Britain, or to foreign nations, and, consequently, that the general privileges conferred by the ancient Treaties could not apply in reference to the trade of those possessions; and, secondly, that at the negotiation of the Treaty of 1814, the ancient Treaties were not considered by Spain herself to confer the privileges for which she now contends. All this, however, proves nothing beyond the fact, that on both sides certain restrictions had been agreed upon mutually between the two countries, in regard to the trade with their respective Colonies; which restrictions, being applied equally to all nations, had nothing in them the least inconsistent with either the letter or the spirit of the Treaties. There was nothing in them to prevent Spain excluding English ships and commerce altogether from her Colonies; nor any thing to prevent the full exercise of our old navigation laws with respect to Spain, so long as they applied to all foreign countries alike. But the provisions of those Treaties did render it obligatory upon us, if we altered our laws in favour of any other nation, to do so equally towards Spain; and Spain was equally bound to remove her Colonial restrictions in our favour: if she did so for any other country and in 1814, the American Colonies being then in rebellion, and a prospect existing (though the prospect at that time in the eyes of Spain barely amounted to a possibility) of the trade between the other countries being opened, Spain, in perfect good faith, and in order to carry out the spirit of former Treaties, engaged that England should be admitted to trade with those possessions as the most favoured nation. And yet my hon. Friend now turns this concession, as it was then, against the Spanish Government, and says that, if the ancient Treaties revived by that of 1814, had given to the two nations a mutual and general right to the treatment of the most favoured nation, it would have been unnecessary for Spain to promise, that in the event of the American trade being open to foreign countries, Great Britain should be admitted to trade as the most favoured nation. Now, I do not think there can be a doubt in the mind of any rational man, that the provisions of the former Treaties would have amply sufficed to secure to us all the privileges of the most favoured nation in the West Indian Colonies, if the trade with them had been thrown open; but because, on account of the former restriction, we made security more secure, and probably insisted upon this Article in 1814, at a moment when, after the important services we had rendered to Spain, there was no difficulty in obtaining it, it does appear to me most unjust to draw from it the conclusion that Spain would have withheld from Great Britain the privileges she granted to other nations in respect to her American Colonies, which everybody capable of understanding those Treaties must know we should have considered a direct infraction of them, and should not for one single hour have tolerated. But my noble Friend is determined that whatever may have been the course pursued by Spain, whether she concedes her rights, or is forcibly deprived of them, no interpretation favourable to her shall be admitted. The Duke of Sotomayor contends that Spain has a right to be treated by Great Britain as a most favoured nation in regard to Colonial commerce, because Spain, in 1824, conceded to Great Britain, by Royal Decree, the liberty of trading with her South American Colonies; and he speaks of this Decree as the execution of the engagement taken by Spain in the Treaty of 1814. To this my noble Friend objects, and I agree with him, that the Decree makes no allusion to the Treaty. But it would have been improper, indeed, impossible to do so, because the Decree did not confer upon England alone, but upon all nations in alliance with Spain the privilege to trade with her Colonies; it did, however, concede to us every thing we could expect, or had a right to claim under the Treaty; and although my noble Friend speaks slightingly of the Decree, and treats it (as to a certain extent he is justified in doing) as an ex post facto measure, adopted only after the South American Provinces had passed from the authority of Spain, yet he must remember that it applies equally to Cuba and Puerto Rico, which were in a very different position from the South American Provinces. Cuba and Puerto Rico had not passed from the authority of Spain: they were not even in revolt; and the King of Spain might have withheld from Great Britain and all other nations the liberty of trading with those possessions. But he did grant it; and it is the trade with Cuba and Puerto Rico that is now in question, and not that with the South American Colonies; and with regard to those possessions of Spain, therefore, I contend that the Decree does warrant the construction put upon it by the Duke of Sotomayor. But my noble Friend won't hear of that either — and why?

Because we had already helped ourselves to what we had agreed should be conceded to us; or, in other words, as my noble Friend more diplomatically expresses it, the British Parliament, in 1822, had passed a law to regulate the trade between Spanish America and the British Colonies; and early in 1824, it was intimated that the recognition of the South American Provinces could not much longer be delayed. I say nothing of the political motives which brought about this recognition, or the new world that was called into existence to redress the balance of the old, and in punishment of the French invasion of Spain; but I do insist upon the fact that we had, long before this period, given a complete go-by to the restriction upon our trade with the Colonies of Spain—that we had embarked a large amount of capital there, and had considered the Treaty of 1670 to be obsolete. And I must beg the particular attention of the House to an extract from a Paper which was laid before Parliament, by command of Her Majesty, in March, 1824. It is the memorandum of a conference between Mr. Canning and the Prince de Polignac, respecting the South American Provinces; and after speaking of the appointment of Consuls in South America, Mr. Canning proceeds to state—

"That such appointments were absolutely necessary for the protection of British trade in those countries.

"That the old pretension of Spain to interdict all trade with those countries, was, in the opinion of the British Government, altogether obsolete; but that, even if attempted to be enforced against others, it was, with regard to Great Britain, clearly inapplicable.

"That permission to trade with the Spanish Colonies had been conceded to Great Britain in the year 1810, when the mediation of Great Britain between Spain and her Colonies was asked by Spain, and granted by Great Britain; that this mediation, indeed, was not afterwards employed, because Spain changed her counsel; but that it was not, therefore, practicable for Great Britain to withdraw commercial capital once embarked in Spanish America, and to desist from commercial intercourse once established.

"That it had been ever since distinctly understood that the trade was open to British subjects; and that the ancient coast laws of Spain were, so far as regarded them at least, tacitly repealed.

"That, in virtue of this understanding, redress had been demanded of Spain in 1822, for (among other grievances) seizures of vessels for alleged infringements of those laws; which redress the Spanish Government bound itself by a Convention (now in course of execution) to afford."

Yet, notwithstanding all this—notwithstanding that we first procured the abolition of the restriction in 1810 as the price of our mediation, which mediation we did not carry into effect, though we did not, in consequence, absolve Spain from the conditions upon which we undertook it—notwithstanding that we have taken for ourselves everything we wanted, regulated our own trade, and appointed our own Consuls—that we demanded, and obtained, compensation for the restrictive coast-laws of Spain having been applied for—notwithstanding that the King of Spain confirmed what we had done, as far as circumstances would permit him—for, in the words of his Decree, he confirmed "the state of things which had existed since 1820, and some time before;"—nevertheless, my noble Friend declares that he cannot now, twenty years after all this has taken place, and has been definitively settled, perceive that any obligation whatever, of a reciprocal character, is imposed on the Crown of Great Britain with regard to the trade between either country and the Colonies of the other; and he still claims the benefit of an obsolete restriction imposed 170 years ago. Is this generous? Is it just? Is it wise? Is it the fitting policy for a great and powerful country towards one that is feeble and defenceless? Is it the course which becomes a country that has hitherto justly prided itself upon its unblemished honour, and scrupulous observance of its obligations? Is it a prudent course for a country which is always proclaiming its liberality, and recommending its own example? I feel sure it is not; and upon questions such as these, I do with confidence appeal to the justice and generosity of your Lordships. But my noble Friend next proceeds to strengthen his case by reference to the Order in Council of 1828, which, he says, furnishes another proof, not only that Great Britain held that Spain had no right to be treated as a most-favoured nation in respect of Colonial trade, but that the Government of Her Catholic Majesty acquiesced in that view of the commercial relations of the two countries; and my noble Friend adds, that if Spain had considered that any of her existing Treaties conferred upon her the privileges of the most favoured nation with respect to Colonial trade, she would not have remained satisfied with the limited privileges granted by that Order, but would undoubtedly have demanded that the full privileges granted to other nations should also be accorded to her. But, so far from proving that Spain had no right to favour with respect to Colonial trade, I contend it proves the direct contrary; for upon what other ground than that of Spain's right to claim the privileges granted to foreign ships, were they granted to her, and not only granted, but without Spain having fulfilled the conditions required by the Acts of Parliament, and to which other nations had submitted? I suppose it will not be contended that we went about offering these important privileges to different Governments—a portion to some, and a portion to others—some Governments complying with the Acts of Parliament, others refusing. Of course we did no such thing; but, having granted them to some countries for our own accommodation, we could not refuse them to others who, as in the case of Spain, had a right to claim them. But my noble Friend says, that if Spain had considered that any of her existing Treaties conferred upon her the privileges of the most favoured nation, she would not have remained satisfied with the limited privileges granted by the Order in Council (not that I believe these privileges were limited in any respect), but would undoubtedly have demanded that the full privileges which had been accorded to other nations should be extended to her. Why, I have not the least doubt that the Spanish Government had entirely forgotten, or were wholly ignorant of, the old Treaties, distracted as they were by internal dissensions and the difficulties of administering the country after the French army of occupation had been withdrawn: and this is no improbable assumption, seeing that Her Majesty's Government, who have no such cares on their hands—though they are not altogether free from care—have just shown themselves equally forgetful and ignorant of those Treaties. But is this a reason why we should persist in doing wrong to Spain, and in turning to our own advantage her neglect of her interests? Does this bear out my noble Friend in his present objection, that Spain did not require enough? Before, his complaint was that she demanded too much; and I can only compare his course to that adopted by the big boy in the division of the cake among his little schoolfellows — he who asks, shan't have—he who doesn't ask, don't want; and when my noble Friend asserts that Spain quietly acquiesced in the limitation, it is just what the big boy would say when called to account for his injustice and selfishness—"Why, the little boys all held their tongues; they acquiesced in the principle I laid down, and thereby furnished strong proof that they were conscious they had no right to be placed on the footing of the most favoured boys—that is to say, the big boys, of whom I am afraid—with regard to the cake." But, seriously, are we prepared, upon reasoning such as this, to sully the national honour, and to deprive another country of its just rights? We must have done one of two things: we either, gratuitously and unasked, proffered these Colonial privileges to Spain, or we yielded them, on her demand, as a just right; and in either case, we committed a gross act of injustice, and violated the spirit of our Treaties, in not placing her on the same footing, in every respect, as the most favoured nation; and yet it is upon this very act of injustice, and the ignorance of Spain concerning her rights, or her impotence to enforce them, which we call her acquiescence, that we now found our claim to repeal the Act, and in a precisely way to slip out of our obligations. I now come to a passage in my noble Friend's note, which, desirous as I am to avoid the use of harsh expressions, I hardly know how to designate; but this I must say, that there is no part of the correspondence which I have read with the same regret, or with the same sense of humiliation; for my noble Friend's note will go forth to the world as a manifesto of English faith and English principle; and in every part of the world there can be but one opinion with respect to it. At the same time, however, I felt convinced that my noble Friend must know how weak a cause he was defending, when he stooped to argue it upon the ground that the Treaty of 1713, although it gives to Spanish subjects the rights of most favoured nations, does not extend to their produce. I cannot call this even casuistry or special pleading—I will not call it misrepresentation, because my noble Friend is perfectly incapable of it; but I must consider it a complete misconstruction of the Treaty. My noble Friend says that we are to treat as the subjects of the most favoured nation the subjects of Spain, but that there is no obligation to treat the produce of Spain as Great Britain is used to treat the produce of the most favoured nation; and we find this assertion contained in the same document in which is quoted the Ninth Act of the Treaty of Utrecht, which declares that Spanish subjects shall have the same privileges and immunities as to all duties and customs relating to goods and merchandises, and shall not pay greater duties for their imports or exports in the territory of Great Britain, than shall be exacted of or paid by the subjects of the most favoured nation! But, surely, my noble Friend must perceive that if his argument be good for anything, it is of general application—it is conclusive against Spain, and the produce of Spain, as well as of her Colonies, under every circumstance that we may choose to give this interpretation to the Treaties; for in them there is no limitation to Spanish European produce, and my noble Friend's argument is just as valid against the wines of Spain, as against the sugars of Cuba. This is, however, the first time that such a distinction between persons and produce was ever heard of; and our own practice towards Spain, and that of Spain towards us, would, I should have thought, been sufficient to prevent my noble Friend from establishing a precedent so mischievous and so discreditable. Why, in 1703, when under the Methuen Treaty, we reduced the duties on Portuguese wines, for the purpose of encouraging to the utmost our trade with Portugal, we did not hesitate to place the Spanish wines on the same footing; and not only the Spanish, but the Sicilian wines, as the King of Spain was also at that time King of the Two Sicilics; and to charge those of France, Germany, and all other places at a much higher rate, while English produce of all kinds enjoyed similar privileges in Spain. But now, according to my noble Friend's doctrine, we might reduce the duties on French and German, and all other wines, and refuse to do so on Spanish, but yet plead that we honourably fulfilled the Treaties by permitting Spaniards to bring wine from Bourdeaux or the Rhine to England at the reduced tariff, as their persons are to be protected from paying higher duties than the persons of other nations. And if Spain were now to follow the example we have set her, to adopt the arguments we are using, and henceforward to reduce the duties upon the salt fish of Sweden, the hardwares and cloths of Germany, the silks and cottons of France and Switzerland, as she will be perfectly justified in doing—and so far from blaming her (except as regards her own interests), I shall consider that she only acts with becoming spirit in thus applying our own principle to ourselves, and with perfect fairness reciprocating our policy;—I should like to know whether my noble Friend is prepared to tell British merchants, when they came to remonstrate against the Tariff of Spain, levelled as it would be against the productions of this country, that they had no locus standi, nor cause for complaint, as the subjects of Great Britain were in the full enjoyment of every advantage secured to them by the Treaty of Utrecht? I warn the people of Newfoundland, of Birmingham, of Sheffield and Manchester, to look to this; for they may rely upon it, the question is quite as much one of national interest as it is of national honour; and that the mere adoption of a modern form of words, such as those used in the Treaties with the United States and Venezuela, and referred to by my noble Friend, with respect to goods being the growth, produce, and manufacture of the respective countries, instead of the phraseology in use 150 years ago, but which has precisely the same meaning and intention, will not be sufficient to save us from the charge of deliberately violating our engagements, nor, on the other hand, of protecting us from the measures of retaliation which we shall deservedly bring upon ourselves. And having adverted to the United States, I would take leave to ask my noble Friend upon what principle he proceeded technically to apply to them the provisions of our Treaty, with reference to the Sugar Bill. The United States have only a right to be treated as the most favoured nation; and when they demanded that the sugar of Louisiana should be admitted on the same terms as those of Java, Manilla, and China, my noble Friend ought, if he adheres so rigidly to the letter and the technical meaning of Treaties, to have replied that we admitted the free-labour sugar of those countries, and were prepared to do the same for the United States, if they had any such commodity to send us. But my noble Friend at once acquiesced in the demand of the American Government, and we received the slave-grown sugar of Louisiana at the low duty. Now, may we not draw from this an inference that fear rather than justice guides our policy towards other nations, and that if the United States had been in the same powerless condition as Spain, we should not have received the slave-grown sugar of Louisiana; and that if we had been bound to Spain by vast commercial transactions, and by a territory only separated from our own by a nominal frontier, the Duke of Sotomayor might have found the Treaty of 1670 rather less stubborn and unbending than it has proved to him?

It was reserved, in short, for my noble Friend to prove, that, abroad as well as at home, we have one law for the rich and the powerful, and another for the poor and defenceless. My noble Friend must, however, bear in mind, when he draws such nice distinctions between persons and produce—distinctions that may be suited to the theological subtleties of the new Oxford school, but which should find no place in the arrangement of affairs of State—what are the words of the Treaty of 1670 upon which he lays so much stress. He must remember that they have relation only to the trade of the Colonies of the respective countries, but that they have no relation to the trade into the parent countries, carried on by the subjects of either, even though from the respective Colonies. If the Treaty of 1670 had been made last year, or last week, there is nothing in it to affect the present demand of the Spanish Government. True it is that we might not carry the fish of Newfoundland to Cuba, and that the sugar of Cuba could not be imported into Newfoundland; but there would be nothing to prevent the fish of Newfoundland from being sent to Spain, nor the sugar of Cuba to England, now that our old navigation laws have been altered: and at this moment there is nothing except the prohibitory duties imposed upon the sugars of Spain which prevents their being freely brought to this country, either in English or in Spanish ships. But these duties we have lowered in favour of other nations; and the Treaties provide that Spanish subjects shall be entitled to the same privilege as to all duties on their merchandise, as the subjects of the most favoured nations; and that if it shall happen in time to come, that any diminution of duties shall be granted by either side to any foreign nation, the subjects of each shall reciprocally and fully enjoy the same; and that they shall, in all lands and places, subject to the command of their respective Majesties, enjoy the same privileges as to duties which relate to wares and merchandise, as the most favoured nation uses and enjoys, or may use and enjoy for the future. We have granted the reduction of duties to other nations: the Spanish Government claims the same favour; and, I trust your Lordships will be of opinion, that their right to it is clear and unquestionable. Before I conclude, I must once more beg your Lordships to remember, that the Treaty of 1670, upon which my noble Friend mainly relies, is merely a stipulation between the two Powers, that their West Indian Colonies should be closed against each other, as they were against all other countries; or, in other words, it was a suspension, by mutual agreement, of those general rights to which the Colonies would otherwise, under the Treaties, have been entitled; and it is quite clear that the moment each party annulled the particular agreement, by which the general rights were held in suspension, those rights reverted to them by the Treaties. And as we ourselves chose to annul that particular agreement, not only for ourselves but for Spain—as the Spanish Decree of 1824 recognised our acts—as the Order in Council, of 1828, admitted the rights of Spain to Colonial privileges—and as the whole course of events for the last twenty years has entirely obliterated every trace and vestige of the limitation of 1670; yet the general Treaties subsisting in full force, it is clear that the Colonies are entitled to the general rights which had been restricted by the special agreement, just as if it had never existed. I have now, as briefly as I could, passed in review the arguments upon which the unfortunate determination of my noble Friend is founded: I know not whether I shall have induced your Lordships to take the same view of them as I do myself; but if not, I can only attribute it to my own want of ability, and not to any defect in the case which I have endeavoured to substantiate; for to my mind, it seems impossible to maintain those arguments, whether we read the Treaties in their strictest and most technical sense—whether we take them separately, or all in relation to each other; but of this, I am sure, that to strain those Treaties from their obvious and natural meaning, is unjust in itself and most impolitic on our part, at a moment when we are striving by every means in our power to liberalize the commercial policy of the world—when we are everywhere condemning differential duties, and the warfare of custom-houses—when we are endeavouring to establish relations favourable to ourselves by commercial Treaties with other nations, and to satisfy the daily increasing wants of our people, by finding fresh markets for their produce. God knows that in this we have obstacles and rivalries enough to contend against, without adding to them mistrust of our good faith, and the example of quibbles and special pleading, in order to support a law by which we propose to reform the social system of other countries. I have already trespassed too long upon the time of the House, to permit of my now attempting to show how utterly futile and inoperative for its professed object the Sugar Bill of last year must prove; but in support of which, we are now entangled in this unfortunate controversy with Spain. The results that were predicted of that Bill have already taken place: we have raised the price and increased the exportation of slave-grown sugar, in order to supply the place of the free-labour sugar, which we withdraw from neutral markets, where it meets the slave-grown sugar on equal terms; and it must be of course immaterial to the planters of Cuba and Brazil whether we bring their sugar here for home consumption, or for re exportation to Holland and Germany, in exchange for that description of sugar which, under the Bill of last year, we are now compelled to consume. By that Bill we have set an example of exclusive dealing, which we shall have occasion sorely to repent. In Brazil it has already cost us the loss of one of our best marekts, and the withdrawal of all those special rights, political and commercial, which British subjects formerly enjoyed. We must now prepare ourselves for similar results, as regards Spain and her Colonies: that, however, will only affect our interests; but I greatly fear, that the example we are now about to give, of how the obligations of a Treaty may be evaded, will affect us irreparably in that—which is far more precious than all our commercial interests together—the honour and good faith of our country; and it is for the purpose of averting this great evil, as far as lies in the power of your Lordships, that I ask your concurrence in the Resolution which I have now the honour to propose:—

"That in reference not merely to existing Treaties between Great Britain and Spain, but to the Regulations under which, subsequent to those Treaties, Commercial Intercourse has for many years been carried on between Her Majesty's Subjects and the Spanish Colonies, this House is of Opinion, that the Subjects of the Queen of Spain should continue to be permitted to import into the United Kingdom all the Productions of the Territories or Possessions of the Spanish Crown, paying thereupon no higher Duties of Customs than are paid by the Subjects or Citizens of the most favoured Nations upon the Importation of like Articles, being the Productions of the Territories or Possessions of such Nations.

The Earl of Aberdeen: My Lords, my noble Friend has strongly impressed on the House the duty and the necessity of strictly adhering to the faith of our Treaties; he has shown the greatest anxiety lest the honour and good faith of this country should be tarnished by any deviation from its engagements. My Lords, in that respect I entirely agree with my noble Friend. No person can be more deeply sensible than I am of the great importance of scrupulously adhering to such views; and perhaps, in the situation I have the honour to hold, it may be peculiarly incumbent on me to be alive to the obligations of the principles which he has stated. But, my Lords, I suspect that had it not been for the general policy of the Government, as connected with the Sugar Question of last year, we should not have heard much of this Spanish claim; I think, if the claim had been put forward in any other matter, it would not have met with the same support on the part of my noble Friend. I don't wish, nor is this the time, to enter into a discussion of the wisdom and propriety of the policy adopted by Her Majesty's Government on the question of Sugar Duties last year. My noble Friend has already denounced that measure as unjust and impolitic. I believe, on the other hand, it was a just and wise measure, with a view to contribute to the repression of the African Slave Trade; that it was fully justified by such motives; and that its result has not been such as has been represented by my noble Friend. On the contrary, it has succeeded in bringing into this country a large and increasing supply of sugar of free growth; and that there is every prospect of that supply being continually augmented, while the price has been kept down as much as could possibly have been anticipated. My noble Friend, if I understood him, does not deny that the trade with the Spanish Colonies was, until a recent period, under the operation of certain Treaties, practically excluded. A contraband trade, no doubt, more or less, existed; but that the trade was prohibited my noble Friend does not deny. He argues, however, that when the restriction was removed, twenty years ago, under the same Treaties, the right accrued to Spain, as a most favoured nation, to enjoy all those advantages which we have granted to any other nation. Now, when he says these ancient Treaties have been always observed by Spain, and that he has appealed to them, and found that the Spanish Government have listened to his representations, I must say I am astonished to hear such a statement; because, in the experience I have had, I have met with nothing but a rejection of the validity of these very ancient Treaties to which he refers, and a denial on the part of Spain that these Treaties were in force, or susceptible of the construction it is now ready to give them. Such has been the conduct of Spain throughout. In the first place, only let me recall to your Lordships' recollection the Family Compact—the Treaty concluded between France and Spain in 1671. Mark the observance that then took place of the Treaties with this country, which placed the two countries, as you say, on the footing of the most favoured nations. Observe the 24th and 25th Articles of the Family Compact. Here is the 24th Article:—

"The subjects of the high contracting parties shall be treated with respect to commerce and duties in each of the two kingdoms in Europe as the proper subjects of the country in which they live or resort to, so that the Spanish flag shall enjoy in France the same rights and prerogatives as the French flag; and in like manner the French flag shall be received with the same favour in Spain as the Spanish flag. The subjects of the two monarchs, in declaring their merchandise, shall pay the same duties which shall be paid by the natives. The importation shall be equally free to them as to the natural-born subjects; neither shall they pay any duty not paid by the natural-born subjects of the Sovereign; it being well understood that no other Foreign Power shall enjoy in Spain, any more than in France, any privilege more advantageous than that of the two nations."

Then, the 25th Article says:—

"If the high contracting parties shall hereafter conclude a Treaty of commerce with other Powers, and grant them, or have already granted them, in their courts or dominions, the treatment granted to the most favoured nation, notice shall be given to the said Powers that the treatment of Spaniards in France and in the Two Sicilies, and of the Neapolitans and Sicilians in France and in Spain, is excepted in that respect, and ought not to be quoted or cited as an example, their Most Christian and Catholic and Sicilian Majesties being unwilling that any other nation should partake of those privileges which they judge convenient for the reciprocal enjoyment of their several subjects."

Now, these are engagements entirely in violation of all the Treaties as interpreted by my noble Friend. And this Family Compact, recollect, was in existence; and, although not supported and readily acquiesced in by this country, it did receive an official recognition by the Parliament of this country; for the Seventh Article of Mr. Pitt's Commercial Treaty with France, in the year 1786, is as follows:—

"And it being the intention of the two high contracting parties, that their respective subjects should be, in the dominions of each other, upon a footing as advantageous as those of other European nations, they agree that, in case they shall hereafter grant any additional advantages in navigation or trade to any other European nation, they will reciprocally allow their said subjects to participate therein, without prejudice, however, to the advantages which they reserve, viz., France in favour of Spain, in consequence of the 24th Article of the Family Compact, signed the 10th of May, 1761; and England, according to what she has practised in conformity to, and in consequence of the Convention of 1703, between England and Portugal."

And, at the time, Mr. Fox bitterly reproached Mr. Pitt for having by this Article sanctioned the Family Compact, which had, to a certain degree, been so invalidated by succeeding Treaties. This country had, by this Treaty, recognised the right of France and Spain—for the conditions are reciprocal — we recognised the right of Spain to place France in a more favourable position than we enjoyed ourselves. So much for the observance of these Treaties by Spain in those days. But I maintain that it is to the course of practice by the two countries that we are to look for the true interpretation of these ancient Treaties. It is in vain to refer to the letter of these Treaties, many provisions of which are inconsistent and contradictory; but it is to the constant practice and conduct pursued in the execution of these Treaties by both parties that we are to look for their true interpretation. Now, my Lords, Spain has always resisted the obligation of these Treaties, even where it would appear their provisions were most clear and specific. For example, British merchants, by the very express terms of one of the Treaties—that of the year 1667—are exempted from certain contributions. The contributions are levied on them; we remonstrate; Spain says that these are old conditions—that the times are changed—that they no longer apply to a constitutional government, and that British subjects cannot expect to be better treated than Spanish subjects, notwithstanding the express provisions of the Treaty. They also maintain, that inasmuch as by one of the Treaties—that of 1783—it was stipulated that commercial arrangements should be entered into between the two Powers on the basis of reciprocity and mutual convenience, that engagement is as much in force now as at any former time; but that as there is no reciprocity they are not bound by the provisions of the Treaties to which my noble Friend refers. And so throughout we are met with a denial of the validity of any of these existing Treaties; and to the extent to which my noble Friend would press interpretation of them, this country has adopted the same right of construing them as Spain had done;—such has been the case on various occasions. For instance, my noble Friend says, that Spain has the same claim to be treated in British ports as the subjects of the most favoured nation. Very well. We make a reciprocity Treaty with France—we admit French ships into British ports as English ships—would Spain think of making such a demand? According to the argument of my noble Friend, Spain would have a right to demand that Spanish ships should be admitted into British ports upon as favourable terms as French ships are admitted.

The Earl of Clarendon: On the same conditions.

The Earl of Aberdeen: No, it is not on the same conditions. Their claim is to stand on the footing of the most favoured nation, without reference to conditions. That is quite a different subject. But they make no such demand; and for a very good reason. Of course, they could not make such a demand, because they impose heavy discriminating duties on our shipping. But, nevertheless, if the argument of my noble Friend were sound, it would entitle Spanish ships to be received in English ports as favourably as French ships. That would, undoubtedly, be the consequence of his argument if it were sound. I think that this is decisive with respect to the large claim put forward by the Spanish Minister, and supported by my noble Friend. I would beg, however, to ask a question of my noble Friend, who, I believe, had some concern in the transaction to which I am about to refer; at all events, it is perfectly well known that Her Majesty's late Government had proceeded very far in negotiating a Commercial Treaty with France; that Commercial Treaty I myself took up and carried also nearly to the point of conclusion. Well, that Commercial Treaty stipulated for a very large reduction in the duty on French wines; but did my noble Friend, did the late Government, or did the present Government ever think that it inferred the necessity of reducing the duty on Spanish wines? Never for one moment. Therefore your Lordships see, that Treaty, which might have been signed, and would have been signed, had it not been for the unfortunate events of the year 1840, which meet us so frequently in our relations with France — that Treaty would have been concluded, the duty on French wines would have been greatly lowered, and the duty on Spanish wines would have been a matter of negotiation with Spain, whether it should be reduced or not. So far advanced was that Treaty, that the late Chancellor of the Exchequer announced in the House of Commons the loss he expected to the Revenue in consequence of the reduction of the duty on French wines from that Treaty. Still more recently a Treaty was under negotiation with Portugal; that Treaty arrived very nearly to completion; unfortunately, at last, circumstances rendered it impossible to conclude it, but it had advanced very nearly to the point of conclusion; a large reduction of duty on Portugal wines was stipulated in that Treaty; but was it ever imagined for a moment that that could necessarily infer a reduction in the duty on Spanish wines? Never. It is very probable that a Commercial Treaty would have been made with Spain; and I well recollect that the Spanish Minister of that day, a very excellent and enlightened person, used to come to me repeatedly, with the greatest anxiety, to know the progress of our Treaty with Portugal; because, he said, if we succeeded in concluding a Treaty with Portugal, he had no doubt we should compel Spain to enter into a Commercial Treaty with us, which he was most anxious to see effected. But it was only as the result of negotiation and a Commercial Treaty, that he looked to any such a result; he never imagined that because we reduced the duty on Portugal wines, therefore Spain would have a right to claim an equal reduction. Such a thought never entered into his imagination. My Lords, there are various other instances in which this country has acted thus in the interpretation of these Treaties, besides those to which I have adverted. My noble Friend relies on the Treaty of 1667 as giving the Spanish Minister (although he does not refer to it by name, yet it is embodied in the Treaty of Utrecht, word for word, and therefore forms part of it—my noble Friend relies on that Treaty of 1667 as placing Spain on the footing of the most favoured nation. Why, only twenty years after the conclusion of that Treaty of 1667, in the first year of the reign of James II., in 1686, when that Treaty must have been supposed to be at least as well understood, so shortly after its conclusion, as it can be now, the Parliament of that day imposed a duty of 8*l.* a tun on French wine, and 12*l.* per tun on Spanish and all other wines. Undoubtedly, this country acted in the full exercise of its discretion in the application of these respective duties. But, still later, until a very recent period, the duty on Spanish tobacco was 6*s.* per pound, while the duty on United States tobacco was only 4*s.*; and this continued till 1822, when a general equalization of the duties took place. I may just mention another proof, which applies to Spanish wines as compared with Portugal wines. From the time of the Methuen Treaty down to 1787, there was a duty of 1*l.* per tun on Spanish wine higher than levied on Portugal wine; and the duties on Spanish and Portugal wines were equalized in 1787, and continued equal to the present time, with the exception of the interval between the 5th of July, 1809, and the 1st of January, 1813, during which period an additional duty of 12*l.* per tun was levied on Spanish red wine, which was repealed by the 53rd George III. Therefore, there is no doubt we have repeatedly, constantly, and in every mode, exercised an entire discretion in the relative proportion of duties imposed on Spanish produce. My noble Friend says that still, after the Colonial trade was opened, we were bound to admit the produce of Spain on the footing of the most favoured nation; and my noble Friend has given a representation of the mode in which the condition for admitting England to trade with the Spanish Colonies, was exacted from the Spanish Government. I am not here to say anything about the liberality or generosity of imposing such a condition; at the same time, I must say, that after the great services rendered to Spain previously, I suppose it may have been considered a not very unreasonable return, to stipulate that if the Spanish Colonial trade were opened at all, this country should enjoy equal advantages with other nations; the truth of the matter being, that Spain, on more than one occasion, had offered to this country to admit England to exclusive privileges in the Colonial trade. More than once, in consideration of assistance rendered to Spain for the recovery of her revolted Colonies, and for other services, the Spanish Government proposed to admit this country to exclusive privileges in that trade; but these proposals were invariably declined; and all that was stipulated for and exacted, was to be admitted to an equal footing with other countries. But this engagement on the part of Spain, it must be observed, is unilateral. There is no corresponding engagement on our part. You may say that is ungenerous and illiberal; but such is the fact; and I do not see that in the circumstances in which we were placed in relation to Spain at that time, there was anything unreasonable in the demand, even although we did make it in reference to that concession. At the same time, we entered into a stipulation with Spain, which I hope they will also observe, although I have seen some indications of a design elsewhere to defeat it. By a separate Article of the Treaty of 1814, we did exact that the Family Compact should never be renewed, nor any Treaty resembling it. The engagement in 1814 was, that when the Spanish Colonial trade was opened, we should stand on the footing of the most favoured nation. In the year 1824, by a decree of the Spanish Government, the trade with the Spanish Colonies was nominally opened. It is perfectly true, as my noble Friend observed, that before this, England had, although not officially, in the last diplomatic form, yet practically, recognised the independence of the Spanish Colonies. Consuls had been appointed: the Spanish Government were informed that the formal recognition could not be long delayed; and then the Decree of 1824 was issued—but not in compliance with the Treaty of 1814—not at all. The Decree was issued when the Spanish Government thought proper; when they thought it would suit their own convenience or the necessity of the case; and when they had done so, as a matter of course, and in consequence of the stipulation, they were admitted to whatever was granted to others on that occasion. But I must say, that so little did it appear that any obligation was imposed upon Great Britain in consequence of this so-called concession, that until the year 1828, no return whatever was made by this country to the concessions so acquired in 1824; and even in the year 1828, when the Order in Council was issued, it did not confer on Spain the full privileges of Colonial trade, but was couched in terms much less favourable than were applied to several other nations. It merely sanctioned a trade between the Colonies of Spain and the Colonial possessions of Great Britain. His noble Friend (the Earl of Clarendon) said that the Spanish Government did not remonstrate on that occasion, because they were ignorant of their rights. That is a strange reason to allege; it is not very likely to have been the case with Spain. As far as I have always seen, no country is more ready to make large pretensions than the Spanish Government. My noble Friend certainly may call this special pleading; but the question is the correct interpretation of the Treaty; and as this is a compact, of course it must be strictly examined and interpreted. I have shown you how the relations between the two countries have been understood, and the Treaties acted upon by both parties; and I, therefore, see nothing in the present relation of the two countries which can possibly justify Spain in claiming as a right the admission of her produce into British ports, which my noble Friend puts forth. My Lords, I will now say a few words on the last part of my noble Friend's speech, in which he treats with ineffable contempt the distinction which has been drawn between the rights granted to subjects of a State, and the manner in which the produce of that State is regarded. Now, in the first place, I must observe, that the Treaties with Spain to which my noble Friend has referred, and all the Treaties of that day, are framed on a very different basis from what exists at present. These Treaties stipulate in favour of personal privileges, and they have no reference to goods, except as connected with the persons possessing and dealing with those goods. By those Treaties, Spanish subjects were entitled to enjoy all the same privileges as the subjects of any other foreign country; whether in respect of their persons, their ships, or their goods; but with the produce apart from the ownership of it these Treaties have nothing to do. They have no reference to it. For instance, they say that any article whatever owned by a Spaniard, shall pay on coming into this country no more duty than the same article owned by a Frenchman; but they leave it entirely free to us to provide that the wine of Spain, for example, shall pay twice as much as the wine of France, if only it pays no more when in the hands of a Spaniard, than when in the hands of a Frenchman. The modern Treaties show that this distinction is real. Take the Turkish Treaty of 1838, which is one of the most recent. The Sublime Porte grants—

"All rights, privileges, and immunities which have been conferred on the subjects or ships of Great Britain by the existing Capitulations and Treaties, are confirmed now and for ever, except in as far as they may be specifically altered by the present Convention; and it is moreover expressly stipulated, that all rights, privileges, or immunities which the Sublime Porte now grants, or may hereafter grant, to the ships and subjects of any other Foreign Power, or which it may suffer the ships and subjects of any other Foreign Power to enjoy, shall be equally granted to, and exercised and enjoyed by, the subjects and ships of Great Britain."

And there are various passages to the same effect; and after all, there are additional Articles to the Treaty itself, in which it is provided that all articles being the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and its dependencies, and all merchandise brought in British vessels, being the property of British subjects, shall be so admitted. So that there are some large concessions to subjects and their ships and goods; but they do not include produce without reference to ownership, and that is the reason why, in the Treaty with the United States, there is an Article giving large privileges to subjects and inhabitants of the countries, their ships and goods; yet the Second Article provides that the duties imposed in the ports of Britain in Europe on articles the growth and produce of the United States, shall not be higher than those imposed upon those of other countries, this Article being quite irrespective of the privileges granted to subjects. So with Venezuela: Venezuela at first claimed exemption on the ground of her sugar being free grown; and I hope that in a very short time it will be so; but, upon inquiry, our Government considered that it could not be strictly called free-grown sugar, and the demand of Venezuela was consequently refused. Venezuela then put forward a claim founded upon this particular Article of the Treaty, which provides that no higher duties shall be imposed upon the produce and manufactures of Venezuela, than was imposed upon those of the most favoured nations; and their claim was at once conceded; and, I think, if it was not so, it would lead to much confusion and to absurd consequences; because, on what is the claim of my noble Friend founded? It must be founded at least on the relation to the subjects of the King of Spain, who had this right; but this right, under the Treaties, applying to Spanish subjects, has no reference to British subjects; because if Spanish subjects in Cuba were to have this right under the Treaty, it is clear that only Spanish subjects were intended to have it, and not British subjects. So that, suppose you admit, under the Treaty, my noble Friend's right of Spanish subjects, at the same time, under the operation of the same Treaty, you exclude the claim on the part of British subjects. Now, that is reducing it to an absurdity; it is impossible that it could be so intended. Therefore, it is clear, that the right was personal in its character, and did not apply to produce separate from ownership. I can only say that the subject has been carefully considered by Her Majesty's Government with reference to the tenor of the Treaties; and my noble Friend would fall into an error if he should suppose that this has been unadvisedly done, and that the Treaties have been newly discovered by us, and the effect and operation of them. As to the wisdom, or policy, or generosity, or liberality, of the proceeding, that is a matter which may be discussed if necessary, at another time; but, I must say, that according to the strict and authorized interpretation of Treaties, we have done nothing which is not just. I do not lay any claim to a liberal or a generous interpretation of the Treaties; but I say it is a justifiable interpretation with reference to the policy which Her Majesty's Government have adopted, and which has been sanctioned by this House and by Parliament. There is nothing in the interpretation of those Treaties which I do not think perfectly justifiable, and borne out by the letter of the Treaties themselves, and by the conduct of both parties for a long series of years; and this being the case, I do not think that we are at all liable to the imputation of my noble Friend, and I must oppose his Motion.

The Earl of Radnor said, that the course of the argument of the noble Earl was different from that which he had employed in his correspondence with the Duke of Sotomayor. With respect to the Treaties, according to the noble Earl's interpretation, the Treaty of 1667 had been set at nought nineteen or twenty years after; and yet he (Lord Radnor) found in the book which had been laid on the Table of the House by command of Her Majesty, that that Treaty had been renewed over and over again till 1783. What was the meaning of Treaties if they were to be held of no avail? It would be better to have no Treaty at all. He would ask any person of common sense who read the Treaty, whether on the face of it Spain was not to be entitled to all the advantages of the most favoured nation? He (Lord Radnor) read as a man of common sense, and he found that the Treaties of 1667 and 1713 had been revived up to 1786. But the noble Earl said—that was not his argument to-day—that the Treaty of 1670 overturned that of 1667. It did so in a particular point, and in that point only. But if their Lordships looked at the Treaty of 1670, it said nothing of the produce of the Spanish Colonies not being brought to the United Kingdom; and it was a curious fact, that in the book laid by Her Majesty's command before their Lordships, the Treaty of 1670 was given in part only, and those parts referred to by the Duke of Sotomayor did not appear. The Treaty said nothing of the produce of the Spanish West India Colonies not coming to the territories of the King of Great Britain; it prevented the sailing of vessels from the mother country to the Colonies, but it did not prevent the bringing of the produce of the Colonies to the mother country. With respect to the latter part of the noble Lord's argument, it justified what appeared to him a great injustice. Could any one of common sense believe that the Treaty did not intend, in speaking of subjects of a State, "their" produce and "their" trade? No man of common sense, in his opinion, in reading the Treaty, would not put a different interpretation from that put upon it by the noble Earl.

The Earl of Clarendon, in reply, said, his noble Friend (the Earl of Aberdeen) had stated that Spain had always denied the right which the Treaty gave us; but he (Lord Clarendon) could show the contrary, from his own personal experience. During the civil war, he had been in Spain, and he had, by means of the Treaty, prevented forced loans being exacted from British subjects resident in Spain. He had in his possession a very magnificent piece of plate which had been presented to him by the British merchants for preventing their being subjected to forced loans, solely on the ground of the Treaty. His noble Friend had said that the duties on Spanish wines had been increased at certain times; but these were the wines of places east of Malaga, in order to defray the expense of resisting the Algerian and Mediterranean pirates. He agreed with the noble Earl behind him, that there was a difference between the arguments used by his noble Friend to the Duke of Sotomayor, and in his speech to-night, which was somewhat in the tu quoque style—that the Treaty had been so often set at nought by Spain and by ourselves, that it was no matter how often it was violated. With respect to the fine distinction of his noble Friend about persons and produce, he appealed to their Lordships whether, although his noble Friend had said that the process of reasoning he employed had led his mind to the conclusion, they were not convinced, as he (Lord Clarendon) was, that the conclusion was not his own, by which he had adopted an opinion not very satisfactory in respect to the interpretation of the old Treaties, or to the spirit of the new ones.

LUNATICS.] House in Committee on the Lunatics Bill.

On Clause 3, relative to the appointment of the Commissioners,

Mr. T. Duncombe said, that this clause had better be postponed until they had got the returns from the Inspectors in Lunacy of the cost of visiting the several houses, and their state; but this was a part of the plan of keeping the House in the dark.

Lord Ashley said, that the only return not before the House was that of the amount paid to each Commissioner.

Sir C. Napier said, that before he received his half-pay he was obliged to make a declaration; and he did not see why these gentlemen should not be subjected to the same test before they received their salaries.

Mr. Warburton saw no use in the declaration.

Lord Ashley said, that the treasurer's accounts were a sufficient guarantee of the rectitude of the payments, and for the travelling expenses there was also sufficient evidence.

Mr. T. Duncombe said, that they ought to have paid Commissioners, responsible to the Government and the country, and not men who were part amateurs, and part professional, and who were responsible to nobody. Before they passed this clause, which made the Commission permanent, they ought to have evidence that the Commissioners had hitherto done their duty. He asserted that they had not. He thought they ought to see if they could not have a better Commission formed than at present existed. He would not press his Motion for the postponement of the clause, but would call upon the Chairman to read the clause at length.

Mr. V. Smith defended the conduct of the Commissioners generally, and especially with respect to the case of Mr. Percival.

Mr. Christie trusted the noble Lord would not only be induced to reconsider the present clause, but the effect of the Bill altogether. He was sorry that his hon. Friend the Member for Finsbury did not mean to press his Motion for postponing the clause.

Mr. Wakley felt convinced that the present Commission would never work well. He objected even to three Commissioners, believing that one Commissioner, who should be responsible to the Home Office for his actions, would do more good than three or even eleven Commissioners, of which the present Commission was composed. He thought that amateur Commissioners could never do that good for the public that one properly paid Commissioner could do. It had been asserted that insanity was a purely mental malady; now he asserted that in nine cases out of ten it arose from disease. There was no case of insanity without structural derangement. He trusted that the noble Lord would reconsider the clause with reference to the Commissioners, as he thought it might be framed in a manner that would operate far more beneficially to the public.

Sir C. Napier hoped the noble Lord would reconsider the clause. He considered that an unpaid board was not so good as a paid one.

Lord Ashley denied that unpaid Commissioners were not so competent to perform their duties as paid ones. For himself, he would say that when he entered the Commission he did so with a determination to do his duty; and he considered himself as responsible for the performance of those duties as if he had been paid a hundred guineas a visit. As to the statement of the hon. Member for Finsbury, that one Commissioner would be sufficient, he asserted, without fear of contradiction, that it would be impossible for one individual to perform such onerous duties.

Mr. Warburton agreed with the hon. Member for Finsbury, that paid Commissioners were better than unpaid ones; but, at the same time, he thought there should be unpaid gentlemen connected with the Commission, who would represent persons of moderate fortunes who were afflicted with insanity.

Mr. Hawes preferred a mixed board to one constituted of paid or of unpaid Commissioners alone.

Sir J. Graham was anxious that the Commissioners named in the clause should be continued in the Commission.

The Chairman then proceeded to read the clause, when

Mr. T. Duncombe again objected to the appointment of any unpaid Commissioners. He could see no advantage in having one of the Commissioners in the House; it would not make the Board more responsible. He wished to see them responsible to the Lord Chancellor or the Secretary of State. He would beg leave to move the omission of the names of the amateur Commissioners. The hon. Member moved to omit all the words mentioning the unpaid Commissioner.

Mr. Vernon Smith defended the appointment of the unpaid Commissioners. His duties as a Commissioner were so onerous that he was sure that it would be difficult, if not impossible, to induce the same number of gentlemen to supply their place if they were now to resign those offices.

Sir J. Graham contended that the appointment of unpaid Commissioners was desirable, because they were generally men without any professional bias—men of the world, and under the control of public opinion.

Sir R. Inglis said, there would always be found men in this country willing to undertake any sort of duties, however invidious, merely for the sake of the public good. He was sure, therefore, that there would always be a sufficient number of amateurs to undertake the office of Commissioners of Lunacy.

Mr. Duncombe had no idea of degrading any of the Commissoners by calling them amateurs. He was sure that paid Commissioners would be found to discharge their duties better and more fully. The present Board had visited various lunatic asylums about three or four times during the last eighteen months, and then always at an hour when he was sure that everything was prepared for their reception. They ought to go when they were not expected. He would beg to ask how many asylums the noble Lord, or any member of the Board, had visited lately?

Lord Ashley bore testimony to the zeal and activity of the unpaid Commissioners. He himself had, during the last year, taken the chair at the meetings of the Board thirty-four times, and each time the Board had sat no less than four hours.

The Committee divided on the Question, that the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question:—Ayes 45; Noes 6: Majority 39.

Clause again put.

Lord Ashley said, the appointments were all made without reference to any other feeling than that of completing the efficiency of the Board.

Mr. Christie protested against granting retiring pensions to individuals who had held the office of Commissioner, and while in that position had received very large salaries.

Mr. Wakley took the same view of the case, and contended, that after what the House had done last night, when it had openly declared that under no circumstances should relief be given to the able-bodied poor in Scotland, and that as soon as a poor man was deprived of employment, he was to support himself how he could, or starve along with his destitute family—after such a vote, to propose now large retiring pensions to men who had long held large salaries was preposterous.

Mr. T. Duncombe wished to hear from Lord Ashley the age of Dr. Turner, and the period of his service as a Commissioner. He might have been appointed fourteen and a-half years ago, and he was now, in six months, under this new Act, to receive a pension of 750*l.* When Dr. Turner first entered upon that office, he had no expectation of receiving any pension at all.

Lord Ashley could not tell the hon. Member for Finsbury the age of Dr. Turner; he should, at a guess, say he was about sixty-five; but he (Dr. Turner) was very well able to fulfil the duties of his office.

Sir J. Graham would take upon himself all the responsibility of having recommended these appointments to the Lord Chancellor.

Mr. Duncombe wished to know whether any arrangement had been made between the noble Lord (Lord Ashley) and those parties who had been put in nomination for those offices?

Lord Ashley said, that he had entered into no arrangements whatever.

Mr. Duncombe did not object to the payment of 1,500*l.* a year to the medical members of the Board; but he was strongly opposed to a similar sum being given annually to the legal members, who would be amply remunerated by a salary of 1,000*l.* a year. Police magistrates received a salary of 1,000*l.* a year, and had, into the bargain, to submit to a deduction of five per cent. for the purpose of forming a superannuation fund. He would, therefore, move, as an Amendment, "That the medical members of the Board do receive a salary of 1,500*l.*, and the legal members 1,000*l.* a year."

Mr. Hindley thought that 1,000*l.* a year would be enough for either class of Commissioners, and he would submit an Amendment to that effect. If the noble Lord would put an advertisement in The Times for a person competent to judge of cases of insanity, and offer 1,000*l.* a year, he would have so many applications that he would find it difficult to make the selection.

Lord Ashley said, that the sum of 1,500*l.* a year was mentioned, that they might be enabled to select the most talented and efficient persons to fill the offices of Commissioners.

Mr. Warburton suggested the adoption of a sliding scale of salary according to seniority.

Mr. Wakley differed from his hon. Colleague (Mr. Duncombe) as to the propriety of awarding a higher salary to the medical, than to the legal Commissioners. Such an arrangement would, in his opinion, be decidedly unjust. He would recommend that barristers should be appointed after five years standing at the Bar, and not after ten years.

Sir C. Napier contended that 1,000*l.* a year was quite sufficient for the services of the Commissioners, as the Lords of the Admiralty or the Treasury had no more.

Mr. Brotherton would give his vote for the larger salary, because it would provide men of greater efficiency.

Mr. Duncombe moved, as an Amendment to leave out the words "five hundred," so that the salaries should all be reduced to 1,000*l.*

The Committee divided on the Question, that the words "five hundred" stand part of the clause:—Ayes 31; Noes 7: Majority 24.

The Committee again divided on the Question, that the clause stand part of the Bill:—Ayes 31; Noes 10: Majority 21.

Clause agreed to.

The House resumed. Committee to sit again.

SPANISH COLONIAL SUGAR.] Viscount Palmerston rose to bring forward the Motion of which he had given notice. He said: The subject I am about to bring under the notice of the House is one of much importance both to the honour and the interests of the kingdom. It is of importance to its honour, inasmuch as it relates to the question whether Treaties and engagements entered into by the Crown, have or have not been faithfully fulfilled; and it bears upon the interests of the country, because it raises the question, whether commercial privileges and advantages which were secured to this country by ancient Treaties have or have not been wantonly rejected, and heedlessly thrown away. The question arises in consequence of the correspondence between the Spanish Minister at this Court and the British Government, copies of which were recently laid on the Table by command of Her Majesty. That correspondence relates to a claim made by the Government of Spain, that the sugars of Cuba and Porto Rico, the produce of slave labour, shall be admitted into this country at the same duties which are levied upon the sugars of other countries the produce of free labour, and upon the sugars of Venezuela and of the United States, the produce, like that of Cuba, of slave labour. This claim has been refused by Her Majesty's Government, and upon that refusal I think it necessary to make this Motion, because it is my opinion that the engagements of the Crown have not in this case been fulfilled; and being also of opinion that a great and unnecessary injury has been thereby done to the commercial interests of the country, I feel it my duty to ask the House, if it should concur with me in the views I have taken of this matter, to address the Crown, praying that a different course on this question may be pursued. Now, in order to bring the question in the clearest and most distinct manner under the attention of the House, I will shortly recapitulate the circumstances which have preceded and have led to this correspondence. It is fresh in the memory of everybody whom I have now the honour of addressing, that in 1841 Her Majesty's late Government thought it their duty to propose an alteration in the then existing scale of the Sugar Duties, believing that the change which they proposed to Parliament would tend to increase the Revenue—to give additional development to our commerce — and, by the increased supply, to reduce the price of what has become almost a necessary of life, and, consequently, to add to the comforts of the poorer classes of the people. The party then in opposition deemed that proposal of ours to be a fit occasion on which to make with us a trial of strength. They were confident in their increasing numbers in this House, and they believed that if they could raise a cry throughout the country in support of what they considered to be their majority in Parliament, they might succeed in driving us from power, and in occupying our places. Well, then, in order to raise this cry, they endeavoured to stigmatize our measure as calculated to give an additional encouragement to slavery and the Slave Trade. They said that, by opening a larger door for the admission of sugar produced by slave labour in the Colonies of foreign countries, we should raise the price of slave-labour sugar in the general market of the world, and that we should thereby give additional encouragement to the employment of slaves, and consequently to the Slave Trade. They succeeded in their attempt; we were defeated, and ultimately resigned our offices; and those who sat on the other side of the House succeeded to power. But they had not been long in power, before they came to the same conclusion at which we had arrived, namely, that a change in the Sugar Duties was expedient —that it would be for the interests of England to increase the quantity of sugar brought into this country for consumption by the people; and I am quite satisfied that if they had been free agents—if they had been fettered by no pledges either expressed or understood, towards those classes of men whom they had enlisted in their support in the battle they gave us on the Sugar Duties — if they had been embarrassed by no assertions made in debates as to the effect of a change of the Sugar Duties on slavery and the Slave Trade, I am convinced, in my own mind, judging from the very liberal free-trade doctrines which have lately been put forth by Members of the Government, whenever this question and other commercial matters have been discussed in this House—I am persuaded, I say, that if they had been entirely free agents, they would have proposed some measure very similar indeed in principle to that which we failed in recommending for the adoption of Parliament. But they were fettered by engagements—embarrassed by the doctrines they had laid down, and they were, therefore, obliged to tax their ingenuity to discover some measure which should, on the one hand, afford some relief to the consumer, by increasing the supply of foreign sugar; while, on the other hand, it should not too greatly alarm their West India supporters, and should not be too manifestly at variance with the principles they had laid down in objecting to the plan that we had proposed. They bethought themselves of a most notable expedient; they did not produce any measure which even pretended to have the effect of increasing the revenue, which ours would have done; but they proposed a measure which, while it should add a little to the supply of foreign sugar, should not add so much as to give just cause of alarm to the West Indian monopolists, or much encouragement to slavery and the Slave Trade. Their plan was to admit at a very low duty foreign sugar the produce of free labour, and to place a very high, and practically a prohibitory, duty on sugar the produce of slave labour; and they seemed to think this measure would accomplish every object which they professed, as a Government, to have in view. They were told that their measure would fail; and that it was founded on erroneous principles — on a total mistake. They were told that it was ridiculous to suppose that if we took, say 40,000 or 50,000 tons of sugar annually out of the general market of the world, where hitherto it had been consumed, we should not raise the price of the sugar which remained in the market, just the same whether the sugar so taken out by us was produced by free labour or by slave labour, and that as the measure thus tended to increase the price of sugar in the general market of the world, it was open to just the same objection—(as far as that objection was good for anything)—which they had made to our measure, namely, that, pro tanto, it would afford encouragement to the additional employment of slave labour. They were told that it would be just as absurd to maintain the contrary, as to assert that by taking out water from one end of a pond, you would not lower the level of the water at the other end of the pond. They were told that their measure was founded on a childish absurdity, and that it could not be practically executed. They were told that slave sugar would be brought into consumption here under the character of free-labour sugar, and that all their regulations and certificates would utterly fail to enforce the distinction which they wished to establish, and to prevent the evasion of their law. But they were told, moreover, that their measure would inevitably break down from another cause, the effects of which could not be avoided. They were warned that there were Foreign Powers which had with this country Treaties of commerce, whereby the subjects of those Powers were entitled, in their commercial dealings with this country, to enjoy all the privileges with respect to goods and duties which we might grant to the most favoured nation; and that if the sugar of any country was to be admitted at a lower rate of duty on account of its being produced by free labour, those Treaties would compel us to admit the slave-labo r sugar of other countries on a footing equally advantageous. I remember pressing this point upon their consideration generally; and my right hon. Friend the late Chancellor of the Exchequer more especially brought it under their attention in reference to the Treaty between this country and Denmark. The point, however, was treated very lightly by hon. Gentlemen opposite; and I remember especially that one of them, answered what I had said with arguments and statements which seemed quite satisfactory to him, but which, as far as I could understand them—which I cannot say I was able to do very clearly, did not seem to me at all to meet the case. In spite of all these objections, they passed their measure. What followed? Soon after their measure was passed, the State of Venezuela, having a Treaty with us by which it was entitled to be placed on the footing of the most favoured nation in its trade with this country, demanded that the sugar of Venezuela should be admitted to consumption in this country on the same footing as the sugars of Manilla, Java, and other free-labour countries. The Government took that claim into consideration; they found, on looking into the Treaty, that the claim was irresistible; it was accordingly admitted, and the slave-labour sugar of Venezuela was placed on the same footing of advantage as the free-labour sugars of Java and Manilla. Next came the United States. The United States have a Treaty with us, by which they are entitled, in their commerce with England, to be placed on the footing of the most favoured nation. They claimed similar privileges for the admission of their sugars. That claim was taken into consideration. The Treaties were examined: the claim was found to be unanswerable; and the slave-labour sugars of the United States were admitted into the market of this country on the same footing with the sugars of Venezuela, Java, and Manilla. Here were two great holes made in the system of the Government.

> "Look! in this place ran Cassius' dagger through;
> See what a rent the envious Casca made."

But at that time the "well-beloved Brutus" had not "dealt his deadly stab;" but the well-beloved Brutus did not long delay his fatal blow; and speedily after the concession to the United States, the well-beloved Brutus, in the person of General Narvaez, came with a demand that Spanish Colonial sugar, the slave-grown sugar of Cuba and Porto Rico, should be placed on the same footing, and should have the same advantages conceded to it in this country, as the sugar of the most favoured nations. This demand was made in a note from the Duke of Sotomayor, which cannot, I think, receive any sufficient and satisfactory answer. But some answer it was necessary to give; and as it would have been too ludicrous for the Government to have their whole measure torn to tatters, rag by rag, they determined to find some pretence or other for refusing this claim. Accordingly, not the Foreign Office—for I acquit the noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Office of having invented the note which was sent in reply: I differ from that noble Lord on most points of foreign policy, but I respect him individually too highly to believe that he could have invented the arguments contained in the note to which he has put his name; and I only regret that the over-easiness of disposition which I find fault with in his transactions with Foreign Powers, should have led him in this case to put his name to arguments which his better judgment must repudiate. Accordingly, I say, from Her Majesty's Government there came an answer rejecting the demand of the Duke de Sotomayor. I think that answer full of fallacies—I will not say palpable fallacies, because, that fallacies should be palpable, the arguments on which they rest should be plain and easy to be understood; whereas I defy any man to comprehend the drift, and scope, and meaning of the arguments in this note, without reading it over and over again three or four times with the utmost intensity of attention. I have myself done so, and having thus arrived at what I consider to be an understanding of the document, I am prepared to state that it is not only full of fallacies, but that it is a curious and remarkable illustration of what has been called by some legerdemain logic, which consists in this—that in the course of an argument one of the parties, arguing skilfully, slips in some new word, some new phrase or expression, nearly, to all outward appearance, resembling that from which the argument started, but which, nevertheless, differs from it in some point essential to the right solution of the original question; and, making this exchange while his adversary's attention is engaged by the chain of argument, founds his superstructure on the substituted expression, and comes thereby to a conclusion at which he could not possibly have arrived by means of the premises from which he set out. I shall be able, I think, to convince the House that this is strictly the character of the document of which I am speaking. First, let us look at the note of the Duke of Sotomayor. The Duke of Sotomayor demands that the sugars of Cuba and Porto Rico, though the produce of slave labour, shall be admitted into this country at the same duty as that paid by the sugar of the most favoured nation. He founds that demand on ancient Treaties, formally contracted between the two countries, and especially on the Treaties of 1667 and 1713. The terms of the Treaties to which he thus more particularly alludes, are certainly as strong as well can be; and though it is tedious to the House to hear documents of this kind read, yet I must ask permission to read those portions of the Treaties on which the Duke de Sotomayor founds his demand. It is essential to the case that I should do so. And, first, let me refer to the Treaty of 1667. The Thirty-eighth Article of that Treaty runs thus:—

"It is agreed and concluded, that the people and subjects of the King of Great Britain and of the King of Spain, shall have and enjoy in the respective lands, seas, ports, havens, roads, and territories of the one or the other, and in all places whatsoever, the same privileges, securities, liberties, and immunities, whether they concern their persons or trade, with all the beneficial clauses and circumstances which have been granted, or shall be hereafter granted, by either of the said Kings, to the Most Christian King, the States-General of the United Provinces, the Hanse Towns, or any other Kingdom or State whatsoever, in as full, ample, and beneficial a manner as if the same were particularly mentioned and inserted in his Treaty."

Thus far the Treaty of 1667. Next comes the Treaty of 1713, which the Duke relies upon in making out his claim. There were two Treaties with Spain in 1713, both signed at Utrecht, the first in July, and the second in December; and both of these distinctly sanction, beyond, as it seems to me, a possibility of doubt, the demand made by the Spanish Minister. The Ninth Article of the first of these Treaties is in these terms:—

"It is further agreed and concluded as a general rule, that all and singular the subjects of each kingdom shall, in all countries and places on both sides, have and enjoy at least the same privileges, liberties, and immunities as to all duties, impositions, or customs whatsoever, relating to persons, goods, and merchandises, ships, freight, seamen, navigation, and commerce, and shall have the like favour in all things as the subjects of France or any other foreign nation the most favoured have, possess, and enjoy, or at any time hereafter may have, possess, or enjoy."

By the Treaty of December following, the Treaty of peace, commerce, and alliance concluded with Spain is ratified and confirmed; and "for the greater strengthening and confirmation of the same," that Article was inserted word for word. But, as if that were not enough, the Second Article of the Treaty is in these words:—

"The subjects of their Majesties, trading respectively in the dominions of their said Majesties, shall not be bound to pay greater duties or other imposts whatsoever, for their imports or exports, than shall be exacted of, and paid by, the subjects of the most favoured nation; and if it shall happen in time to come that any diminution of duties, or other advantages, shall be granted by either side to any foreign nation, the subjects of each Crown shall reciprocally and fully enjoy the same. And as it has been agreed, as is above-mentioned, concerning the rates of duties, so it is ordained as a general rule between their Majesties, that all and every one of their subjects shall, in all lands and places subject to the command of their respective Majesties, use and enjoy at least the same privileges, liberties, and immunities, concerning all imposts or duties whatsoever, which relate to persons, wares, merchandise, ships, freighting, mariners, navigation, and commerce, and enjoy the same favour in all things (as well in the courts of justice as in all those things which relate to trade, or any other right whatsoever) as the most favoured nation uses and enjoys, or may use and enjoy for the future, as is explained more at large in the Thirty-eighth Article of the Treaty of 1667, which is specially inserted in the foregoing Article."

Now, I must own, that if I had been set to draw up Articles which were in the most full and comprehensive manner possible to secure to the subjects of two countries, in their trade with each other, the privileges and advantages of the most favoured nation, I should have been at a loss to have devised words more full and more comprehensive than those which I have quoted—more clear, more distinct, more unmistakable. Proceeding in his argument, the Duke anticipates two objections which might be offered by the Government of Great Britain. And, first, he foresees the possibility that some distinction might be set up between the Colonies of Spain and the mother country, and this possible distinction he meets thus:—

"You cannot make use of that objection, because you have admitted on the terms set forth the produce of our Colonies of the Philippine Islands, by exempting the sugars of those islands specifically from the high duties which are the object of the present application, and therefore it is not because Cuba is a Colony that you can resist my demand."

The other objection contemplated by the Duke is this:—

"You may, perhaps, tell us, that your recent laws make a distinction between sugar manufactured by slaves, and sugar the produce of free labour. But," replies the Duke, "on the part of my Government I deny that a difference in the mode of manufacture constitutes any valid ground on which you can take your stand in maintaining a difference of duty. The Treaty admits of no such difference on any such ground."

I think the Duke's reply to the anticipated objection quite unanswerable, while it is borne out by the practices of this country. The Duke says—

"You cannot set aside the provisions of long-established Treaties made by both countries by an enactment unilateral, made by one party without the consent of the other; you cannot thus establish a practice which is fatal to a claim founded on Treaties made by mutual consent."

But the practice of England itself affords an answer to the supposed argument thus met by the Duke; for I ask, have not we ourselves, over and over again, maintained the same principle as that asserted in the Duke's note? We have contended that the process by which an article is manufactured is not a just ground for making a distinction with respect to duties to be levied upon it. We have maintained this frequently. We have said that the perfection or imperfection of an article is a fair and just ground of making such a distinction; but that the particular process of manufacture was not. In 1816, for example, when the United States of America imposed a heavier duty upon bars and bolts of iron manufactured by the process of rolling, than that which was imposed upon bars and bolts manufactured by hammering, we instructed Sir Charles Bagot, then our Minister at Washington, to object to that duty, and to say that bars and bolts of iron were, to all intents and purposes, like articles, whether hammered or rolled, and that they ought to be taxed in a like degree, and that the distinction which the United States sought to make was at variance with their Treaties with this country. The result of this representation was, that the United States did not persist in maintaining a heavier duty on iron bars and bolts which were rolled, than on those which were subjected to the process of hammering; and consequently, made the duties which were paid on the bars and bolts of iron manufactured in this country, the same as upon the same articles exported from Sweden and Russia. The argument by which the Government now defend their differential duty is, indeed, palpably erroneous. But if it were otherwise—if it were well founded, then I ask, why was it not used when the Government was regulating the Sugar Duties with the United States and Venezuela? Why did they not then say, that there ought to be a higher duty on sugar manufactured in one way, than on that which was manufactured in another way, but which was of the same quality? If there be any force in the argument, it ought to have been urged when the United States were pressing their claims; and the Government of this country should then have said that the slave-grown sugar of the United States was not a like commodity with the free-grown sugar of other countries, and, therefore, their claim must be rejected. The Government of this country did not, however, at that period, treat the subject in so off-hand a manner as they do now with respect to Spain; and accordingly they admitted sugar which was the produce of slave labour, as a like article to that which, being of the same quality, was the produce of free labour. This decision, in reference to the sugar of the United States and Venezuela, has been urged on the part of Spain. She has quoted the Treaties that we formerly made with her—and of which I have read extracts, and she has demanded that her sugar should be admitted on the same favourable terms as the sugar of other countries. Then comes the answer of the Government; and, in adverting to it, I must admit that they are placed in a very embarrassing situation; for it cannot be denied that if they are to admit the claim of Spain, and allow her sugar to come in upon the same terms as the sugar of the United States, their doctrines and distinctions would be blown to shivers, and there would be an end of their vaunted measure with respect to sugar and the Slave Trade. The only peg would be gone upon which they can hang the last remnant of their political consistency: they would then be, perhaps, exposed to a little laughter—to a joke—or a taunt across the Table—to a newspaper skit—to a taunt on the hustings—things painful enough, I admit, to the feelings of public men, but which ought not for a moment to stand in the way when the honour or the interest of the country is concerned. To such things they must submit, rather than sacrifice the character of the country. These are my views of the course which they ought to have taken; and I do not hesitate to say, that if I were in their place it would be the course which I should take. There is a point, however, beyond which the most elastic vapour cannot be condensed, and there is also a point beyond which even this Government cannot go in concession. They said, "We have been foiled by Venezuela and by the United States, but we must take our stand on the case of Spain, and refuse her the rights we have acknowledged to belong to the others." They accordingly gave an answer and a refusal; and who they called to their aid on that occasion Heaven only knows! but I do not envy them their adviser. I admit, however, that there was some ingenuity in their answer, as I shall presently show. The first point on which that answer was founded was an admission of the full effect, in commercial matters, of the Treaties of 1667 and 1713 (which they dispute in a subsequent part of their statement, apparently for the sake of argument), and an admission of the full effect which Spain claimed for the Treaties of 1667 and 1713; but they follow up that admission by a statement that a Treaty between this country and Spain, which was made in 1670—a Treaty intermediate between those of 1667 and 1713, and confirmed by subsequent Treaties, even by that of 1814—prevented the application of the two Treaties of which Spain claims the fulfilment; and in the manner in which this portion of the question is treated in their answer, we have a very ingenious instance of that species of legerdemain in argument which I have already described.

They state that the Treaties of 1667 and 1713 do not apply to the West India trade. Here is a convenient generality of expression, which conceals from the eyes of the observer the inapplicability of the Treaty of 1670 to the question; and this affords another instance to show how parties can in such arguments arrive, by making changes in succession of terms, at a higher point of assertion than that with which they began. They first say that the Treaty of 1670 "excepts" the West India Colonies of both countries from the privileges which are secured by the Treaty of 1667 for the mother countries—Spain and Great Britain. They then go further in their assertion as they proceed, and say, the Treaty (1670) "expressly excludes" the West India Colonies; and lower down they go further still, and say, that the Treaty (1670) contains a "special exclusion" of the West India Colonies of both countries. Now, I say, that this is an entirely false assertion, and wholly at variance with the intention and the words of the Treaty of 1670. What is the claim of Spain? Spain claims that Spanish subjects residing in Cuba may be allowed to bring their sugars into the United Kingdom, and that those sugars may be admitted at as low a rate of duty as the sugars of the most favoured nation. Is there a single word in the Treaty of 1670, on which the answer which has been given to Spain so strongly relies, which goes to prevent Spain from enjoying that advantage which she claims from this country? [Mr. Gladstone: Read the 8th Article of the Treaty.] I am going to read it, but before I do so I will ask, is that Treaty of 1670 a Commercial Treaty? No such thing. It is a Political Treaty, entered into for the purpose of putting an end to the hostilities which then prevailed between the Colonies of Spain and Great Britain in the West Indies and America, whilst the mother countries were at peace. What was the title of the Treaty. Was it—

"a Treaty between the kingdom of Spain and Great Britain, for the purpose of excluding the Colonies of the two countries from the commercial advantages which were secured to the Mother Countries under the Treaty of 1667?"

No such thing. The Treaty recites the depredations which had taken place in the West Indies and America, and it proceeds to establish peace in America between the two nations. What is the preamble of the Treaty? Let me remark, that preambles to Treaties explain, in a great measure, the intention and object of the Treaties; and therefore, if the object of the Treaty was that which the Government, in their answer to Spain, imply, its preamble ought to be: "That whereas, according to the Treaty of 1667, between Spain and Great Britain, each nation was to give to the other the privileges of the most favoured nation, and whereas it has become necessary to exclude the West Indian and American possessions of both countries from these benefits, be it declared so and so." But what is the preamble? The preamble sets forth that—

"Inasmuch as the good feeling between Great Britain and Spain had been interrupted in America, this Treaty was intended to re-establish the good understanding which before existed between Spain and Great Britain," &c.

The First Article in the Treaty confirms the Treaty of 1667, so far as it does not conflict with the Articles of the Treaty of 1670; and then we come to the Second Article, which is of considerable importance, it is to this effect:—

"That there shall be a universal peace, true and sincere amity in America, as in the other parts of the world, between the Most Serene Kings of Great Britain and Spain, their heirs and successors, and between the kingdoms, states, plantations, colonies, forts, cities, islands, and dominions, without any distinction of place, belonging unto either of them; and between the people and inhabitants, under their respective obedience, which shall endure from this day for ever, and be observed inviolably, as well by land as by sea and fresh waters, so as to promote each the welfare and advantage of the other, and favour and assist one another with mutual love; and that everywhere, as well in those remoter countries as in those that are nearer, the faithful offices of good neighbourhood and friendship may be exercised and increased between them."

This Article shows that the object of the Treaty was the termination of hostilities, and not restrictions of commerce. Then comes the Eighth Article, on which the Government so much rely, and it declares that—

"The subjects and inhabitants, captains, masters of ships, mariners of the kingdoms, provinces, and dominions of each confederate respectively, shall abstain and forbear to sail and trade in the ports and havens which have fortifications, castles, magazines or warehouses, and in all other places whatsoever, possessed by the other party in the West Indies; to wit, natives of Great Britain shall not sail unto, and trade in, the havens and places which the Catholic King holdeth in the said Indies; nor in like manner shall the subjects of the King of Spain sail unto, or trade in, those places which are possessed there by the King of Great Britain."

What does that Article mean? It means plainly this, and only this, that British subjects were not to traffic and navigate to the Colonial possessions of Spain, and that, in like manner, Spanish subjects were not to traffic with or navigate to the Colonial possessions of Great Britain; but there is not a word in any of these Articles which says that the inhabitants of the Colonial possessions of Spain may not navigate to the ports of the United Kingdom, or that the inhabitants of the Colonial possessions of Great Britain may not navigate to the ports of Spain, without obstacle. There is not a word in that Treaty which goes to prevent the inhabitants of the Colonial possessions of either country from sailing or navigating to the European territory of the other; and so clearly was this understood on both sides, that for a long time there has been an extensive and direct trade with Spain in fish and other articles, from our Colonies in North America. There is nothing in the Treaty of 1670 which, if it were now in full force, would militate against the demands of Spain—those demands being, not that British subjects should trade to the Colonies of Spain, but that the Colonies of Spain should be permitted to trade with the United Kingdom. It has been contended, forsooth, as a proof of the restrictive effect of the Treaty, that this traffic has not existed. True; but why? Was it prevented by the Treaty of 1670? No, the navigation of inhabitants of the Spanish Colonists to this country was not prevented by that Treaty. It was prevented by our own navigation laws, and by the Colonial laws of Spain—it was prevented by laws of the two countries which were not founded on commercial doctrines, but on other principles—laws, the object of which, on our side, was to preserve a nursery for British seamen; and, on the part of Spain, by political jealousies and other causes; but the Treaty of 1670 did not, and could not, prevent, if it were now in force, the inhabitants of Spanish Colonial possessions from trading to the United Kingdom. I admit, at once, that if our old navigation law were still in force, that might be given as an answer to Spain, if she demanded what she could not demand under the Treaty of 1670—if she demanded to send the produce in question from Spanish ports to the ports of the United Kingdom. ["No, no."] Then, I am to understand that, if she demanded to send her Colonial sugars from Corunna and Bilbao, she might import them hither. [Mr. Gladstone: She could not make such a claim.] That is the ground upon which I base this argument. I say, that if Spain claimed that right, the answer to which I have adverted, founded on our navigation laws, might be given to her. But it is contended by the Government, that the Treaty of 1670 prevented any traffic from the West Indian possessions of Spain to Great Britain; and I say, that it is impossible the Treaty could have any such interpretation. But even if there were anything in the Treaty of 1670 to prevent such a traffic, is that Treaty still in force? I say it is not, for this reason, namely, that the two parties reserved to themselves the right to make any change which they might feel necessary with respect to the commercial interests of both countries; and there was a short Treaty made in 1809, or, I believe, in 1810, establishing peace between the two countries of Spain and England, to which Treaty there was an additional Article, stating that if a greater latitude of commercial freedom were, after that Treaty to be given by Spain to any foreign country, the same latitude should be extended to England. What did the King of Spain do in 1822? In 1822, he issued a Decree on the subject of the commerce of foreign countries with his American dominions, and the First Article of that Decree stated—

"A direct commerce shall be maintained in my American dominions with the subjects of countries who are the friends of Spain, and they shall be admitted to trade there in the same manner as in the ports of Spain."

Now, from that time the Treaty of 1670 was annulled, so far as this Decree places the trade of foreign nations with the Colonies of Spain on the same footing as in Spain itself. Then we issued the Orders in Council, which have been so much discussed in the Government note; and here I do not profess to understand the argument of the Government, but it either says this, that the Order in Council of 1828 did not give Spain, in regard to the trade with our West Indian Colonies, all that Spain had given us with regard to her American Colonies—that is one interpretation; and if the Government adhere to that interpretation, then I say, their argument is no argument against the claim of Spain; for the footing of the most favoured nation is not the footing of reciprocity between contracting parties. Those two conditions of intercourse are quite different things; and Spain claims, in this case, the footing of the most favoured nation, and not the footing of reciprocity. But, secondly, the Government argument may mean that the Order in Council did not give all the advantages to Spain that we gave to any other country. That is the other interpretation; and that, I think, is not a well-founded asssertion, because I am not aware that we had given to any other countries more than we gave to Spain; but I take the argument of the Government to be, that because Spain has acquiesced in being placed, by that Order in Council, in a less advantageous position than some other countries, she is, therefore, bound by her own acquiescence, and cannot now demand the footing of the most favoured nation. But this is an argument which cannot be maintained; for there have often been circumstances in which nations have submitted to put up with a less advantageous state of things than they were strictly entitled to insist upon, owing to temporary causes; but that cannot divest them of their rights, according to the faith that prevails among nations. It may happen that a Government, by inadvertence, may for a time submit to receive less advantage from a Treaty than she ought to get, but that inadvertence could not be considered as permanently binding; and if afterwards she took advantage of the Treaty, and, for the maintenance of her rights, claimed a more favourable construction of the Treaty, it would not be just to bind her by an occasional acquiescence in the less favourable construction, in order to deprive her of the advantage to which she might, by the true letter of the Treaty, be entitled. If any British Government, for instance, in the weakness of the moment, had foregone rights to which this country was entitled with relation to a foreign country, Parliament would not listen for an instant to the suggestion that we were to be deprived of our Treaty rights by that temporary acquiescence. Then I say, that the argument founded on the assumed acquiescence of Spain in our Order of Council utterly fails. I have already shown that the argument founded on the assumption that the Treaty of 1670 deprived the West Indian possessions of Spain of the advantages which Spain claims for them under the Treaties of 1667 and 1713, is totally at variance with the object and terms of that Treaty. It did not exclude the Colonies of Spain or England from trading to the mother country of the other coneracting party; it deprived England of the advantage of trading in her own vessels to the Spanish Colonies directly, and Spain of the advantage of trading directly to the British Colonies in her own vessels; but it did not prevent the inhabitants of the Colonies from trading directly to the mother country on either side. That is the answer to the first objection put forward by the Government; and I now come to another example of the dexterous substitution of one word for another in the course of the argument. By the Treaty of 1814, an engagement was entered into that bound the King of Spain to prevent his subjects from carrying on the Slave Trade, except for the purpose of supplying slaves to be employed in his own Colonies; and by the same Treaty the King of Great Britain was bound to take the most effectual measures to prevent his subjects from supplying arms, ammunition, or warlike stores to the revolted subjects of Spain in America; and in reference to that Treaty the note of our Government says, that—

"The engagement in the Treaty of 1814 was concluded in the expectation that the troubles and disturbances which then prevailed in the Spanish-American provinces would cease, and that the subjects of those provinces would return to their allegiance to the lawful Sovereign;"

and the note says that His Britannic Majesty engaged, under that expectation, to take —"the most effectual measures for preventing his subjects from furnishing arms, ammunition, or any other warlike article, to the revolted States in America."

Now, it is right, when words are quoted, that they should be quoted correctly; and therefore I must state that there is no such word as "expectation" mentioned, on the part of His Britannic Majesty, in 1814, with respect to the termination of the disturbances in Spanish America. The Treaty states that His Britannic Majesty was "anxious" that the subjects of the King of Spain should return to their allegiance; but there was no expression of expectation that such a result would take place. It is a very different thing to say that His Britannic Majesty was "anxious" that the subjects of the King of Spain in South America should return to their allegiance, and to say that he "expected" that result. The distinction is very important; for the word "expectation" would lead to the idea that Spain had taken us in by holding out to us at that time the expectation that she could keep all her Colonial possessions, whereas, in fact, she had been able only to keep Cuba. I deny, then, that the Treaty of 1670 is a bar to the claim of Spain; and I now come to the argument which the Government applies to the Treaties of 1667 and 1713, namely, that they give the advantage claimed by Spain for the produce of her West Indian possessions, to "persons" only, and do not confer them on Spain as regards her "productions." This argument has been the subject of much animadversion; and every man with whom I have talked upon the subject, has expressed his astonishment that an argument so like the shift of a pettifogging village attorney should have been introduced into an official document of the British Government. But the first argument founded on the Treaty of 1670 was so weak that it was indefensible; and, therefore, the Government was obliged to seek another argument on which they might rest their case; and as their first argument was rotten and unsound, this pettifogging quibble, about "persons," and "productions," was really essential to their case; and from the off-hand way in which it is played off, people not accustomed to consider the meaning of the language of Treaties, might think there was something in it. Why, certainly, the word "productions" is not to be found in the Treaties of 1667 and 1713; but will any man of candour and plain sense read the Articles of those Treaties, and say their meaning is not perfectly clear and palpable? The Treaties give to each of the two countries the advantages which are to be given to the most favoured nation in matters of trade and commerce, in regard to duties, wares, commodities, and all other things; and I ask any man to read those words, and say, if in plain and honest dealing between nation and nation, between man and man, there exists the least ground for the assertion, that not productions, but persons only, are meant to be included in the advantages agreed to be given by each nation to the other. What is the construction which the Government put upon these words? They say that Spain has Treaties with this country by which we agreed that she should not pay higher duties on her imports into this country than those which shall be paid by the most favoured nation, but that those Treaties do not state what imports we were to permit Spain so to send. That argument reminds me of what happened to a friend of mine at an election. He canvassed an elector, and the man promised him his vote, but when the day of election came, the elector voted against him. He was astonished at this conduct, and he said to the man—"You voted against me." "Yes, I did," said the elector. "But you promised that you would vote for me." "Yes," answered the elector, "I did; but I did not say when." That is the argument which the Government use towards Spain. They admit that, according to Treaties, Spain has a right to claim that her imports into this country should be placed in regard to duty on the same footing as the imports of the most favoured nation; but, say they, the Treaties do not specify what those imports are to consist of, and therefore the right is to be of no use to Spain. They say that the Treaties do not specify the productions of Spain. Do they, then, mean to say that it applies to the produce of other countries to be imported by Spain into this country? Their language, then, to Spain is, "Your Treaties entitle you to pay upon your imports those duties only which are paid by the most favoured nation on their imports; but your Treaties do not say what your imports are to be. We are at liberty to decide that, and we therefore tell you that you may import the sugars of Venezuela and of the United States on the same terms on which those nations import their own sugar; but there is nothing in your bond which enables you to import your own sugar on those terms." Such an argument is a disgrace to us, and a mockery of the meaning of those Treaties. When Spain says she is entitled to the same favours as other nations, the answer is, that we did not give these advantages to the United States as a favour, but as a right. That answer cannot be sufficient, for we promised the same rights as the most favoured nation in all things whatever regarding duties, wares, merchandises; and yet, in the face of all this, in defiance of words which are as plain as language can be, you turn round and say that the terms apply to persons, and not to productions. I think I have shown that the answer which was given by the Government to this demand on the part of the Government of Spain, is at variance with the plain and simple meaning which any man of common sense would attach to the terms of the Treaty; and if I am told that this matter has been referred to the Crown lawyers, I say that their opinion upon such a question is not of greater value than the opinion of any other man. It is not a question of law, but a question of honesty. It does not turn on the equivocal construction of a point of law, or on the value of a precedent—it turns on the ordinary meaning of the plain words in which the Treaties are framed. We are, however, to understand from the answer of the Government to Spain, that the Treaties between Spain and England, in virtue of which Spain claims those rights, apply to persons and not to productions; and that it would be consistent with those Treaties to impose heavier duties on sugar which was a Spanish production, than on sugar which was the produce of other countries. It is contended that, under the Treaties with Spain, we are entitled to impose heavier duties on produce imported from the possessions of Spain, than upon the like articles the produce of other countries. Does the Government and does this House see the full bearing of that interpretation? The Spanish Government, in a note to this Government, demands at our hands the proper fulfilment of our engagement, that neither country will tax the imports of the other any higher than the imports of the most favoured nation. We reject that claim. We say that each party is at liberty, under the Treaties of 1667 and 1713, to impose what duties it pleases on the imports of the other. If that doctrine had been laid down by Spain, and we had been unable to gainsay it according to the fair construction of Treaties, the Spanish Government might have inflicted a great injury on our commerce; but, as it was the result of a Treaty, we should have been bound to submit to it. But that this Government, which affects to be so favourable to commerce, should, of its own accord, put forward such a doctrine, is strange indeed. That it should come from those who were always attacking me in my office for not being sufficiently attentive to and watchful of the interests of British commerce—that they should deliberately force upon Spain a construction so pregnant with evil to British commerce on these Treaties, is indeed a matter of astonishment. You have by this doctrine untied the hands of Spain. You have torn to pieces the Treaties of 1667, and of 1713. Is there no danger in that? Why, Sir, these very Papers, which have been delivered to us only at three o'clock in the afternoon of this day, and which one has scarcely had time to read through, shows that there is a question now pending between this country and Spain, arising from an attempt on the part of Spain to levy heavier duties on the commerce of Great Britain than on that of other nations; that she has attempted to levy a heavier duty on the linens of Great Britain than on the linens of Belgium, and on our ships than on the ships of France. I lay my life, that if the Government interpretation of these Treaties stands good, we shall have the influence of other countries exerted in Spain to put our trade under ban as far as they can exert it; and we shall lose our trade with Spain, as we are now losing it with Brazil, in consequence of the absurd tariff and mischievous policy of our Government. There has always been much difficulty in our commercial relations with Spain. There has been a constant struggle going on there between English commerce and the commerce of France and of other countries. But we have always stood upon our right to equality, and that was our security. Already do we labour under disadvantages with regard to Spain, incident to our geographical position; for, from the numerous prohibitions which enter into the commercial policy of Spain, smuggling is carried on to a large extent, and the nations nearest to Spain are the best able to smuggle across her frontier. In addition to this, we shall now have prohibitions placed upon our goods, whilst lower duties will be put upon the goods of other countries. Whatever may be the value of the trade of Spain—and I hold it to be extremely valuable, and susceptible of a great increase under a good understanding between the two countries—whatever may be the value of that trade, it may be truly affirmed that, as far as our interpretation of diplomatic engagement goes, we have materially crippled, if not destroyed it. My objection to the course which the Government has thought fit to pursue, rests upon these considerations. We have broken faith with Spain, and broken faith, too, without even that poor but too common excuse, which may sometimes be pleaded with effect in popular assemblies, namely, that it was the interest of the country to do so. We have broken faith for the mere pleasure of so doing. We have, besides, set an example which will assuredly be productive of evil to us, even beyond our relations with Spain. Hitherto, England has preached to all other countries freedom of commerce and equality of privilege. "All we want," we have said, "is a fair stage and no favour. Put us on only a footing of equality. We ask for no peculiar privileges; all we require is, that you will not distinguish between us and others to our disadvantage; and that you will put us on the footing of the most favoured nation." Here we are now actually rejecting the footing of the most favoured nation; and with what face can we now go to any other country which puts us on a footing of inferiority, and propose to them that they should, with reference to us, pursue a course the very reverse of that which we ourselves have followed? The right hon. Baronet (Sir R. Peel) stated, I think, a short time after he came into office, that the great motive which animated himself and his Colleagues in going through the labours they had to perform, was the hope of posthumous fame. Posthumous fame they will assuredly have; but it will not be the fame of the early Cæsars, who carried to the confines of the habitable portion of the globe the arms, and arts, and civilization of the Roman empire—but the less enviable fame of their degenerate successors, under whose feeble and impotent sway the god Terminus was driven back, step by step, till he took refuge under the walls of the imperial city. They might have secured to themselves the honourable fame of having extended the comforts and increased the prosperity of the people whom they have been appointed to govern. But what have they been doing during the four years they have been in office? Why, they have been busily employed in sacrificing more great national interests than, I think, it has ever yet fallen to the lot of any Government to abandon during an equal period of the administration of the affairs of this country. They began by sacrificing the territorial rights of the country in North America. They surrendered, in that quarter of the world, territories, our right to which had been successfully maintained in argument by all former Governments, and which had, I venture to say, been practically proved by their immediate predecessors, by a survey of the country itself. By this sacrifice they commenced their career of inglorious and mischievous concession; and they made it upon impressions utterly unfounded, and impelled by fears utterly unworthy of a British Government. They have sacrificed the commercial interests of the country in the Brazilian trade, in the Spanish trade, and, I fear, also in other quarters about to follow, and all for the purpose of maintaining a favourite crotchet, based upon hypocritical pretences. They have sacrificed, too, that mutual Right of Search with France, for the suppression of the Slave Trade, which former Governments had laboured in vain to accomplish; and which had at last been obtained by their immediate predecessors as the best reward and acknowledgment which England asked for services of some value, which she had been able to render to France. They have sacrificed that natural right merely to give to a Ministry in France a temporary prop, which is no longer wanted; and it was a right which they might so well have maintained, for it was not liable to the invidious imputation, that it was a pretence for securing any advantage, military or commercial, to this country. There was no interest but the interest of humanity, which led us to attach the slightest value to that right. That right is now surrendered; and the interests of humanity, the dictates of justice, the laws of God, and the duties of man, have been forgotten, because it was convenient to the British Government, and to the French Ministry. But the Government has reserved for the last a sacrifice of interests purely English; and on the present occasion they have sacrificed the good name, the faith, and character of this country—that good name, that faith, and that character which had hitherto outlived all the storms through which England has had to pass, and all the difficulties which she has had to encounter; for whether her arms were defeated or triumphant—whether her diplomatists, at the termination of hostilities, were, as some have alleged, in the habit of losing by the pen what had previously been gained by the sword—or whether they were successful in maintaining the advantages which had been acquired in war, the good faith and high honour of England have never before been justly called in question. I remember that Mr. Wilberforce, in discussing our relations with Foreign Powers, stated that the reason why, in his opinion, we did not come successfully out of our negotiations with them was this, that we were too honest to deal with the Governments of the Continent. If Mr. Wilberforce had lived until this day, he would, in the first place, have retracted the imputation which that saying cast upon the Governments of Europe; but if he had read this note, he would most assuredly have looked for some other reason than that assigned by him to account for any disadvantage under which we might labour in our diplomatic intercourse with foreign Governments. In this instance, the Government have given a bad reason for a bad course. They have broken those Treaties, and the relations consequent thereupon, which it was the country's interest and their own duty to have maintained. They have set an example which, if followed up by other countries, will be productive of incalculable injury to England. They have given up the securities which, for nearly two centuries, the trade and commerce of this country enjoyed in its relations with Spain; and they have done this for no purpose on earth except to afford to the Government a hollow pretence for maintaining a distinction founded on no intelligible ground, not even successful for the purpose for which it was established. They would have done far better if they had abandoned this distinction, even though they by so doing might have exposed themselves to temporary difficulties; because, by giving it up, they would have maintained the good faith of the country, and have upheld its commercial interests; and whatever might have been the sneers to which, for a moment, they might have been exposed, the satisfaction of their own consciences, and the approbation of the country, would have been their sufficient reward. Thinking, then, that the answer given to the demand of the Spanish Minister, and that the decision come to by the Government, are not founded on the true interpretation of the Treaties which bear upon the question, and being of opinion that the course which the Government have taken, is one which is highly detrimental to the commercial interests of this country, I call upon the House to concur with me in addressing the Crown to take, in this matter, an opposite and a different course. The noble Lord concluded by submitting the following Motion:—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, stating that this House have taken into their consideration the Papers which, by Her Majesty's gracious Command, have lately been laid before them, containing Copies of a Correspondence which has recently taken place between the Spanish Minister at Her Majesty's Court and Her Majesty's Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, on the subject of a claim made by the Spanish Government, in virtue of the Treaties subsisting between the Crowns of Great Britain and of Spain; and praying Her Majesty to direct that the subjects of the Queen of Spain should be permitted to import into the United Kingdom all the productions of the Territories or Possessions of the Spanish Crown, paying thereupon no higher Duties of Customs than are paid by the subjects or citizens of the most favoured Nations, on the importation of like articles being the production of the Territories or Possessions of such Nations."

Mr. Gladstone hoped the House would not consider him guilty of officious presumption in rising at that period of the debate to state those arguments which appeared to him conclusive against the Motion of the noble Lord (Palmerston); for although the House would properly look to the Government for a defence against the serious charges which the noble Lord had preferred against them, and although he had not now the honour of being a Member of the Government, yet he was conscious of his share of the responsibility which attached to the measure of the Government with respect to the Sugar Duties; and he freely and at once admitted that the responsibility of having joined in their recommendation involved him in a share of the responsibility which now attached to the refusal on the part of the Government of the demand of Spain.

Conscious as he was of that responsibility, he had no disposition whatever to shrink from it. He assented freely to the doctrine of the noble Lord, when he declared that the engagements of this country should be construed in an honourable spirit, and that advantage should not be taken of mere verbal accidents to escape the plain and obvious effect of Treaties. He would not now follow the noble Lord in much that he had addressed to the House. While he professed he was surprised at the paucity of the facts adduced by the noble Lord, compared with the immense field which he had to traverse, he found that although the noble Lord had not had time to examine many matters which threw great light upon this subject, the noble Lord had found time to collect and discuss matter on which he founded two attacks upon the Government; one an historical record of all that had taken place in respect of these matters since the present Government came into office, and the other a dissertation upon the subject of the Right of Search, upon the Ashburton Treaty, and upon a variety of other matters totally unconnected with the merits of this question, except in the mind of the noble Lord, who, urged by his tenacious animosity against the Government, against the sense of even those around him, could not help advancing again and again these often refuted charges. He thought the noble Lord would have approached the present subject under circumstances of greater advantage had the noble Lord for once been content (though it would have been a severe sacrifice for the noble Lord to make) to abstain from these party discussions, and confine himself to the great question before the House. The noble Lord said that Her Majesty's Government had broken faith with the Crown of Spain, and broken faith without even the wretched apology which a breach of faith might receive from the circumstance that it seemed to secure some great commercial advantage; that they had broken faith, in fact, in opposition to the palpable and obvious interests of their own country. These measures had never been defended on the ground of convenience to the commercial interests of the country; but the noble Lord, in insisting on the injurious or inconvenient effects of them upon commerce, left it to be collected that they were advocated on the ground of their tending to promote commerce, and not upon the ground of different and higher obligations. The noble Lord might have assumed that the very obviousness of some of the inconveniences he complained of, must have led to a more searching examination of them than he chose to give Ministers credit for, had they been founded on commercial principles. But the House had to examine a subject which was affected by no less than twelve separate commercial Treaties —Treaties which were illustrative of our commercial history, practice, and law for a period extending over 200 years. After stating this, he should endeavour, without one word, if he could avoid it, of party bitterness or retort on the noble Lord, to toil patiently through all the circumstances with which he was acquainted, and which appeared to throw any light upon the subject. Before laying down his propositions, however, he ought to state that he himself was alone responsible for them —that he manifestly could not be authorized to state the case of the Government —that he presented his arguments, simply as arguments drawn according to his own personal view and judgment, from materials and documents which were before the House, or accessible to it. In that light he hoped they would be received and judged of by the House, and by them as arguments, he for one, at least, was ready to abide. He should undertake to prove to the House three propositions: propositions quite independent of one another. He believed that he should prove each and all of them incontestably: but even if his argument failed in any one, it would in no degree weaken either of the other two conclusions. He would prove, firstly, that the Treaties on which the claim of Spain was founded, were not in absolute and unqualified operation. Secondly, that if they were, still they did not bind either country to admit the produce of the other upon the terms of the most favoured nation. Thirdly, that whether they did or did not contain this stipulation generally, it did not extend to the Colonial possessions to which the present discussion related. The first of his propositions, then, was this: he was ready to contend that it certainly was unwarrantable, perhaps extravagant, to state that the Treaties on which the noble Lord had founded the case of Spain, were, at this moment, fully and unconditionally in operation. He would not undertake to say—very far from it—that they were altogether annulled; he would not undertake to state to what precise degree they still had force or a binding effect; but he would show certain circumstances which made it plain that whatever these Treaties might be, they were distinguished in very important respects, as regarded the universality and stringency of their application, from the generality of the Treaties which stood upon the list of our national engagements. The noble Lord had stated the case of those Treaties very clearly. He had gone to the authentic source, and read from he Treaties themselves the most important of the Articles upon which the claim of Spain was founded. He would not so far trouble the House as to particularize each and every one of the Treaties by which the earlier Treaties were confirmed; but he believed that, for one cause or another, he should be obliged to refer to most of them in the course of his argument; for the present it was enough for him to say, that, up to 1763, they stood as a complete code, each Treaty confirming, generally, the provisions of former ones, and likewise adding, more or less, of new matter to them. They were confirmed afresh in 1763 in the most absolute form—namely, by the recital in extenso of the Treaty of 1687, which was the most important of them all. Then he came to 1783; and the Treaty of that year contained a new confirmation, which, although it was much less formal and precise than the confirmation of 1763—for it did not recite the instrument, nor refer to all the details and particulars, yet it did state that the former Treaties were to be taken as the basis of that Treaty, and that they were to be "religiously (he believed that was the expression) observed." But now he came to the commencement of the circumstances that began to establish the difference for which he contended. In the Treaty of 1783, there was an engagement between the two parties that they should forthwith name commissaries of note to treat concerning their interests; and the Ninth Article of the Treaty of Versailles, in which this engagement was embodied, was founded upon the basis of reciprocity and mutual convenience. If that were taken alone, it had but little effect upon the obligatory character of the previous Treaties, because they were confirmed; but accompanying this Treaty were two simultaneous declarations of the negotiators of the two parties. Now to these two declarations the noble Lord made no allusion whatever. He did not pretend to be learned in the law of nations; but he thought that the terms and tenor of the declarations, the circumstance that they proceeded not from one but both parties, and that they were simultaneous with the conclusion of the Treaty itself, would show to the House that they were documents of considerable importance, and had a bearing upon the force to be assigned to the main instruments themselves. For instance, with regard to the British declaration, that drew a clear distinction between the different classes of provisions contained in all the former Treaties. It divided them into the classes, first, of personal privileges, secondly, of commercial regulations, and declared expressly, that, whilst the personal privileges ought to be unalterable, the commercial regulations ought to be subject to alteration from time to time, and that it was only with regard to commercial regulations that the then Sovereign of Great Britain would consent to an alteration of the Treaties. He now turned to the Spanish declaration, and he found that that was evidently meant to cover a state of things in which those old Treaties were habitually set aside—and set aside according to both their spirit and their letter. He would not say universally, but "set aside" both in spirit and letter, with regard to the great commercial regulations which the noble Lord had brought under the consideration of the House to-night, if their letter or their spirit in any degree possessed the character which the noble Lord had assigned to them, on which he should have more to say presently, or, indeed, according to any reasonable construction of them. The Spanish declaration stated—

"The intention of His Catholic Majesty is not in any manner to cancel all the stipulations contained in the above-mentioned Treaties. He declares, on the contrary, from henceforth, that he is disposed to maintain all the privileges, facilities, and advantages expressed in the old Treaties, as far as they shall be reciprocal, or compensated by equivalent advantages."

The Spanish negotiator pointed to reciprocal advantages, as the basis of the commercial part of the Treaties. The noble Lord had justly stated, that what was called the most favoured nation clause, was something essentially distinct from the reciprocity Treaties. The old Treaties with Spain were not treaties of reciprocity. There was no reference whatever in them to the question of equality of imposts, as between the subjects of the one country, and those of the other. What was stipulated for was, that the subjects of each country should be treated by the other in a manner as favourable as the subjects of any other Power. Spain, however, proposed in 1783 to negotiate no longer upon the old footing of the most favoured nation, but upon the footing of reciprocity, by which she evidently meant to establish in form an existing and recognised practice. Spain had referred to previous negotiation; and he was perfectly right in saying, that she had at the same moment also referred to the existing and established practice between the two countries. The established practice, was not the practice of one or two years, nor that which might be attempted to be imposed by a powerful upon a weak State; nor was it one of those questionable examples which, he would add with the noble Lord, it was unjust and improper to draw into precedents. It was a practice on her side of at least twenty-two years' duration, agreed upon between equal and independent Powers. In 1761 the Family Compact was formed; and in that year, Spain, France, and Naples agreed to place one another mutually upon the same footing, not of the most favoured nation out of that circle, but on a footing of absolute equality, each with the other two. The practice of Spain for twenty-two years previously, had been upon this basis of reciprocity with France and Naples, while it was perfectly plain that, according to the most favoured nation clause, she was bound to have admitted us also to that equality. The intentions of Spain in 1783 were, that at length she should legalize what had been her practice for twenty-two years, by embodying it in the provisions of the Treaty. He had now shown what was the practice of Spain; and he would proceed to show the House something like an acknowledgment of it on the part of England. In 1786, this country framed an admirable Commercial Treaty with France; and in that Treaty there was the most favoured nation clause. But the most favoured nation clause contained an exception. On the side of England, France permitted England to introduce an exception in favour of the Methuen Treaty; and, on the side of France, England permitted France to introduce an exception in favour of the Family Compact with Spain. He, therefore, insisted that Mr. Pitt, when he permitted France to fulfil, in regard to Spain, the conditions of the Family Compact, recognised, by the most formal, public, and solemn act, the validity of that compact; and that compact which, as he had shown the House, had established an exclusive equality in Spain between French, and Neapolitan, and Spanish subjects; and that, too, in the face of Treaties with this country which placed us, according to the apparent meaning, on the footing of the most favoured nation. When they came down to 1809, they found that the first thing done was to ma e an engagement between the two Powers to negotiate a new Treaty; and it was clear that those who signed this instrument could not well have been of opinion that the whole of the provisions of the old Treaties were in force at that time. True, the war put an end to these arrangements; but, in 1814, he found several provisions introduced that were very material to be considered. The engagement of 1809, to proceed forthwith to negotiate, was then renewed. And what was the provision then made? He would not now refer to the provision then agreed upon as to the Colonies; but would point out that the persuasion of those who then negotiated was, that they had not, in the old Treaties, a security for the treatment of their respective countries, upon the footing of the most favoured nations, or they would have been satisfied with the existing engagements; and in the interim—and this was most important, because it was, in point of fact, the provision under which our present relations with Spain were governed—it was agreed by an additional Article, signed at Madrid on the 28th of August, 1824, that, pending the negotiation of the new Treaty, Great Britain should be admitted to trade with Spain on the same conditions which existed previous to the year 1796. Great Britain was to be allowed to trade with Spain according to the terms under which she traded with Spain antecedent to 1796.

He had already shown them, that on the part of Spain, the terms on which trade was carried on antecedent to that period admitted of the Family Compact, allowed Spain to grant to France and to Naples exclusive privileges, and admitted also of Mr. Pitt's recognising the right of Spain to grant the exemptions which she had exclusively granted to France and Naples. That was the state of things prior to 1796, and that was the state of things which was re-established in 1814, and under which our relations with Spain still existed. He would quote the declaration of the Spanish Minister on this subject, which he found in Sir Henry Wellesley's despatch of April 21, 1817. The Spanish Minister asserted to Sir H. Wellesley that—

"Although the Treaty of 1814 re-enacted the Treaties which existed prior to 1796, it did not expressly specify which Treaties, nor what Articles of them, which were necessary, there being great contradiction in the stipulations of those Treaties, some of them had provided for a reciprocity which did not exist; and that the Treaty of 1814 could therefore be understood only as renewing good understanding, harmony, and mercantile relations in general between the two countries."

The Spanish Minister also said that the Articles of the Treaty of 1783, which stipulated that commercial arrangements should be entered into between the two Powers on the basis of reciprocity and mutual convenience, was as much in force then as any Article of the new Treaty; thus intending to set off that Article as relaxing and qualifying the obligation of the old Treaties. What he had quoted was a reply to the question whether these ancient Treaties retained their obligatory power, even if affected by any subsequent transaction. He would now quote some other works, which he granted were susceptible of a double interpretation, but either way was sufficient for his purpose. The first was a document of 1786, and was a Report of the Board of Trade in answer to a reference made to it by Mr. Pitt, with the draft of the Treaty of Commerce with France, requesting its opinion. The Board of Trade appeared to have had its attention called to the question, whether, if low and favourable duties were established with France, as Mr. Pitt proposed, we were likely in consequence to be subjected to differential duties in Spain. The Report of the Board of Trade showed that in the opinion of that Department, there was no doubt as to the right of Spain to impose those differential duties on British merchants. That Report, in point of fact, argued principally, if not entirely, the question whether or not it were probable that we should be subjected to differential duties in Spain, in consequence of the low duties imposed by us in regard to France, and by way of retaliation on the part of Spain; but it never insinuated the slightest doubt of the right of Spain to establish such differential duties. He admitted there were two ways of explaining this; it might be said that the Board of Trade had so reported, either because they considered the old Treaties abrogated, or because the old Treaties did not meet the case. If they were abrogated at that time, there was an end of any claim founded on them; and if the old Treaties did not meet the case, the argument on that ground was equally fatal to the noble Lord's Motion; for if they did not meet the case contended for by the noble Lord at the time they were entered into, they could not since that time have acquired any new or more extended construction. He would now proceed to draw the noble Lord's attention to several facts in connexion with those Treaties, which the noble Lord would find capable of explanation, either by supposing that the Treaties themselves were null, or by the petti-fogging attorney's argument he spoke of; but which could not be explained away upon any sound reasoning nor any intelligible supposition. In the debates upon the French Treaty, Mr. Fox, in arguing against it, contended that Spain would claim the benefit of the relaxations therein stipulated in favour of France; and Mr. Sheridan, who followed him in the debate, used the same argument, that Spain had the right to demand to be placed upon the same footing; but Mr. Pitt did not agree to that argument, and refused to admit the right advanced as regarded Spain. Mr. Pitt said (though he gave no opinion as to the constructions of those Treaties) that the rights accruing to Spain out of the Treaties between her and Great Britain were under discussion. He thought, therefore, that he was justified in saying that if those rights were then under discussion, they were not so clearly defined by the Treaties in the opinion of either party as the noble Lord opposite seemed to suppose. He had reminded the House of the Family Compact between Spain, France, and Naples; and he would now tell them of something equivalent on the part of England. Now, Mr. Pitt's Treaty with France established a low tariff of duties in favour of France, but Spain never had the benefit of that low tariff. The Treaty establishing that low tariff was in force from the period of agreeing to it till the commencement of the war; yet Spain never until now claimed to be placed on the same footing, on the ground that the Treaties with Great Britain gave her the right to be placed on the footing of the most favoured nations. He thought, therefore, that in this instance the low pettifogging attorney's argument adverted to by the noble Lord might, perhaps, have found favour with both Powers, and that even Mr. Pitt might fall within the scope of the noble Lord's condemnation. The Treaties with Spain stipulated for certain advantages to the subjects of Spain, to Spanish merchants; but Mr. Pitt's Treaty with France referred to the merchandise of the country, however brought, and not to the merchandise of any particular merchants. Though he could understand, therefore, how Mr. Pitt became liable to the animadversions of the noble Lord, for according to France a lower rate of duties than to Spain, he could not see how Spain had acquired the right now to call upon this country to give her produce the benefit of the present low rate of duties. Perhaps the noble Lord who said that the faith of this country had been kept untainted until it was sacrificed by the present Government, would explain that Treaty with France, and would show that Spain had had the benefit of the low rate of duties—that she had considered herself entitled to them—or that she had complained of being excluded from them. He referred to these matters to show not that the two contracting Powers had all along violated the Treaties, but that they had understood the object and force of the Treaties, and understood them in a sense different from that for which the noble Lord now contended. He now came to what was called the Colonial Clause of the Treaty of 1814. How did the noble Lord, upon the principle of which he was now the advocate, account for the introduction of that clause? In that Treaty there was this somewhat one-sided stipulation :—

"In the event of the commerce of the Spanish American possessions being open to foreign nations, His Catholic Majesty promises that Great Britain shall be admitted to trade with those possessions as the most favoured nations."

But according to the noble Lord's argument, we had all these advantages before the ancient Treaties; and any who differed from him in that respect were set down by the noble Lord as men who used the arguments of low pettifogging village attorneys. But if all these advantages were secured to us by the ancient Treaties, which he admitted remained, as to their extent, the same after the Treaty of 1814 as they were before 1796; how did the noble Lord account for the introduction of this provision? According to the noble Lord's argument it must be worse than surplusage, for it gave us nothing that we had not already, and by giving it us in a particular quarter, led to the inference that we did not possess it universally. He contended that this clause, which opened to Great Britain the trade of the Spanish American Colonies, when other nations should be permitted to carry on trade with those Colonies, proved that we were not entitled, before that Article was written, to claim from Spain that advantage which that Treaty secured to us. But this Article did not purport to be intended to clear up doubts that might have arisen, or to be a declaratory Article; but it stipulated de novo that certain privileges should be conceded to Great Britain, which, according to the noble Lord opposite, she already possessed; but which it appeared to him much more rational to suppose she was not thought by her own statesmen to possess. But the noble Lord was in office in the year 1822, and unless he recanted some of his present opinions he would have to answer for a serious catalogue of his own misdeeds. In 1819, the reciprocity principle was introduced into our Treaties; and for seventeen or eighteen years after that period we placed other countries, with which we had Treaties of reciprocity, in the same position as our own with regard to ships and goods in our ports. Spain, however, did not obtain the benefit of these reciprocity Treaties; she continued to pay differential duties; and while ships of other nations were admitted, and had been for nearly thirty years admitted, into English ports on payment of the lowest dues, the highest dues had been exacted from Spanish vessels. It was an easy thing for the noble Lord to declaim against the policy of Her Majesty's Government; but he must remind the noble Lord that, during nearly the whole period to which he referred, the noble Lord had been in office, and for a considerable period was Secretary of State for the Foreign Department. He called upon the noble Lord to dispose of this argument, and to explain how it was, if Spain was, as he now said, entitled unconditionally to be placed on the footing of the most favoured nations, the ships of Spain had, during the space of twenty-five or thirty years, paid dues in British ports from which one nation after another had been exempt, and from which almost every other nation now was exempt. But the noble Lord would say, perhaps, this was the result of reciprocity Treaties concluded with other nations. [Viscount Palmerston: Hear!] But was that the only answer? He should be happy to hear that it was. The noble Lord knew well that these old Treaties with Spain had nothing to do with reciprocity. In our reciprocating Treaties, the reciprocity stipulation was distinctly set forth. In the Treaty with America, America said, your subjects the subjects of Great Britain, shall pay in our ports only the same dues as are paid by the subjects of the most favoured nations, provided our subjects pay the same dues in your ports as are paid by the subjects of the most favoured nations. But these old Spanish Treaties made no exception with regard to favours granted by either Power to third countries on the score of reciprocity—they merely contracted, that let Great Britain contract what it might with the subjects of another Power, the subjects of Spain should be entitled to the same privileges as were conceded to the subjects of that third Power. If, therefore, there had been a stipulation for the reciprocal admission of the general produce of the two countries, and for the terms of the most favoured nation, in the sense which the noble Lord maintained, we could not have declined extending the advantages of the reciprocity Treaties to Spain upon the ground that the privileges which they granted were given in exchange for equivalents. Under the clause of the most favoured nation, equivalents have nothing to do with the matter. What did we say to America last year, in regard to the Treaty between the United States and the States of the Zollverein—or rather, what were we prepared to say if the call had arisen? The States of the Zollverein were prepared to make a Treaty with the United States, providing for certain remissions of duty on the productions of the United States entering the ports of the Zollverein, in return for certain reductions in the duties charged on the products of the Zollverein in the ports of the United States; but everybody said here, "let America grant these reductions to the Zollverein, and we shall have the benefit of them." Was there any doubt of that? Did the noble Lord doubt it—or did anybody doubt it? That was, we had a contract with America which stipulated that the produce of Great Britain should be admitted into the ports of the United States on the same terms upon which the produce of the most favoured nations was admitted; and also that Great Britain should extend the same advantages to the produce of America. No man, therefore, could doubt that we had a right to demand from America that she should admit our produce on the same terms as she received the produce of the Zollverein, though the Zollverein gave an equivalent, and we gave no equivalent. This was what was called an unconditional reciprocity; but nothing of the kind was to be found in our Treaties with Spain. Then, if the noble Lord's construction of those Treaties was the correct one—if, as he said, the good name of the country had been sacrificed by the present Government in regard to these Treaties, he must recollect that it was not the first time that that sacrifice had been made. That good name, if sacrificed at all, had been equally sacrificed by former Governments, of which the noble Lord was himself a member, inasmuch as, from the year 1819 onwards until now, Spain paid a higher rate of duties upon vessels, and in some instances upon produce coming into this country, than the produce and vessels of other nations paid, and never before demanded any relaxation of those higher duties, though it was known that those other nations had their products admitted at the lower rate of duty under reciprocity Treaties. It appeared to him, also, that the noble Lord had himself, when in office, acted in direct contradiction to the doctrine he now laid down.

Let the House not forget the instructions sent out to Spain by the noble Lord himself when he held the seals of the Foreign Department. The noble Lord addressed a despatch to Lord Clarendon, then the British Ambassador at the Court of Madrid, authorizing and desiring him to negotiate a Treaty, the object of which would be to place this country in its intercourse with Spain upon the footing of the most favoured nation. He was entitled to say then, that in 1835, the noble Lord himself was not of opinion that the produce of Spain or her Colonies was entitled to come into this country upon the footing of that of the most favoured nation, or that we had a right to demand the introduction of our produce into Spain on those terms; for he in that year urged upon Spain the justice and expediency of agreeing to a new Treaty with us as the most favoured nation; while he and his Government, in the mean time, very properly withheld the same advantages from Spain, and while the ships of Spain were paying the higher rate of duties in our ports. He said, then, that it was never before supposed that Spain had the right which was now contended for. And although last year a new claim was started in regard to the ships of Denmark, up to that time, and long after, no question had arisen in reference to the ships of Spain. The noble Lord told them that the successive Governments to which he belonged had struggled hard; had maintained a constant struggle with Spain for the commercial rights of England. The noble Lord assured the House that the rights of Great Britain had been during his Administration at all times maintained, with great ingenuity of argument: still the country made no advance, we never got further. Possibly once a year or so a letter was written, or a remonstrance made, or a formal visit paid; but every one knew that no real progress was effected, and the merchants of this country had still to suffer their grievance, while the noble Lord was making from year to year most ingenious arguments in their favour. In 1841, the noble Lord instructed Mr. Aston to claim of Spain, on behalf of our goods, that they should be received in her ports on the footing of the products of the most favoured nations. The noble Lord said, there had been a constant struggle between the two countries on this subject. He was aware that there had been a constant passing of diplomatic notes and negotiations; but there had never been any recognition on the part of Spain of this equality. They never had led to any practical benefits. The noble Lord had demanded, amongst other things, that the linen of Great Britain should be admitted into Spain on the footing of that of the most favoured nations. But was it done? No such thing. It was done afterwards to all nations at once; but certainly it could not have been the object of the noble Lord to obtain that privilege for Belgium. [Viscount Palmerston: It was done by Treaty.] He begged pardon of the noble Lord. It was done by Treaty for Belgium, but it was not done by Treaty for us; but Spain then granted to us that advantage, at the same time that she gave it all other nations, and not till then. Mr. Bulwer, he was well aware, had demanded under the present Administration, that the ships of Great Britain should be admitted into Spanish ports, especially into the port of Barcelona, upon the same footing as French ships were admitted. But had that demand been conceded? No; it had not been granted even up to this very hour. So that, in point of fact, during the whole time that the noble Lord was himself in power, England had continued to levy a differential duty on Spanish ships, while Spain pursued the same practice in reference to British ships; and when Great Britain demanded to be placed on the footing of the most favoured nations, those demands were refused, if not in word, yet in act, by Spain. He did not refer to this to show that both parties had failed to comply with their engagements to each other, but to show that those engagements were not what the noble Lord now stated them to be; and even if they bore the interpretation of the noble Lord, his accusations ought not to be made exclusively against the present Government. He had now done with that portion of the argument which went to show that the Treaties were not in full force. He conceived it had appeared clearly, both from the language and documents, as well as from the acts of the two Powers, that the ancient Treaties which continued in their full force to the year 1763, were not in full force after the war of the French Revolution, and were not in full force now, as the Treaty of 1814 only revived them to the full extent, and for the same purposes, as they existed previous to the Revolutionary War. He said, those old Treaties were not now in full force; but supposing that they were now in as full force as they were in 1763, when they received confirmation as to their objects and intentions; still, he contended, they did not stipulate for a minimum rate of duty on the produce of Spain imported into Great Britain, but merely placed the subjects of Spain, and all that belonged to those subjects, on the footing of the subjects of the most favoured nations; and in speaking of subjects, of course it would be understood that those who were specifically meant were merchants—those engaged in trade. He would proceed to demonstrate —first, by the plain ostensible meaning of the words of the Treaties themselves; secondly, by the evidence of facts; and, lastly, by the absurd consequence which would follow an opposite construction — that the construction which he put upon those Treaties was the correct one. First, as to the plain meaning of the words, he objected to the principle of admitting any departure from the letter of a Treaty, for the purpose of carrying out what any particular person might understand to be its spirit, unless under particular circumstances, and upon the strongest evidence. As a general principle, it was dangerous to invoke the spirit of a Treaty against its letter. He did not mean to say that such a course was never to be justified; but what he said was, it could only be justified by the strongest evidence. For what was the object of a Treaty? It was to put the stipulations contracted for between two or more Powers beyond any doubt, and not to leave it in the power of any one of the parties at a future period to put upon the Treaty a different meaning from that intended. The words of the Treaty spoke for themselves, and in estimating the intention of the contracting parties, it was to those words they were to look. The feeling in the mind of the noble Lord, as to those Treaties, had, no doubt, arisen from the fact, that he measured the circumstances of the time when those Treaties were entered into, two hundred years ago, by a reference to the totally altered circumstances of the course of trade in the present day, to which they had no legitimate reference, and with which they had no connexion. Now, as to the letter of the Treaty there was no doubt—it stipulated for nothing but in reference to that which belonged to the subjects of Spain — not in reference to the produce of Spain generally. It might be said by the noble Lord, that that was absurd or unfair, and that to interpret those stipulations literally, would be to put too narrow a construction upon them—that you must put a gloss upon them, to make them more in accordance with justice and common sense. But he was prepared to show, from the circumstances of the time, that the literal meaning was the true meaning, and, at the same time, the rational meaning, and that the noble Lord's construction was neither the true one nor the rational one. On this point he was sure the House would agree with him, that it was a most unsafe doctrine to affirm generally that Treaties must change according to the circumstances of the time. If circumstances changed, the discretion of the parties revived, and though they were, no doubt, bound to carry out the spirit of the earlier Treaties, they were not entitled to make any inference from the circumstances of those earlier times, as compared with the present, and apply them as of compulsory obligation against the obvious meaning of the instruments themselves. He doubted not he could show that the rational meaning of the Treaty was opposed to the doctrine of the noble Lord; and the first step he should take for that purpose would be to refer them to what was called the Great Statute, which was well known in commercial law, as they would find it in "Foster's Digest," edition of 1727. In that Statute, the 12th Charles II., cap. 4, it would be found that two descriptions of customs' duties were granted by the Commons to the Crown; and the Statute proceeded to point out (that which had obviously escaped the notice of the noble Lord) that the mode then was to tax the same articles in a variety of different ways: sometimes they were taxed as particular commodities raised in particular countries—sometimes as particular commodities imported from particular countries — sometimes as particular commodities brought into particular ports—and sometimes they were taxed, and most commonly so, according to the country of the ships in which, and the parties by whom, they were imported. Now he wished the noble Lord to look well to these facts; for they were most important, as bearing upon his argument. The Great Statute of Charles II., which remained in force for a long series of years, and formed the basis of our customs' laws until a recent period, granted tonnage duties upon French wines imported into the port of London by British subjects of 4*l.* 10*s.*, and of 6*l.*, if imported by aliens; upon the like wines at our outports of 3*l.*, if imported by British subjects, and of 4*l.* 10*s.* by aliens; upon Spanish wines imported into London by British subjects, 2*l.* 5*s.*; by aliens, 3*l.*; Spanish wines imported into any outport by British subjects, 2*l.* 5*s.*; by aliens 3*l.*; upon Rhenish wine, into whatever port, if imported by British subjects, 1*l.*; if by aliens, 1*l.* 5*s.* There was also another tax imposed by the same measure upon exports, called poundage, which differed in like manner according as the exports were made by aliens or British subjects, between whom the House could not fail to observe there was throughout a desire to establish a distinction. Now, he felt convinced, that the interpretation he put upon the Treaties with Spain, viz., that they were intended only to secure, the interests of the subjects of the two countries respectively, was the correct one, and that the noble Lord's interpretation, which extended it to the produce of the two countries generally, was not the correct one. It was stipulated by England, that the goods of Spanish subjects should be treated in all respects the same as goods belonging to the subjects of the most favoured nation; but if the noble Lord's construction were the correct one, foreigners, who were the subjects of neither country, might import Spanish produce into England upon the same terms as could be imported by the subjects of Spain. The spirit of commercial legislation of that age generally, was to keep a monopoly of the trade of each country in the hands of its own subjects; therefore it was not likely that the King of Spain would stipulate that Spanish produce should be received by Great Britain from foreigners of whatsoever country, upon the footing of the most favoured nation; but what he stipulated for, no doubt, was, that Spanish produce belonging to Spanish subjects should be received on the footing of the most favoured nation. The spirit as well as the letter of the Treaty was in favour of that construction which the noble Lord treated so contemptuously. The noble Lord might urge that if his construction of the Treaty were too wide, it were better to err on the liberal side, and rather to put a construction too wide than too narrow upon any Treaty; but he would meet this argument by proceeding to show that if the noble Lord's construction of the Treaty was too wide as to imports, it was too narrow as to exports. How, for example, could it answer the purpose of the Spanish exporter of woollen cloth, that there should be a relaxation of the duties on the import of Spanish goods? Such a Treaty as we had with Venezuela would not be sufficient to answer the conditions under which trade was formerly carried on. It would not have met the enactment of the law by which the alien was taxed; and if the stipulations were interpreted in the sense of the noble Lord, they would, so far, be useless for Spanish subjects residing in England. He contended, then, that the rational construction of the Treaty was as much in favour of his views, and against that of the noble Lord, as was the literal one. Again, he would show that the distinction he had attempted to draw between the subjects of a country and its produce was not a mere fanciful one, but was supported by history. It was well known, he believed, that the Treaty with Portugal — the Methuen Treaty, had never been made the subject of evasion, and had never failed to cover those cases in regard to Portugal which it was now alleged the Spanish Treaties did not cover in reference to Spain. It had been effective for all its purposes. That Treaty provided that the wine of Portugal should pay a less customs' duty than was charged upon the wine of France. If this Methuen Treaty had been framed in the same terms as the Spanish Treaty, he admitted that would be a strong point in the noble Lord's favour; but if he could show that in that Treaty a form of expression altogether different was adopted, that was a strong though a negative argument in favour of the interpretation for which he (Mr. Gladstone) contended. By the second Methuen Treaty we were bound to admit the wines of Portugal— not of the subjects of Portugal, be it observed, into Great Britain at a rate of duty one-third below that which was charged upon French wines; and the Treaty further stipulated, that at no time and under no circumstances, whether there were peace or war between the kingdoms of Great Britain and France, should a higher rate of duty be demanded upon such wines, (not from such subjects, remember,) either as customs' duties or otherwise, and whether imported in pipes, hogsheads, bottles, or in any other way. The House would observe, then, that when the object was to secure a minimum duty on the produce of a country, a form of expression was adopted differing from that which was to be found in the Spanish Treaties. Again, the Treaty entered into in 1787, by Mr. Pitt with France; that was a Treaty for the benefit of the subjects of Great Britain and France as to the duties charged in respect to their goods, on the produce of either country, and the form of expression varied accordingly. He was going to quote another authority, to which he begged to call the attention of the noble Lord, because he was going to quote the noble Lord himself. He would show as plainly as possible, that in the Treaties concluded by the noble Lord, he recognised the distinction which he had called on the House that night to repudiate. He would take the Treaty which the noble Lord had concluded with the Netherlands in 1837, and which was to be found in the 5th volume of Hertslet. In this Treaty it was provided that "in matters of commerce and navigation," (and he had observed the triumph of the noble Lord when he noticed the word "commerce" in Spanish Treaties; that term, the noble Lord said, was so large, it covered every thing,) there should be hereafter granted to the subjects of the respective Sovereigns the same privileges which were granted to the subjects of the most favoured nations. The following was the Article:—

"There shall be reciprocal liberty of commerce and navigation between and amongst the subjects of the two high contracting parties; and the subjects of the two Sovereigns respectively, shall not pay in the ports, harbours, roads, cities, towns, or places whatsoever in either kingdom, any other or higher duties, taxes, or imposts, under whatsoever names designated or included, than those which are there paid by the subjects of the most favoured nation; and the subjects of each of the high contracting parties shall enjoy the same rights, privileges, liberties, favours, immunities, and exemptions, in matters of commerce and navigation, that are granted, or may hereafter be granted, in either kingdom, to the subjects of the most favoured nation."

If that Article had stood alone, no doubt some plausible and able ex-Minister, 200 years hence, might argue that all articles the produce of that country, ought to be admitted into Great Britain on equal terms with those of the most favoured nation, and would be supported by the noble Lord's argument of to-night. But was that the view of the noble Lord in 1837? No such thing. Another clause was inserted with regard to produce. The noble Lord, wishing to provide for the produce of the two countries, did it by a distinct stipulation properly framed for the purpose, which he would proceed to quote:—

"No duty of customs or other impost shall be charged upon any goods the produce of one country, upon importation, by sea or by land, from such country into the other, higher than the duty or impost charged upon goods of the same kind the produce of or imported from any other country; and Her Majesty the Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and His Majesty the King of the Netherlands, do hereby bind and engage themselves, not to grant any favour, privilege, or immunity, in matters of commerce and navigation, to the subjects of any other State, which shall not be also, and at the same time, extended to the subjects of the other high contracting party, gratuitously, if the concession in favour of the other State shall have been gratuitous; and on giving as nearly as possible the same compensation or equivalent, in case the concession shall have been conditional."

The First Clause was intended only to protect the persons of those subjects against demands; but not to protect the produce irrespective of ownership. He (Mr. Gladstone) had shown, therefore, that after the noble Lord had provided in 1837, in the largest terms, for the privileges of subjects, so sensible was he then that this provision would not cover the produce of the country, that he inserted another clause, having that end in view. The "village attorney" distinction was also recognised in the Treaty of Turkey of 1838. The First Article of the Treaty differed from the Article of the Treaty of the Netherlands in this respect, that it gave the privileges of the most favoured nation, not only to subjects, but to ships:—

"All rights, privileges, and immunities which have been conferred on the subjects or ships of Great Britain by the existing Capitulations and Treaties, are confirmed now and for ever, except in as far as they may be specifically altered by the present Convention; and it is moreover expressly stipulated, that all rights, privileges, or immunities which the Sublime Porte now grants, or may hereafter grant, to the ships and subjects of any other Foreign Power, or which it may suffer the ships and subjects of any other Foreign Power to enjoy, shall be equally granted to, and exercised and enjoyed by, the subjects and ships of Great Britain."

The very pointing out of "ships" made it clear what was the object of the contracting parties. The Articles also contained a stipulation that if hereafter better terms were granted to any other countries, Great Britain should have the benefit of them. But, notwithstanding that, although the Treaty was signed, he found a separate document added to the Treaty, under the name of "Additional Articles." There was an Article providing that the produce of Great Britain should be admitted at the lowest duty of the most favoured nation. Its being appended to the Treaty in a separate instrument, showed more distinctly that the necessity for it was felt, and that it could not be treated as surplusage. Now the lowest duty paid by other nations was 3 per cent.; and on referring to the fifth volume of Hertslet, it would be seen that the Article provided that—

"All articles being the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and its dependencies, and all merchandise, of whatsoever description, embarked in British vessels, and being the property of British subjects, or being brought overland, or by sea, from other countries by the same, shall be admitted, as heretofore, into all parts of the Ottoman dominions, without exception, on the payment of 3 per cent. duty, calculated upon the value of such articles."

They would observe that the Article stipulated not only for the produce of British subjects, but also for all produce owned by British subjects; therefore the object of the negotiators must have been to prevent its being supposed that the former Article was sufficient to carry all the stipulations in favour of "commerce." He had now illustrated the broad distinction of phraseology, which corresponded with the not less broad distinction of rights which the phraseology conveyed. He must now go to the evidence of facts; and again he entreated the attention of those who might be disposed, at first sight, to adopt the view of the noble Lord. He did not know how the noble Lord was to get over the facts he should adduce. He hoped they should have specific answers to them, and not generalities. The first of the Acts to which he would refer, was framed before 1667, and it gave a privilege to the wines of Madeira and of particular countries, which was not extended to Spain. That exceptional privilege was in force when the Treaty of 1667 was made, and they who put the construction of the noble Lord on that Treaty must show that that privilege was abrogated. In 1668, the very first year after the formation of the Treaty with Spain, they would find in Anderson's History of Commerce, that a differential duty was laid on Spanish wine, as compared with French wine. Anderson said, that—

"A duty of 4*d.* was imposed on every quart of French wine retailed, and of 6*d.* on every quart of Spanish or other wine."

That might be intended to operate as a discouragement upon Spanish wine, and to tax it according to its strength. It might be said that it was a duty of excise; but in its bearing upon the Treaty, he wanted to know how they could reconcile it with their construction, if the stipulations extended to Spanish wines. That Treaty, made in 1667, was, according to the noble Lord, broken in 1668. That breach, if such it were, was not remonstrated against, and the Treaty was renewed very quietly in 1670. He had another example, and with respect to examples there might be hundreds of them. He had picked out such as he could find by very limited inquiry; they must not suppose it probable that these constituted the whole. In the first year of James II.—he had given a case before the Treaty, and he had given a case a year after the Treaty; he would now give one fifteen years after the Treaty—in the first of James II., in 1685, when we came into the most dishonourably close relations with France, there was a disposition to form a differential taxation in her favour; and a duty was imposed upon French wine of 8*l.* a tun, whilst upon all other wines, Spanish wines included, a duty of 12*l.* a tun was imposed. How did the noble Lord get over that circumstance? He wished that the noble Lord had read the history and the facts of the case, before he had made his ingenious speech. It was not a small differential duty. Here was a distinction of 4*l.* a tun on the wine; 8*l.* a tun on French wine at the time when these Treaties of the noble Lord were in full vigour, and 12*l.* a tun imposed on Spanish wine, and that without the smallest intention of going against the Treaty on our part, or the smallest complaint on the part of Spain. He would now take the case of Snuff. By the 12th George I.—

"Snuff, if imported in British ships, is rated to pay 2*s.* 6*d.* in the pound from the plantations in America and the Spanish West Indies, and 5*s.* if imported from Italy, Spain, Portugal, and all other parts, except France."

This as it stood appeared to give a favour to France not enjoyed by other countries; but as he was not certain that he was in possession of the whole case, he would not greatly rely on it, and only quoted it as an apparent instance in his favour. In 1784 Spanish wines paid a small sum more duty than Portuguese wines. According to M'Culloch, Spanish wine paid 4*s.* 10*d.* per gallon, and Portuguese 4*s.* 8¾*d.*, Spanish wine paying 1¼*d.* more. In 1787, they came to Mr. Pitt's tariff, which imposed a number of differential duties, operating, of course, against Spain, as compared with France. He would show them that after America had become independent, and while these Treaties were in full vigour, Spanish tobacco was liable to pay, and did pay, a higher duty than American tobacco. In a table which he held in his hand the following duties appeared:—

	Duty on American Tobacco.		Duty on Spanish or Portuguese Tobacco.
1789 . .	1	3	3	0
1790 . .	1	3	3	6
1796 . .	1	7	4	6
1806 . .	2	2 13-20ths.	5	4 19-20ths
1815 . .	3	2	5	5½

They would observe that he had now shown them an immense number of differential duties and privileges, reaching from 1663 to 1825. It might be said that was a good arrangement for us to act upon with the United States; but what came of the construction of the noble Lord with respect to tobacco? He had shown them that in many things, from a long continued stream of precedents to this hour, we laid on particular articles of Spanish produce a very much higher duty than we placed on the same articles coming from other dominions, which were, therefore, mere favoured nations with respect to this produce. [Mr. Ward: Was the tobacco in the same state?] In the same state. He had wearied the House with these instances; because he had shown a series of laws embodying from time to time provisions that perhaps could only be justified by what the noble Lord called "the village attorney's argument." He had told them that at this day they were charging differential duties on the ships of Spain, and that they were also at this day charging differential duties on certain goods. With regard to the differential duties on Spanish ships in different ports, at seventy-one ports in Great Britain there were charges made on Spanish vessels over and above those made on British vessels. They were most unequal at different ports; but at Belfast, for instance, on a ship of 600 tons and upwards, the charge on a Spanish vessel was 6*l.*; on a British vessel, or on a French or a Swedish vessel, not a steamer, 2*l.* 10*s.* At Hull, again, the difference of duty was as great as at Belfast. And, again, as respected goods, we had in exports all that distinction which attached on the nationality of the vessel. While a Turkish ship was allowed, not by Treaty, but by discretion, to carry coals free, a Spanish ship paid 4*s.* a ton, and no Power had questioned our right to levy that sum. There was also a trifling difference with respect to refined sugar. The bounty on the exportation of refined loaf sugar in British ships was 1*l.* 4*s.* per cwt.; in a Spanish ship, it was 1*s.* less. Therefore he had shown, with respect both to ships and to produce, proof that restrictive Acts were constantly passed by the Legislature in the case of Spain, with the perfect consent of Spain, and without the smallest taint on our honour. The produce of Spain, and even the ships of Spain, were taxed from time to time, according to the good will and pleasure of the British Parliament, which was not limited by any stipulations of Treaties, which were clearly shown to be irrelevant with reference to this subject. It might be said that the precedents he had shown were more on the side of England than of Spain. It might be said, that for a period of 200 years they had misconstrued the Treaty on the side of England. But he had already reminded the House of the Family Compact which had been entered into, by which Spain put the same construction on the Treaty that they had. They would admit that these Treaties had bound Spain to give to England the same footing as that of the most favoured nations; but the Family Compact said "no," France and Naples would be entitled to protest against it; and of the Family Compact he must observe, that it was undoubtedly at variance with the Treaties. The personal privileges which, as he contended, they guaranteed upon the footing of the most favoured nation, were the very privileges in which it granted peculiar and exclusive favour to Naples and to France.

With regard, then, to those privileges, there was considerable reason to think that the Family Compact was at complete variance with the noble Lord's construction of those Treaties. By the consent of both parties, these Treaties were allowed to go out of force; and if so, it could not now be contended that they could bring them into force again without the consent of both parties; and even if it were so argued, he had shown that they would be utterly worthless, so far as supporting the noble Lord's position—namely, equality of taxation. There was one Article of these Treaties that was remarkable, by reason of the solemn and peculiar language by which it was characterized in respect to its being made a provision for all times to come, by which it declared that the subjects of Great Britain should not be liable to pay any higher duties in Spain, than those they were liable to pay in the reign of Charles II. of Spain. In the Treaty of Utrecht, in 1713, there was this singular expression—"His Catholic Majesty ordains now and in future, as an inviolable law," &c. In the Treaty of Madrid, in 1750, the same expressions were used as to the inviolability of the law. With regard, however, to this so-called inviolable law, these duties of Charles II. of Spain ceased to be in force long before the war commenced between Great Britain and France, or France and Spain. These Treaties were incompatible with the construction put upon them by the noble Lord. In one place, this Treaty seemed to be equivalent to a limit of 10 per cent. duty on the imports and exports of Spain. He was amused when he heard the noble Lord say, "Don't force a construction of the Treaty like this upon Spain;" as if the noble Lord's construction could be enforced! Did the noble Lord think that the construction which he put upon the Treaties, granted that minimum duty which he argued in favour of, in respect to British produce in Spain? Now, he asked him, did he think that this country would be justified in forcing the observance of his construction at the point of the sword, and in the face of these Acts? [Lord J. Russell: Spain seeks for it.] Yes; Spain seeks for it from us, but refuses it to us. It was only lately that, in consequence of events which had passed in this country, Spain thought that there was a point to be raised—an opening for her to take advantage of—and she immediately propounded a doctrine diametrically in opposition, not only to her own law and practice as it had subsisted for 200 years, but as it stood at the present day. Let it be remembered that Spain was levying duties upon English ships which she did not impose upon the vessels of France, even at the moment when her Envoy had presented the letter then upon the Table of the House. He should certainly shrink from the responsibility of trying to force upon Spain such a construction of those Treaties as that for which the noble Lord had contended, in opposition to the continued acts and the innumerable declarations of the organs of Government of both countries. He should now proceed to examine what the results of the noble Lord's views would lead to; and he thought he should be able to show that the arguments urged by the noble Lord involved so much absurdity that they were actually fatal to his own interpretation of the Treaties. It was a rule in international law, long laid down, and always acted upon, that if a peculiar construction of a Treaty involved an absurdity, that the very fact militated against the justice of such construction. Now, he was prepared to show two consequences which must of necessity follow, if the interpretation put by the noble Lord upon the Treaties with Spain were to be adopted and acted upon. The first of these results was the undoubted one, that every reciprocity Treaty subsisting between England and any other country would be immediately cancelled and rendered needless, or else there must be a change made in the fundamental rules upon which reciprocity Treaties were at present based. The rule heretofore adopted as the basis of reciprocity had been, that inasmuch as a British shipowner could not employ his ships under the heavy fines to which they were liable on entering foreign ports, it was therefore absolutely essential, in order that he might so employ them, that a reciprocal Treaty should be entered into with those Foreign Powers, whereby those double duties were withdrawn. In all cases, therefore, when reciprocity Treaties were entered into, Great Britain granted to the ships of the Powers so treating, the same privileges in her ports as were enjoyed by her own ships, and received in return equal advantages. But under the noble Lord's construction of the Treaty with Spain, Denmark, which had Treaties corresponding, as he inclined to think, in substance with those of Spain, would obtain all the advantages of these reciprocity Treaties on her side, without granting any in return, as he would show. Supposing the doctrine of the noble Lord held good, namely, that Spain, and therefore, Denmark, was entitled to be placed in all respects upon the same footing as the most favoured nations, would not the immediate consequence have been that it would have been utterly impossible to enter into a reciprocity Treaty with Denmark? For would not Denmark be in a condition to say that she was entitled to send her ships into the ports of England upon an equality with English ships, immediately that we had granted the privilege of equality to Prussia or any other power? Whereas she was under no necessity whatever of granting any exemptions in favour of English merchant bottoms, which she would accordingly retain the right of placing under double or any other charges; and Denmark having the cheapest and most economical mercantile navy in Europe, she would be enabled to sail to all the English ports with her ships at half the cost of the ships of this country. Spain would stand in precisely the same situation; and, the duties on English vessels in Spanish ports being extremely heavy, the whole of the carrying trade must of necessity be diverted into another channel. Now, if the principle upon which Mr. Huskisson proceeded in entering into reciprocity Treaties with Foreign States was looked at, it would be found to consist simply in the determination on his part to grant to those countries precisely the same advantages that they accorded to England; and therefore it was that he asserted it to be impossible to admit the noble Lord's construction of the Spanish Treaties to be correct, seeing that if adopted, it would take it out of the power of this country to exclude Denmark from the benefit arising from those reciprocity Treaties, without herself being under any obligation to grant any such advantages as her ships enjoyed to the vessels of Great Britain. The noble Lord appeared to feel the force of the argument he (Mr. Gladstone) was then urging, and to have framed the prayer of his Address to the Crown accordingly; for he did not pray that the Crown would be pleased to give directions to admit the sugars of Cuba at the same rate of duty as those from Java; but he prayed that—

"The subjects of the Queen of Spain should be permitted to import into the United Kingdom all the productions of the territories or possessions of the Spanish Crown, paying thereupon no higher duties of customs than are paid by the subjects or citizens of the most favoured nations on the importation of like articles, being the production of the territories or possessions of such nations."

If such a regulation were to be adopted and enforced, what would necessarily follow? Whenever a cask of Havana sugar was imported, they would be obliged to inquire into its ownership. When they had ascertained who was the owner, they would have to ascertain his nationality, and then his denizenship — they would have to do all this—for all that the noble Lord could contend was, that the Treaties were absolute with regard to produce in the hands of Spanish subjects, and that they could not lay higher duties upon it in the hands of Spanish subjects, than they could impose upon the same produce imported from other countries. Such a course of proceeding would require a system so glaringly at variance with the whole course and tendency of the present commercial legislation of this country as to amount to an absurdity, springing, of course always, from the noble Lord's construction of the Treaties. He would soon approach the consideration of that part of the case which, he was quite ready to admit, was the weakest and least satisfactory portion of it. He (Mr. Gladstone) had endeavoured to show that the construction put upon the Treaties with Spain by the noble Lord, was contradicted and refuted by the practices of both countries, during a period extending over nearly 200 years; he (Mr. Gladstone) was ready to grant so much to the noble Lord as to admit that, according to the then course of trade, the Articles of the Treaties referred to were intended to have an effect nearly analogous to that which, under present circumstances, would be sought for through a most favoured nation clause, for the produce of the two countries. ["Hear, hear," from the Opposition.] He repeated, an effect analogous, but yet very far from being the same—so far from being the same, as to be quite incapable of being transferred, bodily as it were, in the way the noble Lord proposed, to circumstances and a course of legislation so materially different—even without any reference to the proof he had given, that the force of the Treaties in question was not the same as it originally was. But, adverting in part, to the true construction of the Treaties as he had explained it—in part to the fact, that in some degree those Treaties had been set aside by both parties, their effect was—as he had in a preceding part of his observations contended—to assert generally, the principles of amity and of fair and equitable dealing between the two countries, and to impose upon both, as he thought, an honourable obligation to proceed to the formation of a new engagement, founded upon principles of reciprocity and equality in all points; unless when there might be urgent cause for introducing any special exception. He would not enter upon the question of policy. He would deal simply with the arguments affecting the construction and the vitality of the Treaties, leaving it to others to enter upon the policy of the question. Besides what he had already conceded, he would grant also, (and this he regarded as the weakest part of the case,) that it was true, that upon several occasions this country had demanded of Spain the recognition of our right to be treated on the footing of the most favoured nation. Such a demand was made by Mr. Bulwer perhaps, certainly by Mr. Aston. Mr. Bulwer made a demand on the Court of Spain that British ships should be placed on an equality with the vessels of France. But he would not admit, that ships were to be considered with reference to the present question, precisely in the same light as produce. There could be no British ships which were the property of other than British subjects. The law required that such should be the condition of being admitted to British registry. But when it was attempted to demand the equality of British ships with those of the most favoured nations in Spanish ports, it was quite clear to him that such a demand could not be enforced under any existing Treaty with Spain; and he must say, he thought the instructions given by the noble Lord in this respect were most extraordinary to be issued by a Foreign Secretary, who must, of necessity, have known that there were differential duties established in England, and at that moment levied on the vessels of Spain, and on all foreign vessels which did not enjoy some peculiar exemption, by Treaty or otherwise. But neither the demand made by Mr. Aston, nor that put forward by Mr. Bulwer, was granted by the Spanish Court, nor had it ever been conceded since; indeed, he might say, it had never since been repeated. But, because the British Government thought proper in the year 1837, or 1840, to deviate from its own invariable line of conduct, adhered to during a period of nearly 200 years, and made a claim which ought not to have been made, and which could not be justified under the existing Treaties—was that circumstance to overrule and to render null such facts and such arguments as he had advanced? Was it, he asked, to be said, that one party to a Treaty was to be permitted to refuse everything stipulated for under that Treaty up to the year 1845, and then to be at liberty to enforce those stipulations in a sense quite opposed to the construction which they had always previously held? It was true, Mr. Bulwer did not peremptorily claim to have his demands conceded. He simply made a request to have British ships put upon the same footing with French vessels; but what he (Mr. Gladstone) contended for was, that whatever his recent demand might have been, and however erroneously made, if made upon the supposed ground of a right under Treaty, it was utterly impossible to set aside the facts to which he had referred; whereby it was clearly and completely shown that both parties had acted upon the same construction of the Treaties in an opposite sense. He now came to his third proposition, that the produce of the Spanish Colonies could not fall within the scope of the Treaties for the purposes of this Motion. The noble Lord had argued, that the policy of Spain had been to secure for her colonists a privilege, or, at least, to exempt them from a prohibition, affecting the subjects of Spain in the mother country; that the Treaty did not prevent the subjects of Spain from sailing from Cuba to England. [Viscount Palmerston: I said they were included in the general admission of the Treaty of 1667, and not excluded by that of 1670.] Now, if the noble Lord referred to the Eighth Article of the Treaty, he would find that the West Indian Colonies were excluded, though rather in an indirect way. As to the Treaty of 1670, the noble Lord quoted an Article from it as to the exclusion of the West Indian Colonies. Now, he confessed that he was not prepared, in his own individual judgment to maintain Lord Aberdeen's position, precisely as he found it in the letter to the Duke of Sotomayor. The noble Lord said—

"While, therefore, the Treaty of 1667 gave generally to the subjects of Great Britain and Spain, respectively, the privileges of the most favoured nation, the trade belonging to the West Indian Colonies of the two countries was expressly excluded from the enjoyment of the privileges so conferred. Subsequently to the conclusion of the Treaty of 1670, all trade with the West Indian Colonies of Great Britain was prohibited to the subjects of Spain, nor could the produce of Cuba and Porto Rico have found admission into English ports, inasmuch as the Navigation Law then in force would have prevented its importation in any other than British ships; while the Treaty of 1670 prevented its conveyance from Cuba by those British ships which alone could legally import it. Hence it follows that, admitting that the Treaty of 1667 conferred upon the subjects of Spain the position of the most favoured nation in British ports, yet that privilege could not, subsequently to 1670, have belonged to Spanish West India trade, because, under the terms of the Treaty of 1670, such trade could not have been carried on with British ports."

He confessed that, when Lord Aberdeen argued that that was conclusive, it did not quite satisfy him; because, supposing there was no dispute as to the question of "subject or produce," and supposing, for argument' sake, our navigation laws were abolished in favour of Holland, and that Java sugar came to us from Amsterdam, it was very questionable whether Spain would not be entitled to ask that her Cuba produce should be admissible from Cadiz. But with regard to the noble Lord's interpretation, it filled him with astonishment; for surely nothing could be more distinct than the Eighth Article of the Treaty:—

"The subjects and inhabitants, captains, masters of ships, mariners of the kingdoms, provinces and dominions of each confederate respectively, shall abstain and forbear to sail and trade in the ports and havens which have fortifications, castles, magazines, or warehouses; and in all other places whatsoever possessed by the other party in the West Indies, to wit, the King of Great Britain shall not sail unto, and trade in, the havens and places which the Catholic King holdeth in the said Indies; nor in like manner shall the subjects of the King of Spain sail unto, or trade in, those places which are possessed there by the King of Great Britain."

The noble Lord's argument was, that the inhabitants of the Spanish West Indies had the power, under the Treaty, of coming here. Did he mean to contend that the inhabitants of Cuba should enjoy an advantage not possessed by the mother country? But his argument was, that however they disposed of the questions of subjects and commerce, and whether it were true or not that Spain had a fair claim to ask for the admission of Cuba sugar through Cadiz, supposing we admitted Java sugar through Amsterdam, still an absolute and unfettered control over the trade and commerce between England and the Spanish West Indies was reserved by the Treaty of 1670, which the noble Lord forgot or omitted to refer to. By the Ninth Article of the Treaty of 1670 it was provided—

"That if at any time thereafter, either King should think fit to grant to the subjects of the other any general or particular license or privileges of navigating to, and trading in, any places under his obedience, the said navigation and trade should be exercised and maintained according to the form, tenour, and effect of the said permissions or privileges to be allowed and given."

Giving any construction to the question of "subjects," and allowing "subjects" to involve "produce," it was impossible to deny that the control of the trade between Cuba and England included that produce of Cuba which formed the whole subject-matter of the trade. Here was an absolute control with respect to the conditions on which each Power might think fit to grant to the other a right to trade with its Colonies: and we had it in our discretion alone to grant to Spain just as much and as little of that Colonial trade as we pleased, and to fix any duties we pleased. The noble Lord must have overlooked this Article; otherwise it was so material that he would have seen it was not perfectly straightforward to omit it. The Eighth Article was not left to stand alone; but, to obviate mistake, it was followed by another which added, with respect to the Colonial trade—which was interdicted for the present—that if at any time it should be given, it should be under such laws as each Power in its free discretion should think fit to assign. The sugars brought from Cuba to England could not be separated from the trade between Cuba and England; and the power to regulate the trade between them must enable us to determine what duty should be paid. But the noble Lord said, that the navigation laws prevented all trade with Cuba at that time: that, however, was not the case; the produce might have come in British ships. The plain language, however, defied misconstruction, either at the hands of a pettifogging village attorney, or (which was much more formidable) an ex-Foreign Secretary. In the Treaty of 1814, the two Powers again came in contact; and Spain yielded to England, then her liberator, he apprehended, on account of the peculiar relative position of the two countries, a valuable privilege without an equivalent. She undertook, that if at any time the American Colonies should be opened to other countries, England should have as great benefit therefrom as any other Power. That was perfectly a one-sided engagement. And here he must say he could not concur in the optimising views of the noble Lord as to England's rejection of any exclusive advantages. He could not take credit for the moderation of England, when he often saw she engrossed great advantages. But it was impossible to think that she preferred a request which, according to the noble Lord's argument, was mere surplusage. Now he maintained that, according to every rational supposition, and according to the Treaty of 1670, Great Britain was not, as to her Colonial trade, put on the footing of the most favoured nation until 1814; and it followed that Spain had no claim to have her Colonies so treated up to the present moment. Now he came to one of the last proofs which he should adduce. The noble Lord said, it devolved on his side to prove that Spain was now treated on the footing of the most favoured nations. In the first place, the privilege as to Colonies was granted to us in 1824; we did not give similar privileges until 1828. Did they suppose it took four years to determine whether we should allow Spanish ships to trade to our Colonies? No; we granted the privilege, not as an obligation imposed by Treaty, but as an independent act of our own discretion, as an act of fairness and equity. By the Order in Council it was apparent that this privilege was not granted to Spain alone, but to her in common with other nations; for in the recital it was said that our Colonies should be opened to those countries which had opened theirs to our traders. The Order in Council, dated April the 28th, 1828, ran as follows:—

"Whereas the conditions mentioned and referred to in the said Acts of Parliament have not in all respects been fulfilled by the Government of His Most Catholic Majesty the King of Spain; and, therefore, the privileges so granted as aforesaid by the Law of Navigation o foreign ships cannot lawfully be exercised or enjoyed by the ships of Spain, unless His Majesty, by his Order in Council, shall grant the whole or any of such privileges to such Spanish ships. And whereas His Majesty, by and with the advice, &c., doth deem it expedient to grant the privileges aforesaid, in certain cases, to ships of the dominions of His Most Catholic Majesty the King of Spain, His Majesty doth therefore, by the advice aforesaid, and in pursuance, &c., declare and grant that it shall and may be lawful for Spanish ships to import into any of the British possessions abroad, from the Colonies and foreign plantations of His Most Catholic Majesty, goods, the produce of those Colonies and possessions, and to export goods from such British possessions abroad, to be carried to any foreign country whatever."

This had no reference to obligation or Treaties; and the privilege conceded was not a general privilege to Spanish ships to sail to British Colonies, but only from the Colonies and foreign possessions of Spain. But at that time there were in existence Orders in Council, granting to other European Powers the privilege of sailing from Europe to the British Colonies, and carrying on the European trade with them. There was such an order in the case of Prussia, issued in 1826; and orders had been issued since, even under the noble Lord's Administration, granting to other countries greater privileges with regard to the Colonial trade than Spain ever had, or now possessed: for instance, to Hamburgh, to Denmark, to Sweden, to Austria, was granted the privilege of trading with our Colonies from Europe. Upon the whole, here was a mass of circumstantial evidence which must remove any primâ facie impression to the contrary, which might arise, and which, he was free to confess, in his mind had arisen upon his first cursory examination of the Treaties. The obligation of these Treaties—and he wished that obligation to be estimated, not as it might stand with a political party, for its own purposes, but as it would stand before a solemn tribunal of jurists—could no longer be deemed so fresh and so entire as to justify the one Power in making absolute demands upon the other, in respect of each and every provision that they contained; and though demands had been made by ourselves (and he thought improperly), they had not been granted by Spain, nor had we enforced them, But even if they were as much alive as on the day when they were reduced to writing, they d d not contain what the noble Lord supposed; and he had shown by laws and Treaties of every form and age, spreading over the whole stream of history, and applicable to both Powers, that the noble Lord's construction was contradicted by practice, while it would also have been irrational with reference to the course of legislation and of trade. And, lastly, notwithstanding the disadvantage occasioned by the demand made by the noble Lord (which the acts of his Government were all the time contradicting), the stipulations could not be shown to have the smallest reference to the trade which might be carried on between Great Britain and the West Indian possessions of the Spanish Crown, because over that trade an entire discretion was preserved; and though it was a good rule to resolve against ourselves any doubt which might arise, and if, consequently the foregoing arguments should be waved, the question of the trade with the Colonies, and of the produce when it went to constitute that trade, was clearly and entirely under our control. He had not knowingly passed by any fact bearing upon the case; and he now commended that case to the judgment of the House, with confidence that whatever might be the first appearance of this matter to those who were content to look at some passage quoted in the public journals, yet if he could only secure a deliberate attention to all the particulars which entered into the material of a just judgment, there was not the slightest cause to fear the issue at which the judgment of the British House of Commons would arrive; and that national faith, for which the noble Lord was so tenderly considerate, would be seen to be as safe, with reference to the question now before that House, in the hands of Her Majesty's Government, as it had been at any former period of our history.

Mr. Labouchere: When the right hon. Gentleman promised to speak at length on such a subject as that, it was impossible, from his known character, not to anticipate a speech of ingenuity and ability; but he must be permitted to say, that if the right hon. Gentleman had had greater confidence in the strength of his case, he would have considerably shortened his speech. At all events, he should illustrate the soundness of his views, by making a much shorter speech. And he could not believe that to come to a just decision on a question of this kind, it was necessary to dwell on the nice and intricate points which the right hon. Gentleman had discussed. He must remind the right hon. Gentleman of the declaration which he made towards the close of his speech, that any plain man reading the terms of those Treaties (which Lord Aberdeen and his Colleagues admitted to be valid once, and as regulating the commerce of Spain), must say, that the claim of Spain was founded in justice. [Mr. Gladstone; I said a plain man might in ignorance so construe it.] It certainly took you a long time to combat the "plain man's" conclusion. It would, indeed, be an unfortunate thing for nations if their meaning could not be interpreted from their communications with each other, unless distilled through the mass of historical references through which the right hon. Gentleman had waded. But the right hon. Gentleman said, if they consulted history, the meaning of these Treaties would be found very different from what it appeared. He should not go back even to Mr. Pitt's time; but he asked, what was the nature of the Treaties approved of by the Government of which the right hon. Gentleman held the office of President of the Board of Trade? He referred to the demand made in July, 1842, by this country, founded on the Treaty of 1667, to be put on the footing of the most favoured nation in the ports of Spain. He would read the letter of Mr. Aston to the Spanish Minister on the subject, and the expression of approval by the Earl of Aberdeen, and the House might then judge what construction had been put by Her Majesty's Government on this very Treaty, so late as the year 1842, and how it was to be reconciled with the interpretation they at present advocated. On the 3rd of July, in that year, Mr. Aston addressed the following despatch to Count Almodovar, the Spanish Minister:—

"Madrid, July 3, 1842.

"Sir—In pursuance of instructions from my Government, I addressed two representations to the Spanish Government, the first on the 29th of April, 1841, the second on the 2nd of January, 1842, respecting the injurious effect produced upon the British linen trade by the high rate of duties imposed upon that article in the Spanish Tariff, which amount almost to a prohibition of the importation of British linen into Spain. To these representations I have not, hitherto, received a definitive answer.

"I consider it the more necessary to call your Excellency's attention to this subject, since it appears probable that the Spanish Government will shortly obtain from the Cortes the necessary authority for the revision of the existing Tariff; and it is my duty to state to your Excellency, that in any reduction which may be in contemplation of the actual duties upon foreign linens, Her Majesty's Government will justly expect that British linen shall be treated as favourably as the same article, the manufacture of any other country.—I have, &c.

(Signed) "ARTHUR ASTON."

Mr. Gladstone: I did not say that that demand was made under the Treaty, but that the demand which the noble Lord made through Mr. Aston on the Spanish Government was made under the Treaty.

Mr. Labouchere scarcely supposed the right hon. Gentleman would resort to an unworthy ambiguity. When the British Minister at Madrid was instructed to press this demand on the Spanish Government, it must have been founded on the existing Commercial Treaty between the two Governments. Lord Aberdeen's letter was as follows:—

"Foreign Office, Aug. 15, 1842.

"Sir—With reference to your despatch of the 16th ult., I have to acquaint you that Her Majesty's Government have approved the note which you addressed to the Spanish Minister for Foreign Affairs, stating that if the Spanish Government should reduce the duty upon any foreign linens, Her Majesty's Government will expect that the same reduction shall apply to British linens.—I am, &c.

(Signed) "ABERDEEN."

He thought these despatches offered sufficient proof to the House that when it was convenient, and suited the purposes of the Government of this country, to put a more strict interpretation on these Treaties, they were not considered to be so confused, so obsolete, such a mass of rubbish, that there was no making anything of them; but Government found in them a distinct principle, importing that England had a right to be treated, with respect to duties on goods, on the footing of the most favoured nation. The right hon. Gentleman, in the course of his speech, made an admission which he (Mr. Labouchere) thought was one of great importance, that if you looked not to the strict letter of those Treaties, nor to particular infractions of them which had taken place since they were formed, but to the analogy of the case, and the spirit of the contracting parties when the Treaties were made, and applied it to the present state of things, this was more hard to defend than any other part of the subject. That was exactly what he contended for; that we ought to look at those Treaties, not in a spirit of cavil, but with a view to see what was their true spirit and intention. If they were to be carried into effect at the present day in the same spirit in which they were framed, we must give to Spain those advantages which we concede to every other foreign country, as far as could be practically effected. Doubtless these Treaties were full of confusion as applied to the circumstances of the day; the whole trade of the world had been changed in its course—but still the principle held good. There were some facts, notorious to all the world, which the right hon. Gentleman had omitted to mention, which showed that the two Governments had been inclined to carry that principle into effect. Spain was long anxious to exclude all nations from her Colonies—it was a capital principle of the old Spanish policy, which had such fatal effects on her prosperity and greatness—but there was one exception, that of the Asiento Contract, which opened to England a direct trade in slaves to the Spanish Colonies; and, indirectly, a large smuggling trade. By the Treaty of Utrecht, in 1713, this Assiento, which before had only been enjoyed, he believed, by the subjects of France, was granted to the subjects of England. The right hon. Gentleman had fallen into the fallacy which he thought too much pervaded the letter of Lord Aberdeen, of treating those rights too much as if they were specific and absolute rights given to the subjects of each country, and not relative rights of being placed on a footing of equality with any other foreign nation whatever. There was one part of the subject, to his mind, infinitely more important than the whole technical construction of those Treaties, of which the right hon. Gentleman had deprecated the discussion, but which the House would ill discharge its duty to the public, if they were not to consider on the present occasion; he meant, not merely the strict technical right which Government might or might not have had to refuse the claims of Spain, on which he admitted there might possibly be a difference of opinion; but that on which he thought there could be no difference of opinion, the policy and propriety of the part Government had acted in this matter. On this view of the subject he must say that he had never listened to any speech in that House with such painful feelings as to that of the right hon. Gentleman. The feeling which rose in his mind was, what an opportunity you have thrown away. There was Spain, not urging you at the point of the sword, as the right hon. Gentleman supposed, but by diplomatic and friendly methods, to form those very commercial engagements with you to which you should have been anxious to urge her. Spain asked you to convert those commercial stipulations which you complained of as difficult and unintelligible, into clear and advantageous commercial compacts, by which both countries might profit. Then as to the sacrifices we were making to carry out this policy of the Government. The right hon. Gentleman said, do not discuss this subject; but discussed it would be in that House so long as the monstrous policy of the Government was continued. Self-imposed sacrifices for great objects were respectable things; but to make great sacrifices for no object, or one so flimsy that the boldest of the supporters of Ministers, who would swell their majority to-night, could not think of the pretence without a smile, was ridiculous. With what object were we to make the sacrifice consequent on a disturbed state of our commercial relations with Spain? As his noble Friend had remarked, by this interpretation they had completely untied the hands of Spain. What right had we to complain if she to-morrow imposed discriminating duties adverse to our manufactures, and favourable to those of France or any other country? Do not let us deceive ourselves with the idea that Spain will not have it in her power to inflict a very heavy blow. He admitted that foreign trade with that country was almost entirely a smuggling trade, and that the duties were merely nominal; but Spain might adopt a system of reasonable duties, and if she accompanied that by discriminating duties unfavourable to us, we could not complain of the retaliation. He would not dwell on the consequences produced by a similar policy in Brazil. Not a post which did not bring accounts of the position in which our merchants were placed, in consequence of the all but stoppage of our commercial relations with that country, of the vexations to which they were exposed, of the hostility generated in the Legislature and people of that country by our conduct. By the last accounts it was daily expected — if the thing had not already happened — that the Brazilian Chambers would actually adopt differential duties against British manufactures. We were told that these sacrifices were made for an object dear to the British people—for the sake of discouraging slavery and the Slave Trade. He would defy any man who had looked into the subject, to say that the consequence of the policy Ministers pursued, was to prevent a single slave the less from being carried across the Atlantic, or to discourage, even in the slightest degree, slavery, as contrasted with free labour, in the cultivation of foreign sugar. When the Ministerial measure of last Session was proposed, they (the Opposition) had foretold that it would be vain for the purpose Ministers professed to have in view; and these predictions had been fulfilled. They were then told, that as the price of free-labour sugar must rise, from the increased demand for it, the sugars of Cuba and Brazil would be brought concurrently into the Continental markets, and supply the vacuum caused by the increased consumption of free-labour sugar. If they had at all succeeded in their object of encouraging free-labour sugar, of course this would be shown by the price. What had been the fact? He asserted that there never had been, since that Act passed, any appreciable difference between the prices of certificated foreign and free-labour sugar in bond in this country; and the price of sugar, the produce of Brazil or Cuba, of the same quality equally in bond in this country. If that were so, really the bubble had burst. The man who would contend, that by their present policy they were, even in the slightest degree, discouraging slavery, or encouraging free labour, must be prepared to contend that Euclid was a book replete with fallacies and falsehoods. It was most mortifying to witness the spectacle of a British Ministry, and one, too, who plumed themselves on the encouragement of commerce, calling on the merchants of this country to submit to the greatest sacrifices; first, from the suspension and loss of the Brazilian trade; next, from the contingencies of the commercial warfare into which we were entering with Spain, and all for no object in the world. He said for no object; but he was afraid there was one: he had lately met with a paragraph in one of the leading Colonial journals, the Ja- maica Morning Journal, which proved that the colonists were beginning to see through this transparent delusion. It was as follows:—

"A law is passed, which, although it affects to confine the competition to the produce of free labour, merely alters the destination of slave-grown sugar in some cases, and in others brings it into immediate competition with the free-grown sugar from the Colonies. After the admission of American slave-grown sugar into the home market, we can perceive no valid reason why that of Spain or the Brazils should be excluded. Indeed, it is manifest that having thrown principle overboard, the Government only exclude these sugars for the purpose of securing all the advantages they can from those countries in a commercial point of view. It is not from any desire to serve the Colonies that Brazilian sugar is not now admitted in the same manner and on the like terms as the sugar of Louisiana."

He believed the motive assigned in this passage paid infinitely too high a compliment to the wisdom of Her Majesty's Government; the truth was, that all those difficulties and embarrassments were the price they were called upon to pay for the course which the present Ministers, when in opposition, found it convenient to pursue with a view to their own party ends. He thought it most unfortunate that a Government which had shown no very great inflexibility of purpose with respect to most subjects, and discarded, one after another, most of the instruments they had made use of to obtain the seats of power, should have selected this one, the most feeble of all the weapons they employed, and certainly the most indefensible in argument of all the courses they had pursued, and have clung to it with such desperate fidelity. Although agreeing generally with his noble Friend, that the spirit of the Treaty would require us to accede to the demand of the Spanish Government; yet, at the same time, he had no earnest desire to rest his vote on that view. Even if he entertained a doubt on that subject, he should still think that, in the present state of affairs, it was the duty of that House to interfere; and, after the experience they had had of the consequences which the Ministerial policy had produced on our commerce with Brazil and Spain, to insist on the necessity of their adopting a course more in consonance with the commercial interests of this country, and with the principles of justice and common sense. He could not help thinking highly enough of the patriotic principles of the right hon. Gentlemen opposite to believe that they would not be unwilling to have a little gentle compulsion put upon them by the House, and to be told that the policy they had recommended having proved a complete and palpable failure as to the discouragement of slavery and the Slave Trade, it was time to restore us to our former footing in our relations with Brazil, and especially to embrace the opportunity now thrown out of placing our commercial relations with Spain on a sound and intelligible footing.

The Attorney General said, when the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down, had risen after the right hon. Member for Newark, he supposed he was proceeding to discuss the matter under consideration of the House. He understood that they had been invited by the noble Lord who opened this debate to consider the interpretation of the Treaties existing between this country and Spain, on which it was said this claim was put forward. The right hon. Member for Newark had discussed the questions arising out of the Treaty point by point; but the right hon. Gentleman opposite entirely abandoned this ground, and, flying off from the true issue, endeavoured to divert the attention of the House to questions of policy and expediency. He must be permitted to assume that the arguments of the right hon Member for Newark were unanswerable; because if any answer could have been given, it would have been afforded by the right hon. Gentleman who had just addressed the House. They were not there to inquire into the questions opened by the right hon. Gentleman opposite, but to inquire as to the construction of Treaties and the interpretation of compacts between this country and Spain. The latter country, it had been shown, had not regarded those Treaties in the light contended for on the other side. She only sought now, by this peculiar mode of interpretation, to secure the admission of sugar from her own Colonies of Cuba and Porto Rico, on the footing of the most favoured nation. He should confine himself strictly to the question before the House, whether the Foreign Office had put the correct construction on the Treaties with Spain. There were no rules of interpretation applicable to a private agreement between individuals, which did not also apply to the case before them. The only difference was, that in the case of a private agreement, they could not pray in aid any other agreement, for the purpose of establishing the interpretation, but must construe it by itself. With respect to Treaties, however, which were matters of public notoriety, and were frequently made the basis of new Conventions, other agreements might be referred to, in order to arrive at the true interpretation. In explaining the Treaties of 1667 and 1713, it would not do to look only to the words, and to overlook all that had occurred in the intervening period. He admitted, with his right hon. Friend, that if any well-meaning ignorant man were to look only at the words, he might be disposed to put on them the interpretation contended for by Gentlemen opposite; but they must look at the circumstances under which the Treaties were made, the state of commerce at that day, the conduct of the parties after the Treaty was made, in order to be in a proper condition to come at a true interpretation. The distinction between persons and produce was clear and intelligible; it was made the ground of the construction for which he contended; it was founded on the state of trade and commerce as explained by his right hon. Friend; it was a construction on which the parties themselves had acted. The Second Article of the Treaty of Utrecht referred to persons, subjects of any of the two States, resorting or trading to th ports of the other, not to persons residing within the dominions of either Power, and being producers or manufacturers there. It referred to the persons, not to their produce. He said this was not a narrow and technical construction, but a legitimate one, accommodated to the circumstances of the time, and borne out by Treaties contemporaneous or subsequent in date. Provisions affecting subjects, but not extending to produce, had been inserted, for example, in the Treaty of Munster between the Netherlands and Spain, to which reference was made in the Treaty of 1667. He would beg to call the attention of the House to the Treaty between the Netherlands and Spain, executed in June 1740. They would find that the words of that Treaty were precisely identical with the terms of the Treaty of Utrecht, made in 1713, on which the question which had been brought before the House arose. The argument of the noble Lord was, that that Treaty of Utrecht referred to produce as well as to subjects. Now, he begged to deny the accuracy of that construction altogether; and he would rely on the Treaty of 1740, to which he had just alluded, as a proof that these Powers, namely, the Netherlands and Spain, regarded the Treaty in the light in which he viewed it, although, as he had already mentioned, it contained the very terms of the Treaty of 1713. If the argument of the noble Lord were well founded, the subjects of the Netherlands could not be liable to pay greater duties in respect to their goods imported into Spain, than the Spanish merchant paid for the goods which he imported; but that would evidently imply an absurdity. The object of the Treaty, as he apprehended, was, that the subjects of both these States should not be liable to pay higher duties within the particular countries, than the subjects of those countries. But he would show them that in a Treaty, almost contemporaneous with the one which they were called upon to construe, a distinction was made between subjects and goods. By the Tenth Article of the Treaty with France, it was provided that the duties on tobacco imported into France shall be reduced to the same moderate rate as the duty on the said tobacco which would be paid on importation to any other country in America or Europe. He alluded to this fact to show, that even at that time the distinction between persons and goods or merchandise was fully understood. He might be permitted to add to these instances the Treaty with Portugal of 1810, which had been quoted by his right hon. Friend (Mr. Gladstone), by the Third Article of which the same rights, immunities, and privileges were secured to the subjects of each nation, that were or might be hereafter granted to the subjects of the most favoured nations. Any one comparing that Article with the corresponding Treaty of Utrecht would find that the terms were just as large in the one as in the other; and yet, in the Treaty of 1810, were the words considered to be sufficient to cover produce of these States? Certainly not. The House would find that by the Nineteenth Article of the Treaty, express provision was distinctly made with respect to the duties to be paid on the produce of the two countries reciprocally, irrespective of the provisions of the Third Article; which were meant to refer to persons only. That Article said—

"His Britannic Majesty does, on his part, and in his own name, and in that of his heirs and successors, promise and engage that all goods, merchandise, and articles whatsoever, of the produce, manufacture, industry, or invention of the dominions or subjects of His Royal Highness the Prince Regent of Portugal, shall be received and admitted into all and singular the ports and dominions of His Britannic Majesty, on paying generally and only the same duties that are paid upon similar articles by the subjects of the most favoured nation."

This would show the legitimate interpretation of the Treaty of Utrecht, when a separate Article was considered necessary in favour of the produce of the countries, after a very strong clause had been previously inserted in favour of the subjects. All these facts went to prove most strongly, according to his judgment, that there was a distinction perfectly well understood and recognised between States as to the separate interests of subjects and of goods. But it was said that they were inconsistent in their conduct as regarded the construction of these Treaties with Spain—that they admitted the slave-grown sugars of the United States and of Venezuela, while they refused to admit the produce of the Spanish Colonies, though the latter were entitled to be placed upon the same footing as the most favoured nations, according to the same construction of the Treaties. He entirely denied that the Treaties with Spain were to be regarded in the same light as those between this country and the United States and Venezuela, and also as the Treaties with Columbia and Mexico. These four Treaties were all in precisely the same terms, and were very different in their provisions from the Spanish Treaties. If the House would permit him, he would wish to call their attention to the Treaties between Great Britain and the United States, which had been made the model for the other Treaties to which he had alluded. By the Second Article of the Treaty of 1815, it was provided that—

"No higher duty or other duties shall be imposed on the importation into the territories of His Britannic Majesty in Europe of any articles, the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States, and no higher or other duties shall be imposed on the importation into the United States of any articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe, than are, or shall be, payable on the like articles, being the growth, produce, or manufacture of any other country; nor shall any higher or other duties or charges be imposed in either of the two countries on the exportation of any articles to His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe, or to the United States, respectively, than such as are payable on the exportation of the like articles to any other foreign country; nor shall any prohibition be imposed upon the exportation or importation of any articles, the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States or of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe, to or from the said territories of His Britannic Majesty in Europe, or to or from the said United States, which shall not equally extend to all other nations."

"The subjects of their Majesties, trading respectively in the dominions of their said Majesties, shall not be bound to pay greater duties, or other imposts whatsoever, for their imports or exports, than shall be exacted of, and paid by, the subjects of the most favoured nation; and if it shall happen in time to come, that any diminution of duties or other advantages shall be granted by either side to any foreign nation, the subjects of each Crown shall reciprocally and fully enjoy the same. And it has been agreed, as is abovementioned, concerning the rates of duties, so it is ordained as a general rule between their Majesties, that all and every one of their subjects shall, in all lands and places subject to the command of their respective Majesties, use and enjoy at least the same privileges, liberties, and immunities, concerning all imposts or duties whatsoever, which relate to persons, wares, merchandise, ships, freighting, mariners, navigation, and commerce, and enjoy the same favour in all things, as well in the courts of justice as in all those things which relate to trade, or any other trade whatsoever as the most favoured nation uses and enjoys, or may use and enjoy for the future, as is explained more at large in the Thirty-eighth Article of the Treaty of 1667, which is specially inserted in the foregoing Article."

He had no hesitation in saying that if he were to look only to the construction that was to be put upon the words of these two Treaties, he would come to precisely the same conclusion to which the Foreign Office had arrived, and that, too, without reference to the conduct of the parties, or to any other circumstances whatever. But without going that length, he would maintain that having regard to the conduct of the parties, it was not at any time understood that the produce of those countries was to be put upon the same footing as that of the most favoured nation under these Treaties. He wished incidentally to allude to what his right hon. Friend had stated of the Treaties being probably not now on the same footing as they had formerly been. Whether they regarded the conduct of the countries, the construction that might have been put upon the Treaties, or some violation of their integrity, it was quite possible that the Treaties might not now be considered as subsisting in their full force. He made this allusion out of deference to the argument of his right hon. Friend (Mr. Gladstone); but at the same time he did not think it at all necessary to rely upon that point in coming to a decision on the question before the House. The Treaties of 1667 and 1670 were confirmed by the Treaty of 1713, and these were all confirmed by the Treaties of 1763 and 1783. In the Treaty of 1814 the commercial relations between the two countries were to be established; and in reference to it, the previous Treaties might fairly, he thought, be considered as still existing, and might be properly looked to in interpreting the nature of these relations. He would endeavour to deal, very shortly indeed, with the question of the Colonies; and here he had to express his regret, that his right hon. Friend had not taken the same view which he was disposed to adopt. In his opinion the Colonial trade was entirely struck out of the Treaty of Utrecht. He considered the object of the Eighth Article of the Treaty of 1670 to be to prohibit entirely the trade with the Colonies. That trade was excluded, not only by the Eighth, but also by the Ninth Article of the Treaty, and was, in his opinion, thus intended to be kept entirely in the hands of the Sovereigns of the two States. In the Treaty of Peace of 1713 there was an express prohibition of any guarantee to France to trade with the Colonies. Therefore, taking all the Articles of all the Treaties together, the construction which he was disposed to place on them was, that the Colonial trade was, as it were, struck out of the Treaties, and was intended to remain entirely and exclusively attached to the mother country. Now, by the Fourth Article of the Treaty of 1814, it was provided that in the event of the commerce of the Spanish Colonies being opened, the subjects of His Britannic Majesty were to be permitted to trade to them on the terms of the most favoured nation. He would admit that there was no reciprocity in that arrangement, as it conferred a benefit only on one side; but on that very ground he considered it as strengthening his construction of the prior Treaties. In construing Treaties, they should have regard to the conduct of the parties; and in this view also his argument was borne out by the fact. In the year 1824, when the trade with the Spanish Colonies was opened, the advantage was not conferred on Great Britain alone, but on all nations indiscriminately, and without reference to any particular Treaty; though, according to the argument of the noble Lord, Great Britain would have had a right to challenge the opening of that trade to her commerce by virtue of existing Treaties. He had endeavoured to compress his arguments within the narrowest possible compass; and he trusted he had not trespassed too far upon the indulgence of the House. He would admit, that in construing Treaties with other countries, they should have regard to good faith, and should observe a true and just interpretation of their provisions; but it appeared to him that they would violate all the fair rules of construction, if they came to the decision for which the noble Lord contended.

Mr. F. T. Baring said, he felt strongly the inconvenience of trespassing upon the House at that late hour; but he could not so far forget his character as to appear to be influenced in the vote which he was about to give by mere party purposes. He agreed with the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just sat down, that no question of policy should persuade them to give up the real and just construction of the Treaty. But he also thought that when Spain called upon them to adopt her construction of the Treaties, it was worth their while to consider whether that construction was a fair one towards themselves. He thought that when the subject became a question for a long State Paper, it should become a consideration whether Spain was not offering to them what they should be of all things in the world most anxious to receive from her. He admitted the talent of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, who indeed never spoke without manifesting great ability; but he set aside entirely the whole argument of Lord Aberdeen. The argument of the right hon. Gentleman was altogether contrary to the argument of Lord Aberdeen. The right hon. Gentleman indeed said, that he did not adopt the argument as put in Lord Aberdeen's letter; and the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just sat down differed from the right hon. Gentleman, and he also did not adopt the argument of Lord Aberdeen. The right hon. Gentleman wished to show that the ancient Treaties with Spain had ceased to exist. If they did not exist, what then was the use of inquiry about them? Now, Lord Aberbeen said that they did exist. The right hon. Gentleman admitted that there was a severe strain on his argument by these Treaties; he therefore denied that they now existed. He subsequently added that they did not exist to the extent of the terms, and therefore they were entitled to this interpretation of them. The only limit to this, then, was the law of the strong man, who said that he would fix his own interpretation on them. The right hon. Gentleman, when he came to the conclusion of his speech, said that the Treaties did not exist entirely. He added that he did not know what had been done away with, and what had not; it therefore was hardly possible to meet him on the point. It was very well for the right hon. Gentleman to say that they did not exist; but the matter, as between nations, must be determined by Lord Aberdeen's letter. Lord Aberdeen admitted that the Treaties existed, and did not venture to say that they had been abrogated; therefore the whole language of the right hon. Gentleman, on this point, was immaterial. In the main question, Lord Aberdeen said, that there were two grounds involved in the question—the Colonial ground, the argument with respect to which was well known; and the next ground was the difference between persons and produce. And upon this point, he was surprised to find that the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just spoken, and who had been the organ of the Government in this debate, had taken a different ground from that adopted by Lord Aberdeen. Lord Aberdeen made the admission, that the Treaty of 1667, was a general Treaty; this the hon. and learned Member did not admit, or that it involved anything respecting the most favoured nation clause. He would now read the words of the letter:—

"Admitting that the Treaty of 1667 conferred upon the subjects of Spain, the position of the most favoured nation in British ports, yet that privilege could not, subsequently to 1670, have belonged to Spanish West India trade, because, under the terms of the Treaty of 1670, such trade could not have been carried on with British ports."

Again, Lord Aberdeen stated—

"While, therefore, the Treaty of 1667 gave generally to the subjects of Great Britain and Spain respectively the privileges of the most favoured nation, the trade belonging to the West Indian Colonies of the two countries was expressly excluded from the enjoyment of the privileges so conferred."

Lord Aberdeen, therefore, admitted that the Treaty contained a full and general clause; but that the effect of the Treaty of 1670 was to draw both countries from mutual Colonial trade. Therefore, he started with the proposition that all depended on the legal interpretation of the Treaties; and as to how far the Treaty of 1670 affected that of 1667, the subsequent passage read—

"As far as not repugnant with the Articles in the latter Treaty."

The prohibitory clause prevented all trade with the West Indies, and gave powers for the purpose of future regulations. This was perfectly consistent with the principle that this negotiation should be subordinate to the principle of the most favoured nation. There was nothing repugnant in giving this power to Spain, or inconsistent with the clause in the former Treaty. By the most favoured nation clause they did not say a nation must create a trade; but if it did, the trade should be put in the construction of the clause. It was consistent with this that the whole of the West Indies might be excluded. So far, then, as they kept up the prohibition in the Colonies from trading with all foreign countries, they persisted in adhering to the most favoured nation clause. It gave the power to England and Spain reciprocally to regulate the trade, always subservient to this principle. He would show, however, that the Government admitted the most favoured nation clause. They did so by the Treaty of 1814, by which they admitted that—

"In the event of the commerce of the Spanish American possessions being opened to foreign nations, His Catholic Majesty promises that Great Britain shall be admitted to trade with those possessions as the most favoured nation."

Now, within a month afterwards, it appeared that the old Treaties were not in force, although Lord Aberdeen seemed to think that they were. Within two months of the former Treaty, additional Articles were agreed to, by which all the old Treaties were renewed, by which Spain admitted that we should be put on the same footing as the most favoured nation. The whole question depended upon the fact, as to whether the regulating power was opposed to, and inconsistent with the principle of the most favoured nation clause.

This was the argument, and yet they had signed a Treaty in which both co-existed. The right hon. Gentleman said that the Colonies were taken out of the operation of the Treaty. But to consider this, they should look to the practical effect of the trade carried on in that time. Formerly, there was no trade there; for, as far as the West Indies were concerned, they might be considered out of the map. They renewed the old Treaties at the Peace of 1814, and when the right hon. Gentleman admitted that they were in force; and by this Act, at that time, the most favoured nation clause was renewed, and part of that Treaty contemplated that at some future time the trade to the whole Spanish West Indies might be opened to this country. There was no doubt, however, that from 1810 to the time of the Treaty, in the return of the Bourbons, the trade between the Spanish Colonies and England had been opened. The right hon. Gentleman could hardly doubt this. He held in his hand a passage from a despatch of Mr. Canning, of the date of 1823, in which he stated that the trade had been opened, and the prohibitory clause had been practically repealed. This had occurred in consequence of an English vessel having been seized under the prohibitory law. In 1814, the old Treaties had been renewed, containing the most favoured nation clause, with the full knowledge that the Colonies must be opened; and they could not now pretend to say that the trade was not to be opened. But supposing that the case of the Government was admitted, and the argument was allowed; suppose, also, that the navigation laws continued still in force, and that on the part of Spain the most strict laws were still in force, still it was perfectly clear that it was in the power of a Spaniard, as far as the laws of this country were concerned, to import Spanish sugar in a British vessel. He therefore said, that at the time of the attempt to do what they now did, a Spaniard might have introduced sugar through Spain, provided it was brought in a British vessel, and he might call upon you to give him the full benefit of the most favoured nation clause. But what was Lord Aberdeen's argument? He stated that some things existed which were inconsistent with this trade, and he confessed that he was somewhat puzzled at the argument used. The Article alluded to was not signed at the time, but was an additional Article to the Treaty of 1814. The right hon. Gentleman would find that the object of this Treaty was a separate Article, and not a secret Article to prevent the renewal of the Family Compact between France and Spain. Subsequently they renewed all the former Treaties, and with a larger construction. The next argument of Lord Aberdeen was, that in 1824, when a reciprocity power was granted to other nations, and when Spain opened her Colonies to foreign nations, it was in 1828 only that such power was given to Spain in return. He would not attempt to conceal a difficulty he had always felt on this subject. He felt the greatest doubt whether, under the reciprocity Treaties with the most favoured nations, they always gave the reciprocity to England. He knew that the strongest doubts remained on this point; and as far as the argument went in this case, the Government did not admit this to be the case. The right hon. Gentleman upset Lord Aberdeen's argument in his letter, and the hon. and learned Gentleman upset the law of the right hon. Gentleman. In the earlier part of our commercial negotiations, we did through persons what we now did through things, and certainly the latter was much more effective in manner than the former. According to the strict Article of the Treaty, Spanish subjects might introduce Cuba sugar into this country the same as sugar from Venezuela. If this was the case, there was little difficulty in the objection. The right hon. Gentleman threw overboard entirely the arguments of his noble Friend on this part of the subject, as if they had never been uttered. In the Treaty of 1715, the Treaty of 1667 was regarded, not merely as a Treaty giving personal rights, but as a Treaty for two nations, and that the commerce between the subjects of each should be carried on on an equal footing. In the 5th Clause it stated—

"And the said subjects shall be used in Spain in the same manner as the most favoured nation, and consequently all nations shall pay the same duties on wool and other merchandise, which shall be brought into or carried out of these kingdoms by land, as the said subjects pay on the same goods which they shall import or export by sea."

The object of this was to prevent the goods of France getting into Spain at a lower duty than when imported by sea. He should be glad to hear how this consequence of the Treaty of 1667 followed, unless it had in view, not the interest of parties, but of the general commerce of both countries. He would not trouble the House further than to observe, that the personal question as regarded a Spaniard was on the same footing as regarded a Swede or any other foreigner. Now, how did the case work, and how did the Government fulfil the Treaty in dealing with Spain as with the most favoured nation? A Venezuelan could bring his slave-grown sugar into England in a Venezuelan ship. A Spaniard proposed to bring his slave-grown sugar into England. He carried his sugar to Venezuela, and changed it for Venezuelan sugar; and brought it to England. The reply then was, that this was not Spanish sugar; the objection, in the first place, was not to the produce but to the person; but when it was taken to Venezuela, the objection was to the produce and not to the person.

Sir G. Clerk rose amidst loud cries of "Divide," which continued throughout the whole of the right hon. Gentleman's address to the House. He denied that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Labouchere) was justified in charging the Government with not having kept faith with Spain What construction had the Parliament of England in 1668 put upon the Treaty of 1667? It was obvious what the construction was which they put upon it, from the fact that they imposed a differential duty on Spanish wine. Though that was done so recently after the Treaty, Spain made no remonstrance. In 1686 again, a differential duty of 50 per cent. was laid upon Spanish wine. It was not until 1828 that we opened our Colonies to Spanish vessels. Did Spain, during all that time, even think of the Treaty of 1713? No, nor did she act upon it herself. In 1814, Spain levied upon American ships entering the port of Havana, a duty of one dollar; while upon British vessels she imposed a duty of a dollar and a half. Mr. Canning, on our part, remonstrated, and threatened to resort to retaliatory measures. The answer of Spain was, that she was acting on a principle of reciprocity with America. She made no allusion to the Treaty of 1713. Nothing could be so absurd as the supposition that Great Britain could enter into any such Treaty as that assumed by the noble Lord and the right hon. Gentleman. There were abundant authorities in favour of the course adopted on this occasion by the Government, from Mr. Pitt down to the right hon. Gentleman opposite, whose attempted Commercial Treaty with France was a distinct proof that Spain was not considered as one of the most favoured nations. The noble Lord and his Colleagues, in 1841, were quite ready to conclude that Treaty with France on this basis. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by opposing the Motion.

Mr. Barclay moved the adjournment of the debate.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer thought the subject had been sufficiently debated, and that adjournment was not necessary. ["Divide," "Go on."]

Mr. Barclay resumed. He differed from the Attorney General in his view of the case. It presented two points. One, the conduct of the Spanish Government; the other, the policy of Her Majesty's Government on the Sugar question. The noble Lord attacked one point as a feint to cover his assault on the other. Whatever were the correct interpretation of the Treaties with Spain, it was clear by that of 1670 that the Colonies of that country had no claim on Great Britain. At the same time, he thought it would be better to concede the same right to Spain as was granted to other countries. It was absurd to talk of the honour of Spain, a country which had violated all her obligations to this country on the subject of the Slave Trade—all her officers being engaged in that traffic. If the sugars of Cuba and Porto Rico were to be admitted, they should be admitted on the ground of self-interest, not on the ground of right or of honour. He maintained the inexpediency of allowing slave-grown sugar in the British market, on the ground of religion and humanity, though he admitted the discriminating clause was an innovation on the commercial code of this country. It was no argument to urge that coffee and cotton were slave-grown in favour of sugar; but they were not so destructive of human life. There was no inconsistency greater than that of the noble Lord in the course of that night in respect to the Slave Trade. It would be impossible to suppress that trahe while the demand for slave-grown sugar was promoted by such notions as that of the noble Lord. [Cries of "Divide."] He did not attach such importance to the discriminatory principle as regarded sugar, as did the West Indian interest; but he considered that it checked very much the cultivation of slave-grown sugar.

Viscount Patmerston: Sir, after the able speeches of my two right hon. Friends, it would be presumptuous on my part to attempt to add anything to the answers which they had given to the speeches of the hon. Gentlemen who have addressed the House on this subject on the other side. The right hon. Gentleman the late President of the Board of Trade, as he has always done, in an able and ingenious speech, showing deep research and great knowledge, addressed himself to the question; but I must say that it is not always the best symptom of the goodness of a cause, that such a long and ingenious defence is required to support it. A great portion of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman I shall dispense with any reference to, as it went to show that the old Treaties with Spain were no longer in existence; for I will take my stand, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth has done, on the allegation of Lord Aberdeen, which shows that he considers them distinctly in force at the present moment. The point, then, for us to consider, is, what the meaning of those Treaties is? The Treaties give to Spain the advantages, with regard to imports into this country, which would be conceded to the most favoured nation; it is said, however, by hon. Gentlemen opposite, that these advantages did not apply to the productions of Spain, but to persons. The right hon. Gentleman the late President of the Board of Trade, however, gave up that argument; and I must remark that what between his admissions and the difference between his opinions and those of the Attorney General, if the plus and minus were set against each other, very little would remain in favour of the hon. Gentlemen opposite, who deny that these Treaties give to Spain the privileges of the most favoured nation. If it is said that the advantages apply to persons, I ask what does that mean? If a Spanish subject comes from Cuba to England with the produce of Cuba, he is entitled to the introduction of that produce according to the terms which would be granted to the most favoured nation. The right hon. Gentleman, however, states that such a construction would lead to an absurdity, as that a Spanish subject might bring in Cuba sugar at a low duty; whereas the same sugar brought in by an English merchant, or the property of an English merchant, would be liable to the higher duty. If that be the interpretation, then can you not take measures to escape the absurdity of your own law? If you admit that such is the interpretation of the Treaty, you ought to alter the law which produces such an absurdity. If, by the Treaties, a Spanish subject is entitled to the privileges of the most favoured nation, but that you are not bound to extend it to others bringing in the same produce, and that you would thus have conflicting duties, then alter those conflicting duties, and get rid of the absurdity by changing the law. With respect to the Article of the Treaty with Spain in 1814, I will remind the right hon. Gentleman opposite of what he seemed to forget, and what seemed to have been forgotten by the writer of the note also, namely, that at the time, in July, when the Article was signed, the ancient Treaties had not been re-established; and it was not until the following month of August that the ancient Treaties were re-established. I was about to refer to the argument of the hon. and learned Gentleman (the Attorney General) namely, that those who had taken upon themselves the defence of the Government on this occasion—none of them, however, having the responsibility of a Cabinet Minister, for we have not heard from a Cabinet Minister himself any defence of this measure—but none of those who have spoken on the part of the Government, had anything at all to do with the policy of the question. It was simply a question of Treaties. I must beg leave to say that, even if the point as to the construction of the Treaties were given up, and if it were admitted that there was a doubt in regard to these Treaties, I still think it was incumbent on the Government to show that in point of policy the measure was right. I do not admit that the defence of the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down, and who certainly has shown great courage and perseverance in advancing his opinions—I do not admit that his defence of the policy ought to satisfy the House. He spoke with strong feeling in defence of the West Indian interest, and naturally enough defended the measure as being one beneficial to the West Indians. But the defence of the measure which I require is one having reference to the country at large, to the whole commercial interests of this united Empire; and I contend that in that respect the observations of the hon. Gentleman, however, able they may have been, do not apply to the general policy of the measure; by which I mean the policy of rejecting the overture made on the part of a Power like Spain, for giving you a great mercantile advantage which you have not possessed before in relation to that country, by placing her and her Colonies on the footing of, and conferring on her and them the privileges enjoyed by, the most favoured nation.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, July 16, 1845.

MINUTES.] BILLS. Public.—Reported.—Turnpike Acts Continuance; Loan Societies; Highway Rates; Militia Ballots Suspension; Unlawful Oaths (Ireland); Land Revenue Act Amendment.

PETITIONS PRESENTED. By Mr. T. Duncombe, from Henry Walker, of 29 St. John Street, Clerkenwell, against Lunatics Bill.

The House assembled at twelve o'clock.

LUNATICS.] On the Motion that the Speaker leave the Chair to go into Committee on the Lunatics Bill,

Mr. T. Duncombe protested against proceeding with the consideration of the Bill in the absence of the right hon. Baronet the Secretary for the Home Department. The hon. Member was proceeding, when the right hon. Baronet the Secretary for the Home Department took his seat; and the hon. Member said he would not further oppose the Motion.

House in Committee.

On Clause 5, which provides for the retiring pensions of the Commissioners,

Mr. Warburton moved to omit all the words after "that," for the purpose of inserting the following words:—

"Any superannuation allowance to be granted to any paid Commissioner appointed, or to be appointed, under this Act, shall be granted only as a Compensation for services performed under this Act, and shall be subject to the provisions of an Act passed in the fourth and fifth years of His late Majesty William the Fourth, in respect of such officers and clerks as might enter the public service after the 4th day of August, 1829."

Mr. S. Crawford objected to any superannuation allowance. He concurred with the hon. Member for Finsbury in recommending the postponement of the Bill.

Amendment agreed to.

On the Motion that the clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill,

Mr. T. Duncombe objected altogether to granting retiring pensions to the Commissioners, and should take the sense of the House on the point. Why should these Commissioners be placed in a better situation than the Poor Law Commissioners and the Inspectors of prisons? Their duties were performed principally for the benefit of the rich, who ought to provide for their maintenance. He recommended that the duration of the Commission should be limited for the present to three years. He again urged on the Government the policy of postponing the Bill till next Session, when they would be enabled to bring in a satisfactory measure, after due deliberation, and a careful consideration of suggested amendments. As, however, Government seemed resolved to force the Bill through Parliament, in despite of opposition, and with an attendance of Members absurdly inadequate to the consideration of such a question, he should feel it his duty to offer every clause his most strenuous opposition.

Sir J. Graham referred to the conduct of those having charge of the Bill, with reference to the Amendment proposed by the hon. Member for Kendal, in proof of the readiness with which they were willing to acquiesce in any reasonable suggestion. It would be better to discuss the objections to the various clauses in their regular order. He should, however, deceive the hon. Member, if he held out any hope that he could consent to limit the duration of the Commission.

Mr. Wakley moved "That no person should be hereafter appointed to the Commission who was above the age of forty-five years."

Amendment negatived.

The Committee divided on the Motion, that the clause stand part of the Bill:—Ayes 43; Noes 3: Majority 40.

Clauses up to Clause 9 inclusive were agreed to, and schedules were agreed to. The House resumed. Report to be received.

VALUATION (IRELAND) BILL.] Sir T. Fremantle moved "That the House do resolve itself into Committee on this Bill."

Sir R. Ferguson objected to proceeding with the Bill at that hour.

An hon. Member moved that the House be counted, and twenty-three Members only being present, the House adjourned at half-past four.

3ª. and passed:—Birmingham Blue Coat School Charity Estate; Sampson's Estate (Ward's); Wear Valley Railway; Preston and Wyre Railway; Harwell and Streatley Road; Saint Matthew's (Bethnal Green) Rectory.

PETITIONS PRESENTED. From Longford, for the Better Observance of the Sabbath.—By the Marquess of Londonderry, from Landowners of the Baronies of Ards, and Castlereagh, and numerous other places, against the Tenants' Compensation (Ireland) Bill.—From Commissioners of Supply of Nairnshire, for Insertion of Clause in Railway Bills, to compel Proprietors of Railways to Compensate Creditors of Turnpike Trusts.

IRISH GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY.] The Earl of Besborough brought up the Report of the Select Committee on the Irish Great Western (Dublin and Galway) Bill, to which the petition had been referred. The Report (which the noble Earl read in a low tone at the Table) was understood to state, that it had not been the practice of this Company to require references from applicants for shares, and that allotments had been made to persons under feigned and fictitious names, and to paupers and others who had no means of paying the requisite deposits; that the system adopted was one which tended to defeat the object of Parliament in its rules on this subject, and that the reduction made last Session in the required amount of deposit had had the effect of facilitating the commission of fraud. The noble Earl concluded by moving that the Report should be printed, together with the evidence in the case, and that it should be referred to the Committee on the Bill.

Lord Brougham expressed his belief that it would be better not to enter then into any discussion of that Report, but to wait until it was printed with the evidence, according to the Motion of his noble Friend.

After a few words from the Marquess of Clanricarde and the Earl of Wicklow,

Motion agreed to.

APPREHENSION OF OFFENDERS.] The Earl of Aberdeen laid on the Table a Bill for facilitating the Execution of the Treaties with France and the United States of America, for the Apprehension of certain Offenders. We had received from France and America all the offenders for whom we had applied; but in consequence of technical difficulties, it had been found impossible to surrender to France any one offender, and to America only one or two. The Bill provided only that the warrant of the Secretary of State should in all cases be directed to some one of the police magistrates of the Metropolis, instead of the magistrates generally throughout the country, so that uniformity of decision should be secured.

Bill read 2ª.

House adjourned.

The House met at twelve o'clock.

INCLOSURE OF COMMONS.] The Earl of Lincoln moved the Order of the Day for the Third Reading of the Inclosure of Commons Bill.

Colonel Sibthorp had from the first opposed this Bill, and would still oppose it, because he thought proper time had not been given for its due consideration. There might be some good clauses in it; but it was of so important a nature that he should object to the Bill altogether, unless it were for some time postponed.

Mr. Eliot Yorke hoped that the House would at once proceed with the consideration of the Bill, as it was calculated to be of great benefit to all classes of the community.

Mr. Sharman Cranford felt it to be his duty again to state his objections to many parts of the Bill, as they had not been removed in its former stages. The Bill was calculated to benefit the landlords alone, and would not be advantageous to the working classes, who ought to be considered. In proof of what he stated, he would quote the evidence of Mr. H. Martin, of Hadlow, in Kent, who had stated that the rent of common land, which was formerly 16*s.* per acre, had now risen to 2*l.* per acre. Under these circumstances, he would not now further trouble the House; but when the question should be put that the do pass into a law, he would divide the House.

Mr. Becket Denison regretted deeply that the hon. Member for Rochdale, whose character for benevolence stood very high in that House as well as out of it, should be found to oppose the Bill, especially as his influence and importance among the labouring poor were very great. He was sure that if that hon. Gentleman should succeed in rejecting the Bill, he would sooner or later regret that success; for he would find that he had been doing a great injury to the labouring poor residing on the borders of the commons which, by this Bill, would be enclosed. He would give his most cordial consent to the Bill.

The Earl of Lincoln said, that sufficient time had been given for discussion on this Bill, since it had been before the public nearly three years. The measure, he was sure, would be found to be of the greatest advantage to the labouring poor, as well as to the landlords and landowners.

Order of the Day read. Bill read a third time.

On the Question that the Bill do pass,

Mr. Sharman Crawford contended again that the mode of distribution of land, as proposed by this Bill, was most arbitrary and unjust; and as his objections had failed to be considered, he should feel it his duty to divide the House on the Question.

The House divided:—Ayes 48; Noes 0: Majority 48.

Bill passed.

The two Tellers for the Noes were, Mr. Sharman Crawford and Colonel Sibthorp.

DRAINAGE OF LANDS.] The Earl of Lincoln moved that Mr. Speaker do leave the Chair, for the House to go into Committee on the Drainage of Lands Bill.

Colonel Sibthorp said, though his objections to the Bill that had just passed were very great, his objections to the present were even stronger; for its object seemed to him to be, the protection and screening of those who had benefited themselves at the expense of others, and because it gave such great power to the Commissioners to interfere with the private property of gentlemen.

The Earl of Lincoln said, that none of the Commissioners, or Assistant Commissioners, would venture to proceed anywhere to undertake surveys or operations provided by this law, without being first applied to by the owner of the land.

Mr. Sharman Crawford hoped that the hon. and gallant Colonel would not proceed with his opposition to this Bill, for he thought it was a reasonable Bill, and would be productive of great good.

House went into Committee. The Bill passed through Committee, and House resumed. Report to be received.

FISHERIES (IRELAND).] House in Committee on the Fisheries (Ireland) Bill.

On Clause 3, "Power of Commissioners to hear complaints and remove illegal weirs," Captain Jones thought this clause extremely objectionable. It gave the Commissioners the power of trying questions of property probably to a large amount. It was true there was an appeal; but was it reasonable that parties should be drawn to such an appeal?

Sir R. Ferguson objected to the clause, and for the same reasons.

Sir Thomas Fremantle stated that the object of the clause had been misunderstood. It was not intended to give the Commissioners the power of trying questions of property; but it was intended to prevent parties from erecting weirs, after its being ascertained by law that they had no authority to do so.

Sir W. Somerville was as anxious as any one to prevent the erection of illegal weirs; but it would be extremely hard that persons who had a right to erect weirs should have that right decided by the Commissioners, or have an expensive appeal to reverse his decision.

Captain Jones was of opinion that the clause, as at present worded, would certainly give that power to the Commissioners.

Mr. George Hamilton said, after the explanation of the right hon. Baronet, the only question was, whether the clause carried out the intention. The right hon. Baronet stated, it was not intended to give the Commissioners the power of trying a bonâ fide claim, but only to prevent a trespass. The language of the clause appeared to him ambiguous; perhaps it might be explained by a provision at the end, similar to that in the Malicious Trespass Act, excluding jurisdiction where there was a bonâ fide claim of right or title.

The Attorney General quoted some cases to show that this rule held good at Common Law in all summary jurisdictions.

Sir Robert Ferguson thought that some explanation was necessary.

Mr. George Hamilton urged the introduction of such a provision. It was desirable that the intention of the Legislature should be clearly expressed.

Sir Thomas Fremantle would accede to the suggestion of his hon. Friend.

Bill went through Committee.

The House resumed. Bill to be reported.

AMALGAMATION OF RAILWAYS.] Mr. Milner Gibson begged to call the attention of the right hon. the Vice President of the Board of Trade to a Clause of an unprecedented nature which had been introduced into the Manchester and Liverpool Railroad Bill, which gave to the proprietors the power of amalgamating with other companies without any further application to Parliament. A similar clause had found its way into certain other Bills. He wished to ask whether Her Majesty's Government were prepared to introduce a Bill for the purpose of repealing that and similar clauses.

Sir G. Clerk said, the subject was one of great importance, and the clause was totally without precedent. It was calculated to establish a monopoly which might be very inconvenient to the public. It would be recollected that the clause passed through the House without resistance; and, as it was not touched by any of the Lords' Amendments, he could not get rid of it without throwing the Bill out altogether. The Report of the Board of Trade had recommended the House to take care that no Railway Bill should give any such power of transfer. The only way to meet the case would be to bring in a Bill to declare, that notwithstanding the indefinite powers granted in several Railway Bills to lease or transfer their railways, it should not be lawful to do so unless the Bill under which the parties acted contained a clause specifying the parties authorized to make such transfer, and the companies to whom it was to be made. In future, the Committee should have the proposition before them, stating the lines that were intended to be amalgamated. If it met with the general approval of the House, he was prepared to bring in a Bill of that nature.

Mr. Brotherton thought that it would have been a great hardship and injustice to throw out the Bill on account of the introduction of the objectionable clause; but he was glad to hear that the right hon. Gentleman proposed to bring in a Bill to prevent the injurious consequences which might result from that clause; and he hoped that the Standing Orders would be suspended to allow of the speedy passing of such a Bill.

Subject at an end.

COMPENSATION TO TENANTS.] Mr. Sharman Crawford inquired, whether it were the intention of the Government to proceed further with the Tenants' Compensation Bill?

Sir R. Peel said, that the Bill had been committed to a Select Committee in the House of Lords; but as there was no probability, owing to the delay which had occurred, of that Bill coming down to the House of Commons at such a period as would admit of its proper consideration during the present Session, the Government did not propose to proceed with it. But another Bill, growing out of the Report, would be taken into consideration during the recess, and brought into Parliament at an early period next Session.

Mr. S. Crawford said, that in 1843, he introduced a Bill having reference to the subject, and it was his intention to move for leave, before the termination of the present Session, to re-introduce it, in order that it might be under the consideration of the Government and the public during the recess. He trusted that, under these circumstances, no opposition would be offered to the introduction of the Bill.

Sir R. Peel said, that he should be very unwilling to throw any opposition in the way of the introduction of the Bill.

HEALTH OF TOWNS.] In answer to a question from Mr. Bouverie,

The Earl of Lincoln said, that it was his intention to bring in and print a Bill relating to the Health of Towns, in order that it might be circulated during the recess.

JEWISH DISABILITIES.] Sir R. Peel, in rising to move the Second Reading of the Jewish Disabilities Removal Bill, said —Mr. Speaker, I am now about to call the attention of the House to a Bill which has been sent down to this House from the other branch of the Legislature, and which has for its object the removal of all obstacles to the admission of members of the Jewish persuasion to municipal offices. The Bill has received the almost unanimous support of the other branch of the Legislature; and I do trust that I shall be enabled to give such an explanation of the objects of the Bill, and the reasons upon which it is founded, as will induce the House to receive with equal favour the measure which has been sent for our concurrence by the other House of Parliament. The object of the Bill is to remove every impediment whatever, of every kind, to the admission of Jews to municipal offices—to any office of magistrate, of trust, and of emolument, connected with municipal corporations. I will first state what is the great impediment which at present exists to the admission of Jews to these corporate offices. It exists in consequence of the enactment which was passed through Parliament in 1828, for the purpose of repealing the Acts called the Test and Corporation Acts, and of substituting in their room a declaration in lieu of a Sacramental

Test, and other declarations previously required. With respect to appointments generally, that declaration is to be made subsequent to the appointment to office; and consequently the passing of the Annual Indemnity Act enables those who might have been previously disqualified, by their compliance with a certain condition, to become eligible to fill these corporate offices. The enactment which was passed in 1828, was then a substitute for the Test and Corporation Acts, and was this—that the declaration which was substituted for the Sacramental Test was to be taken in respect to municipal offices either within a month before the admission or upon the admission of persons to office. Serious doubts have from time to time arisen as to the proper construction of these words. It was held by the Court of Queen's Bench, that there was nothing in the law which prevented a Jew from taking the oaths of office previously to or upon his admission, and that the law would be satisfied if the declaration were subsequent. That was ruled by the Court of Queen's Bench; but upon an appeal to the Judges in the Exchequer Chamber, the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench in that respect was reversed, and the law was laid down that the declaration to be made in the case of a municipal office must be made either previously to or upon admission to office. Consequently it rests with the authorities in a municipal corporation, if they think fit, to require the Jew to make the declaration either previously to or at the time of his acceptance of office. Now the practice of requiring the declaration has not been universal throughout this country. In the case of several corporations, the law, as laid down by the Court of Queen's Bench, though reversed by the Judges sitting in the Court of Appeal, has been practically acted upon. In the borough of Portsmouth there is now a Jew a member of that body, because the corporation have not felt themselves precluded from contenting themselves with the omission of the oaths of office, on admission to office, leaving the party to make the declaration at a subsequent period. The party has not made the declaration at a subsequent period; but the annual Indemnity Act has covered the omission. In the case of Birmingham and of Southampton, there is also a Jew a member of the corporation. The practice, therefore, having varied, the object of the present Bill is to render it uniform, and to remove impediments which, at the discretion of the municipal body, may be opposed to the admission of Jews. How stand the Jews at the present moment with respect to other offices, with functions not dissimilar to those of municipal offices? In respect to the county magistracy, there is no legal impediment to the admission of Jews. In respect to the still higher office of deputy lieutenant of a county, there is at the present moment no practical difficulty; and within the last three or four years several most respectable Gentlemen of the Jewish persuasion have actually been appointed deputy lieutenants. One of the Messrs. Rothschild is a deputy lieutenant. Sir Moses Montefiore is a deputy lieutenant. He was appointed by the Duke of Wellington to be a magistrate of the Cinque Ports. In Devon there is a magistrate of the Jewish persuasion. In Surrey Mr. Cohen is a magistrate. How stands the case as to the sheriffs of the county, the immediate representatives of the Sovereign? To that high office, next to that of Lord Lieutenant, the Jew is eligible by law; nay, more, the Jew is compelled to serve the office of sheriff. The Jew is not enabled to make an excuse to relieve himself from the duty of performing the onerous and sometimes expensive functions of the office of sheriff. The Judges going the circuit return the name of the Jew to the Privy Council; the Privy Council certify the return to Her Majesty, and Her Majesty approves, speaking generally, the appointment of the gentleman who stands first upon the list to the office of sheriff; and within the last two or three years Her Majesty's prerogative has been exercised in favour of the appointment of a Jew to be sheriff of a county; and not only has the Jew been appointed, but his attempt to excuse himself on account of private avocations has been refused. You impose, therefore, upon the Jew the burden of the acceptance of that office. There was a doubt whether a Jew would be eligible for the office of sheriff of a county, of a city, or borough. What course did Parliament take? Mr. Salomons was elected by the free choice of the citizens of London to the office of sheriff of Middlesex. The doubt arose in that case whether the declaration must not be made, as it must be considered a municipal office, either previously to or upon the acceptance of office; and in the year 1835 Parliament altered the law in that respect, expressly exempted the office of sheriff from the operation of the Act of 1828, and made the sheriff to perform the duties of sheriff of a county without requiring that he should take the declaration upon the acceptance of office. Parliament gave to the sheriff of a county a period of six months for the purpose of making the declaration. Mr. Salomons, therefore, did perform the duties of sheriff. Having performed those duties in a manner which entitled him to the respect and confidence of his fellow citizens, he was subsequently elected to the office of alderman; and then this impediment arising out of the Statute took effect, and he who had served the office of sheriff, and had entitled himself to general respect and confidence, was precluded from holding the office of alderman, because he was required to make this declaration previously to or upon the acceptance of office. I submit to the House that the statement of that fact alone is almost sufficient to justify the interposition of Parliament. But I must refer, in order to remove any doubt upon the subject, to the history of this declaration. In the year 1828, the noble Lord brought in a Bill for the Repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts, and having failed, at the outset, in resisting the measure, I lent him my co-operation in carrying the Bill through the House. I suggested a form of declaration to be inserted in the Bill, and to be substituted for the Sacramental Test, and that form of declaration which I suggested and which the noble Lord adopted was this:—

"Every person elected to the office of mayor, alderman, or any office of magistracy or trust in any municipal corporation, is required within one calendar month next before his admission to make and subscribe the following declaration:—'I, A. B., do solemnly declare that I will never exercise any power, authority, or influence which I may possess by virtue of the office —— to injure or weaken the Protestant Church, as it is by law established within this realm, or to disturb it in the possession of any rights or privileges to which it is by law entitled."

That was the declaration which I suggested, and which the noble Lord saw no difficulty in inserting, and so the Bill went to the House of Lords. The declaration was required to be made within one month before admission to office, but then it was a declaration to which the Jew would not have objected. In the House of Lords, words were inserted which constitute the whole impediment in the way of the admission of the Jew. In lieu of a simple declaration, the words were: "I, A.B., do solemnly and sincerely, in the presence of God, profess, testify, and declare, on the true faith of a Christian." The insertion of those words "on the true faith of a Christian," constitute the impediment to the acceptance of office by the Jew. The House of Lords, the authority which inserted these words, now sends us down a Bill which removes the difficulty, and permits the acceptance of office by the Jew. I submit to the House, that we who had not insisted on the insertion of those words can hardly reject the proposition now voluntarily made by the House of Lords, that the words which constitute the difficulty should be omitted. No one objected in the House of Commons to the declaration as originally proposed by me, on account of its permitting the Jew to accept office. The noble Lord thought it unwise to reject the Bill on account of the insertion of those words; but I very much doubt whether the words were inserted with a view to disqualify the Jew. The House of Lords now make the proposal to us to restore the Bill to the state in which it was originally sent from the House of Commons; and I do hope that the House of Commons will receive the proposition which has been made. Observe what was the effect of the Act of 1828. It clearly was intended to relieve the Dissenters from the Church of England. It repealed the Test and Corporation Acts, partly because it was thought a sacramental test was a bad test—that there was a tendency to degrade a most important religious ceremony, and partly because it went to exclude Dissenters. Parliament, therefore, passed an Act, the manifest object and intention of which was to relieve the Dissenter from the disability under which he previously laboured; but, as far as the Jew is concerned, unless we alter the law, he will be in a worse state than he would have been in if the Test and Corporation Acts had not been repealed. Before that time there was nothing to disqualify a Jew from serving in a municipal office, because the sacramental and other tests were to be taken subsequent to the acceptance of office, and an annual Indemnity Act was passed; whereas the impediment to the admission of the Jew now arises solely from the obligation to take the new declaration previously to or upon the acceptance of office. We have taken the same course as to other classes of our fellow subjects who dissent from the Church. The Moravians, Separatists, and Quakers, could not reconcile it to their conscientious convictions to make the declaration, and they have been admitted to municipal offices without subscribing the declaration. The Bill proposes to take the same course with respect to the Jew, and enable him to make the same declaration in substance, only relieving him from the necessity of declaring that he makes it on the true faith of a Christian. You will have from him the same security you have from others, that he will not exercise any privilege that he may possess to the detriment of the Church of England. Under these circumstances, I submit, it is but just and reasonable to pass this Bill. I am aware that it is a measure of a limited character; at the same time it is one which will be acceptable to the feelings of a very large portion of the Jews themselves. I think I have proved that sufficiently, by the petition which I have presented in the course of this evening, signed by a considerable body of the most respectable members of the Jewish persuasion, who are willing to accept this measure, not as entirely satisfactory, but as gratifying to their feelings. I have great gratification in proposing that which is acceptable to the feelings of a large and powerful body, the members of which are entitled to our respect. I need only mention the names of Rothschild, Salomons, and Montefiore, to induce the House to look favourably at a measure which they, as the representatives of a great body of the Jews, say will be acceptable. When I consider what is the benevolence of that people—that it is not restricted by any sectarian views—when I look at the patronage they give—when I look at the rewards and distinctions they have received when they have entered into the honourable career of academical competition—when I see the prizes gained at the University of London by members of the Jewish persuasion, I must say it is a matter of personal gratification to me to propose a measure which shall give to them unrestricted admission to municipal offices, and shall, at the same time, be acceptable to the feelings of so great and powerful a portion of my fellow countrymen. I therefore move "That this Bill be now read a second time."

Sir R. Inglis said, that the speech of his right hon. Friend—able and clear as all his speeches were—was not more conclusive to his mind than similar arguments addressed from the opposite side of the House; and if he were unconvinced by the arguments and eloquence of his noble Friend the Member for the city of London, his right hon. Friend the Member for the city of Edinburgh, and by him whom all would admit to be most worthily ranked with them in any competition of talent in the House—viz., his late lamented Friend Sir Robert Grant, to whom the advocacy of this measure was first entrusted, he hoped his right hon. Friend at the head of the Government would not consider it disrespectful if he owned that he was not convinced by the address which he had just heard. In the first place, his right hon. Friend had fallen into a great historical and legal error in leading the House to believe, as it was his object to do, that the disabilities of which the Jews complained, and of which it was the purpose of the present Bill, in a certain degree, to relieve them, were created by the Act of 1828, and by the declaration, as modified in the House of Lords, inserted in that Act. He apprehended that nothing was more clear than that at no period in the history of England, up to the year 1828, was any Jew ever admitted to any municipal office whatever in any city or borough in England. The reason was this:—In no instance could any individual be admitted except upon oath; and the oath was always administered upon some Christian symbol, such as the Cross, or on the Book of the Gospel, or on some relic which was holy and revered in the sight of a Christian; but conveyed no sanctity to the mind of a Jew. He therefore held that it was not correct, legally or historically, to allege, that that disability was created against the Jew by the Act to relieve any other member of the community dissenting from the Church of England. His right hon. Friend then proceeded to state that the law was uncertain. He could understand that when a decision upon privilege or any other point had proceeded from the Court of Queen's Bench, any gentleman was at liberty to argue that the law was uncertain, because the extreme resources of the law had not been finally exhausted by an appeal to a higher court; but he defied the Attorney General to say that the law was at this moment uncertain, when you had the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench on one side, and that decision reversed by a writ of error. From the right hon. Baronet's statement of the way in which the declaration had been drawn up, and thrown over the Table, any one would conclude that the alteration made by the House of Lords in introducing the words, the "true faith of a Christian," was made almost per saltum, and without consideration, and not advisedly and with special reference to a particular purpose. His impression was directly the reverse. Whether the House of Lords did right or wrong, they advisedly made the alteration for the very purpose to which it had been applied—viz., to exclude Her Majesty's Jewish subjects from municipal offices: the law up to 1828 not having permitted Jews to hold municipal offices. The phrase, "Jewish subjects of Her Majesty," reminded him of the singular expansion which this Bill had gradually attained. When it was first introduced by Sir R. Grant in 1830, it was a Bill "to relieve British-born subjects of His Majesty;" it was afterwards changed to "subjects of His Majesty professing the Jewish religion;" but now the terms of the Bill were extended, not to Sir Moses Montefiore or Mr. Salomons, and other gentlemen, whose petition had been presented to-night, but to every portion of the professors of the Jewish religion. The Bill was, in fact, a measure for naturalizing a whole nation. Let the House pass it, and there would be nothing in the law to prevent any German Jew from arriving at any dignity in the city of London without taking any oath whatever, either of loyalty to the Queen, or giving any security that he would be a good subject in all the relations of life. He did not think there was anything in the circumstances of the Jews to entitle them to the special exemption in their favour which was proposed by the present Bill. He would not refuse to any man what was his right, and what was due to him, however weak; but he was not disposed to make concessions in favour of any, however high and powerful, when those concessions might be opposed to duty; and in the present case they should take care that they were not hazarding, in favour of such persons, those high considerations on which the integrity of the Christian constitution hitherto depended. Up to the last sixteen years no person would have thought of making such concessions. The Jews could never be spoken of as a merely religious sect; in every sense of the word they were a nation; it was as a nation they stood out as a miraculous spectacle to the world; and if they were relieved they would be relieved as a nation. They could not put forward any claim of right either under the Common or under the Statute law; they came to England for their own purposes, and it was their duty to conform to the law of the country into which they introduced themselves. Dr. Arnold drew a strong distinction between the Christian, and him who was not a Christian; in fact between the Christian and the Jew. He said, "The Jews are strangers in England; and they have no more claim to legislate for us than a lodger has to interfere in the concerns of his landlord. They are voluntary strangers here, and have no right to legislate, unless they acquiesce in our moral law, which is the Gospel." Such was the view taken by Dr. Arnold of this subject, from whom, indeed, he differed in his views of church government; but with whom the majority of the supporters of the present measure as certainly agreed. He did not think that for the sake of a handful of men they should declare that they no longer regarded Christianity as an element in the administration of the affairs of England. He believed that for the sake of those Jews they were going to destroy that identification of the institutions of England with Christianity which heretofore subsisted, and which constituted her glory, and, he might say, her defence. His right hon. Friend stated that in Southampton, Birmingham, and other towns, Jews had been admitted to municipal offices. If, in point of fact, such appointments were contrary to the existing law; he thought it was a bad recommendation to the present Bill to state that the Jews having successfully violated the law, we should give them perfect indemnity for the past, and impunity for the future. It was said that in other countries Jews were admitted to all civil rights—that it was so in France, America, Holland, and Belgium. Now, upon inquiry, he found that Jews in those countries were admissible, but they were not admitted. In France a Jew might be a deputy, a member of the Administration, or a judge; but the fact was, that there was no instance of a Jew ever having held either office. Even if it were otherwise, not one of the offices in the countries he referred to, was of the same importance, for instance, as that of the Lord Mayor of the city of London. It was quite clear that the object of this Bill was to allow Mr. Salomons and Sir M. Montefiore to hold the office of Lord Mayor. But even if the precedents of other countries were analogous with respect to the offices to be filled, they were not analogous as to the circumstances and character of the persons who were called on to fill such offices. Those persons were in many cases under despotic Governments, and were deemed eligible because they exhibited a disposition which his right hon. Friend, he was sure, would be the last to encourage. In some instances where the Jews had been admitted to civil rights, they had pursued a line of conduct which could not be acceptable to a Christian people. He referred to the case where Governor Hammond, of Charleston, had felt it necessary to call upon the people to exhibit public gratitude to the Almighty. He did so in a proclamation, in which he recommended the people to meet in their houses of worship and offer up thanksgiving to the Divine Saviour of the world. He believed no hon. Gentleman in that House would object to such a proclamation; but the Jews of Charleston thought proper to do so. They assembled at a public meeting, at which Michael Lazarus was in the chair, and denounced the proclamation. They said that the laws of all nations ought to be administered without discrimination or preference. Governor Hammond properly and truly replied, that he issued the proclamation upon the broad grounds that he was administering the laws of a Christian community; and he asked triumphantly, why did their laws prohibit labour on the Sabbath? He mentioned this circumstance to show that the Jews would not be satisfied with admission to municipal offices. They would push their views much farther. If placed in a situation to do so with effect, they might complain of our laws for the observance of the Lord's Day. With respect to the present Bill, he conceived it to be morally impossible that Jews could exercise the judicial functions to the performance of which it would render them eligible, even to their own satisfaction. Suppose the Bill were passed, and that many Jews were elected to municipal office, and eventually were preferred to the heads of corporations, would there be no danger in respect of Sunday trading? Or, suppose a man brought before a Jew magistrate for blaspheming the name of the Holy Redeemer, how could a Jew consistently administer the law against one whom he was bound to consider so far a co-religionist? He objected to this measure, especially, because it was undoubtedly intended to introduce a much larger measure at a future period; for to be consistent, the Legislature, if it passed this Bill, ought to go much further, and admit persons of all denominations whatever. Admitting the benevolence of the Jews in this country as a body, and admitting that their charity was not confined to their own people, still he could not allow his admiration for those qualities to induce him to do that which he believed would be injurious to the welfare of the kingdom, and incompatible with our duties as a Christian people. He would never consent to introduce into our Constitution an element which would render the working of a Christian Constitution impossible. Believing that the law of the land was a Christian law, intended to be administered by Christian men, he could not consent to the measure, much less to any ulterior measure, for bringing the Jews, not only into the seat of justice where the law was adminstered, but for giving them the power of making the law. He, therefore, moved that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

Mr. Plumptre seconded the Amendment. If the Members of that House were not Christian men, it signified little with whom they were associated in their legislation; but if they professed to be Christians, it behoved them to avoid the admission of any principle which was opposed to the interests of Christianity. He was persuaded that this measure would not be approved of by the great mass of the people of this country, and he regretted to find that not only in this measure, but also in others which had been passed in the course of this Session, the Government had proposed, and the House sanctioned, a course which was inconsistent with the honour and glory of God, and opposed to the true principles of religion. Any man who had a sense, or at least a lively sense, of what we all owe the Divine Author of Christianity, would be cautious how he gave his support to any measure not in strict accordance with its dictates; and he feared that if the House countenanced this proposition, they would be forfeiting the favour of Almighty God. If we incurred that fatal penalty, where would be the strength, the security, or the lasting prosperity of this nation? The House was now called upon to take a step which in his conscience he believed would provoke the Divine displeasure; and if they acceded to it, they would be deserting the duty which it became them as reasonable men, but much more as Christian men, to discharge. The right hon. the Home Secretary had said, that theological discussions ought not to be introduced in a political assembly; but he could not admit that when theological subjects were brought before the House in its legislative capacity, they ought to be discussed on any but their proper grounds; and he was sure that if the House attempted to discuss them upon any other grounds, they would not decide them properly, satisfactorily, or conclusively to the minds of the Christian people of this country. He had not made these remarks out of any invidious feeling to the Members of the Jewish persuasion. He knew that many of them were highly estimable. The individual who filled the office of sheriff in his own county was a Jew, and he could testify that he was a gentleman most respectable in all the relations of life. He was, therefore, actuated by no feeling of hostility to the Jewish people; but feeling strongly that this measure was calculated to lead to the pernicious consequences which he had endeavoured, though very inadequately, to depict, he felt bound to second the Amendment.

Lord John Russell: Sir, the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down has put the question before the House on grounds which I find it impossible to avoid noticing. The hon. Member informs us that it is his opinion that it is inconsistent with our duties as Christians to assent to the second reading of the Bill before us, and thereby incur the displeasure of the Most High. Those are, no doubt, his sincere sentiments; but if the hon. Gentleman considers the subject a little, he will see that he ought not to be satisfied with the rejection of this Bill alone. The right hon. Gentleman who moved the second reading of the Bill showed that various offices were filled in this country by Jews—that Jews hold the office of magistrate—an office which I consider of very great importance, as partaking of the administration of justice, and approaching thereby to the sovereign power. That office is held by Jews; and the hon. Gentleman himself referred to an instance in his own county of a Jew having been high sheriff. If the hon. Gentleman thinks that, by pemitting that, we incur the displeasure of the Most High, and that we are acting inconsistently with our duty as Christians, he should not have suffered years to elapse, during which these things have been in existence, but should have proposed a Bill by which Jews should have been excluded from these offices. If his principle be at all a correct one, that should have been the conduct of the hon. Gentleman. But I am afraid that, even if the hon. Gentleman had introduced such a Bill and carried it, he would not have been satisfied with that. In fact, the principle upon which he proceeds is this —that political power should be confined to those who hold the same opinions as are held by the majority of the two Houses of Parliament. The hon. Gentleman himself, as regards measures passed during the present Session, measures not in favour of the Jews, not in favour of those who deny the divine authority of Christ, but in favour of other Christians who differ from the Church of England, clearly showed that, in his opinion, all political power should be narrowed and confined to the members of the Church of England. In so doing, he has taken the narrowest ground of intolerance—a ground to which I never can assent: and, therefore, in recording my vote for this Bill, I do so upon a principle directly the opposite of that of the hon. Gentleman. And when he tells me that, by assenting to measures of this kind, we incur the Divine displeasure, I really cannot deny that such is his conscientious opinion, but can only oppose to him my own conviction—as deep as is his —that by communicating all the privileges and powers of the Constitution to other subjects of Her Majesty than our Christian selves, by communicating these rights and privileges as widely as possible, by extending the charity and doing away with the rancours and animosities of religious sects, as far as lies in our power, we thereby do something to bring down upon this House, upon this country and its Legislature, the blessings of the Most High. The hon. Gentleman's conviction is, I have no doubt, a sincere one; but I likewise claim to myself the right, as a Member of this House, to a thorough conviction, on the other side, as to what our religious duties should be. I do not deny that we should invoke the blessing of Almighty God upon all our proceedings, and that, in all our proceedings, we should endeavour to conform ourselves to that which we have reason to believe is in accordance with his will My hon. Friend the Member for Oxford (Sir R. H. Inglis) has again stated his objections to this Bill. In stating them, he attempted to meet the case made by the right hon. Baronet opposite; but I do not think that he has in any degree weakened the case which the right hon. Baronet made. My hon. Friend stated that it was the intention of the House of Lords, in 1828, to insert certain words into the Bill for the removal of the Test and Corporation Act; and that it was the intention of the House of Lords, in inserting those words, to exclude Jews. But to that the answer, by anticipation, of his right hon. Friend was quite conclusive. The House of Lords themselves propose to do away with that exclusion. They themselves are now of the opinion that no such exclusion should exist. Therefore, it matters not what was their opinion in 1828, when we have, in 1845, the solemn decision of the House of Lords that Jews may be admitted to these offices. My hon. Friend stated that we should not, merely out of respect for the Jews, on account of acts of benevolence and charity done by them, act in a manner contrary to the welfare of the nation, and inconsistent with our duty as Christians. I quite admit that; but think, with respect to the privileges proposed to be granted by this Bill, and all other privileges and powers, that the Jews have a right to claim them. When they are born in this country, and perform all the duties of subjects of the Queen, and as loyal as any other class of Her Majesty's subjects—when they contribute to the wealth of the country—when they are neither disaffected nor in any way disobedient to the laws—when, on the contrary, as is admitted by the statement of my hon. Friend, they are liberal and charitable beyond most classes of Christians, in their contributions for the relief of the needy and the indigent who are not of their own persuasion—I say, when such is the case, they have a right to claim all the privileges of their fellow subjects at our hands, and it is an injustice in us to withhold them. My hon. Friend says that the Bill is so drawn that aliens might enjoy the privileges which it designs to confer. But as to aliens, the matter is left, and properly left, to the general law of the country. This Bill will give no more right to a German Jew than to a German Christian, and the law of the country, which excludes these Jews from offices of trust and profit, will be equally cogent and efficacious after the passing of this Bill. But Jews, the subjects of Her Majesty, may fairly claim the rights and privileges of British subjects. The hon. Baronet the Member for Oxford, says, that the Jews are a nation, and that they value themselves upon being a nation. But, at the same time, whether they are a nation or not, do they not perform all their duties as individuals in this country? and, if so, it matters not whether they are or are not called a nation, or whether they are so or not, so long as they are found living under obedience to the laws. What had it to do with this matter whether the gentleman who held the office of high sheriff of Kent called the people to whom he belonged a nation, a sect, or a persuasion? Do they not constitute a part of the wealth and of the power of this country, as much as do the people of Wales or of Scotland? And suppose that any one of these Jews came under the provisions of any of the laws, suppose that he was subjected to any civil action or criminal indictment, it would not benefit him to say that he was not one of the English nation; and as he would fall, like others in such circumstances, under the penalties of the law, you should, therefore, extend to him their privileges and their benefits. On this occasion, as happened, if I recollect rightly, before, my hon. Friend reminds me of a comparison, somewhat relevant, which Dugald Stewart makes of the University which my hon. Friend has the honour to represent, to a ship or barge moored in the stream, and which serves to measure the rapidity of the current. Dugald Stewart said that the University of Oxford, not making any great progress in science and knowledge, as science and knowledge progressed, reminded him of a ship, which being moored in the stream, one could always measure by it the rapidity of the current. So am I happy to find that, not unfrequently, while my hon. Friend remains moored in the stream, we belong rather to the current, and are passing rapidly by him as he remains fixed in his position. I believe that when this question was last discussed it had not the same chance of passing into a law as it now has. It was finally defeated by a majority of the other House of Parliament; and my hon. Friend had then an assistance in his opposition, which I am glad to think he is not likely in the present instance to obtain. Knowledge upon this subject has since greatly increased, and it is now fast outstripping my hon. Friend in its course. I am glad of this, because there was a great admission made during the time when the Bill to which I have referred was under discussion in Parliament. The Bishop of London is reported to have said on that occasion, in the other House, that he did not object to the Bill, because it led to the admission of Jews to offices of trust in the State, and to seats in Parliament. He objected to it because it took away from the Constitution of this country its distinctive character of Christianity. Of a similar kind were the objections made to the Bill in this House. The right hon. Gentleman who favoured us the other night with a most able speech on another subject, but whom I do not now see in his place assisting my hon. Friend—I mean the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newark (Mr. Gladstone)—made this statement:—

"If it was possible to draw a broad line of principle between a Bill to admit Jews to municipal offices, and one to permit them to hold other offices, including seats in Parliament, the subject would be different from that which they had now to discuss: but he was satisfied that such a line could not be drawn; and the advocates of this measure must, to be consistent, follow it up with another, throwing open to Jews seats in Parliament, and all other offices which might be held by Christians. . . . . His reason for opposing the Bill was this—that the profession of the Jews was of itself in the nature of a disqualification for legislative office in a country where Christianity was interwoven with the institutions of the State."

Such was the statement of the right hon. Gentleman. I know how well qualified he is to maintain his opinion, and I conclude, from his absence to-day, that he no longer maintains that opinion; and I am happy to conclude that he is of opinion that the admission of Jews to municipal offices will lead to their admission to offices of trust in the State, and to seats in Parliament. He was not the only Gentleman who held that opinion. The right hon. Gentleman—a far greater authority, as holding high office in Her Majesty's Councils—I mean the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer—made the same objection. In answering my right hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Macaulay), he said, that—

"The right hon. Gentleman complained that this particular measure was opposed, as if it involved the admission of Jews to all privileges whatever. But did the right hon. Gentleman really mean to deny that this measure was not viewed as a stepping stone to ulterior objects? Did the right hon. Gentleman expect that any Member of the House who had witnessed antecedent proceedings would be so credulous as to suppose that those who urged the present measure aimed at nothing beyond throwing open corporate privileges?"

So spoke the right hon. Gentleman in 1841. Now, Sir, I am not one of those who are so credulous as to suppose that the Jews will not aim at greater privileges than those contemplated to be conferred upon them by this Bill. I myself, some time ago, presented a petition, in which many Jews, belonging to London, and to other places in this country, stated very frankly, that, while they would be glad to have this measure passed, they did not abate one jot of their claim to higher and greater privileges. Why, Sir, I agree with them—I agree with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newark, and with the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that the only principle upon which I can agree to this Bill is, that it will lead to the admission of Jews to higher privileges. I did not conceal, in 1841, that if they came and asked for these privileges, I should be ready to grant them. Although there may be times when religious questions may interfere with the performance of duties of this kind, yet, in the great majority of instances, I should be perfectly ready to trust a Jew, having a firm confidence in his own belief, with all the functions which, as holding a political office, he would have to discharge. His religious belief would not, in my opinion, in the slightest degree interfere with the faithful and sufficient discharge of his political functions. My hon. Friend (Sir R. H. Inglis) maintains the opposite doctrine, and brings rather a singular authority—not singular for me, or for any other Gentleman on this side of the House to quote; but certainly so, as quoted by my hon. Friend—I mean the late Dr. Arnold. Every one knows that Dr. Arnold entertained the opinion, which I think was a benevolent but a visionary theory, that, by uniting in one the religious and political communities, you could have a State with a large comprehension of religious differences, which would be animated by one general religious belief, and one religious hope. But for this purpose he proposed that all Christians, Roman Catholics and Dissenters of every kind, should be admited into his notion of the community, political and religious, which he proposed should supersede our present imperfect institutions. Is that the notion of my hon. Friend? I can conceive a person, who has so large and comprehensive a scheme as that, holding that it would not suit with that scheme to admit Jews into it. I can conceive the author of such a scheme thinking that he could establish no sympathy between Jews and Christians, and that, as a religious man, he must hold himself separate from the Jews, whom he could not admit into his republic. But my hon. Friend holds no such enlarged or comprehensive opinions. He is not willing to extend the bounds of the political community. He has, therefore, no right to this exclusion. He has no right to say that he would forbid Christians who differ from the Church of England to hold certain offices—the office of Lord Chancellor, for instance—and, at the same time, coolly take the benefit of Dr. Arnold's opinions as to the Jews. Either let him take the whole of Dr. Arnold's theory, which I conceive an unsubstantial theory, or let him not quote Dr. Arnold. I am sure that nothing could be more repugnant to Dr. Arnold's opinions than to have these opinions quoted solely in behalf of the exclusion of the Jews, while, at the same time, all that is liberal and comprehensive in these opinions is either withheld or unacknowledged. For these reasons I shall give my hearty assent to the present Bill. I do not even find fault with it on the score that it is not so comprehensive as I could wish it to be. It is in strict conformity with the privileges already granted to the Jews, and I hail it as a step to further measures, thinking it will tend to extend the charitable feeling by which the members of this community should become united together; and I not only heartily give my vote to this measure, but promise it to that further measure which the Chancellor of the Exchequer expects, by which Jews will be admitted to all the offices in the State.

Mr. Trelawny said, that he must appeal to the patience of the House, under the circumstances in which he was placed, although there was evidently a desire to divide as soon as possible. He had put a Notice of Motion on the Books last year on the subject before the House, and had then given way in deference to a wish of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, who desired the discussion, on that occasion, of another measure. He would at different times have travelled a thousand miles to support the claims of the Jews, and this was his claim to be heard. He considered this Bill as an instalment; as such it should be received, and he would not throw impediments in the way of reforms, by sneering at the inconsistency of those who, for the first time, gave them support. It was said Jews were a nation sui generis, that their habitual feeling incapacitated them from taking such an interest in the welfare and happiness of countries in which they lived, as could be alone said to confer a good title to a full participation of political rights. This the Jews deny. They refer to the Report of the Sanhedrim called by Napoleon in 1806, a Sanhedrim which consisted of eighty of the most intelligent Jews of France and Italy, of whom it was required that they should state what were the principles of the Hebrew religion in relation to social and political affairs. They stated that it was the duty of Jews to love and regard as their brethren and co-religionists all who afforded them, not merely the advantages of civil society, but even hospitality and protection. It might be said, however, that Jews did not deserve belief when laying claim to the highest privileges attainable by human beings. This was most unfair and unworthy of Christian charity, when it was recollected that nothing but a few words namely—"on the true faith of a Christian"—excluded Jews from that House. He would ask whether conscientious scruples were so cheap, that the House could afford to despise them? Those who maintained the doctrine that promises were literally binding, and thereby denied themselves great advantages accessible to others, were especially worthy of credit. Why not then be content with a promise from Jews on taking office, that they would never, in the exercise of their duties, come to any decision at variance with the interests of the community at large? The House might as well trust them, making that promise, as trust them as it now does, that they will not get within its walls by using the necessary form of oath for admission, whilst they remain, in fact, in their secret souls Jews. The hon. Baronet (Sir R. Inglis) had said Christianity was part of the common law of the land. Now, he would ask, what was Christianity? Was a belief in the Trinity essential to the idea? Then, if so, Socinians were not Christians, and they ought to be excluded from all offices which they may now hold, but which are not accessible to Jews. The opinions of Dr. Arnold had been mentioned. His principle was embodied in the dictum, "comprehension without compromise." But all the arguments by which he advocated the inclusion of all Christians within the pale of the law, would go equally to the inclusion of all religionists whatever. The Jews had been shamefully treated. In times past it had been criminal to suckle or nurse a Jew's child. Proclamations had been offered by Sovereigns of this country, conferring treacherous favour on this persecuted sect, that it might be pampered for future extortion. One Jew was compelled to give up his gold by suffering the loss of a tooth daily till he discovered where he kept it. They had been called usurers. What wonder that they sought the acquisition of gold, when they couldn't hold land by law, and were daily liable to expatriation? Then it was said it would be impious to emancipate Jews, because the will of the Deity was expressed in Scripture that they should never hold offices in the countries in which they lived. He would ask which was most impious, to affirm that something prophesied had not come to pass, or to attempt to bring about an effect apparently contrary to prophecy? The latter might result from mere misconception of language. The former deliberately affirmed that what was prophesied had not come to pass. For he could prove that in some instances Jews had held all offices in the State as well as other citizens. Then the hon. Baronet (Sir R. Inglis) maintained that if Jews were admitted, Hindoos, Parsees, and so forth, might claim admission. Well, if any large number of the people turned Mahomedans (not a very probable hypothesis), it would be but right they should be represented. The electors ought to decide on the qualifications of a candidate. Nor let it be said that his choice was already restricted by the requisition of an income of 300*l.* a year. That was not their question. The question was, ought a man (being a Jew) to be rejected if he had 300*l.* a year? Considering, then, that there were no good reasons for depriving Jews of the benefit of the general principle, that religious opinions ought to be no bar to office, considering their high intelligence and great general integrity as citizens, he thought the time was come when their disabilities should be withdrawn, and when they should be placed in as favourable a position as regards civil rights as persons of other persuasions.

Mr. Monckton Milnes said he should support the measure, and regretted that any prejudice against admitting the Jews to civil privileges should exist. He had lately witnessed in the Government of Prussia a most dangerous and immoral effect, arising from the encouragement given to those prejudices against the Jewish nation. He had there seen, in the midst of a highly civilized community, an animosity against this race hardly surpassed in the United States by that existing between the black and white races. He was sure this measure, and every other the House could pass of a similar tendency, would be productive of useful and beneficial effects, not only to the Jews of this country, but to those of every other nation where they were at present so cruelly persecuted. He was sure that the disabilities to which the Jews were subjected were injurious to those who imposed them; while the pride thus fostered, and the principles encouraged, were totally opposite to the spirit of Christian charity. He was convinced that civil rights and privileges should be extended as far as was consistent with the safety and security of the Christian religion. He congratulated the Jews on their present position. On a former occasion only two Members supported a similar attempt to remove their disabilities, and he himself was then held up to obloquy for so doing. He was gratified to find that in supporting their claims now, he was only going with the stream. He did not question the motives which induced hon. Members who formerly opposed the claims of the Jews now to support them; but he should look with great curiosity at their names in the division.

An hon. Member, whose name we could not ascertain, briefly supported the Bill.

The House divided on the Question, that the word "now" stand part of the Question:—Ayes 91; Noes 11: Majority 80.

Bill read a second time.

POOR LAW (SCOTLAND).] The Lord Advocate having moved the Order of the Day for a Committee of the whole House on the Poor Law Amendment (Scotland) Bill,

Mr. Lockhart said, the Bill as it now stood was in many important particulars different from the original measure, and he thought it was only fair that the people of Scotland should have an opportunity of considering it in its amended form; but he should not persist in his Motion for its postponement.

House in Committee.

On Clause 73, providing for the removal of Irish paupers,

Sir J. Graham, in reply to the observations of the hon. Member for Lanark, said, that when the Bill was first introduced, it was intimated by the Government that it was impossible to make such a measure perfect in the first instance, and that Amendments would necessarily be introduced in Committee, founded on the information and the arguments advanced by those who were locally acquainted with the country. For the change introduced in this particular clause he was himself responsible, as, upon mature consideration, he did not think the clause, as originally brought in, was sufficient.

Mr. P. M. Stewart said, all that had transpired in regard to this Bill showed the propriety of postponing this measure till a future Session. He had exhausted all fair means to effect the object, and he trusted that he should resort to none that were unfair. He must say that the Scottish Members had not been fairly treated in regard to these alterations, which had been introduced by the Government without any intimation whatever.

Sir J. Graham observed, that whatever might be the law of settlement in England, and whatever might be its defects, he admitted that Scotchmen and Irishmen were entitled to the full benefit of it on a perfect equality with Englishmen.

Sir G. Clerk contended, that as to settlement no difference should be made between the natives of Scotland, England, and Ireland. He cordially supported the clause, and denied that there was any general feeling against the Bill in Scotland; on the contrary its principle was approved of, and the petitions against it principally referred to matters of detail.

Mr. Duncan approved of the provision of the clause, requiring a five years' industrial residence to obtain a settlement. He contended that its application was universal.

Mr. Darby thought that Englishmen, Scotchmen, and Irishmen, should be put on the same footing respectively in the three countries. He approved of the clause as effecting this object.

Mr. P. M. Stewart objected to the hurried mode in which alterations had been introduced into the clause. He approved of the provision requiring five years' industrial residence.

Sir W. Somerville hoped that the poor Scotch in Ireland would be treated as the clause proposed to treat the poor Irish in Scotland.

Clause agreed to with verbal Amendments.

Remaining clauses agreed to.

House resumed.

Report to be received.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE.] On the Motion of Sir J. Graham, the Bills of Exchange Bill was read a Third Time.

Mr. M. Gibson moved to add the following proviso to the 1st Clause :—

"That the Proviso in the recited Act, that nothing therein contained shall extend to the loan or forbearance of any Money upon security of any lands, tenements, or hereditaments, or any estate therein, shall not be continued by this Act."

The House would observe that this Bill was for the continuance of an Act which passed in 1839, abolishing the usury laws, as to Bills of Exchange, and loans above the value of 10*l*. The former and present Bills contained each a proviso exempting from their operation "lands, tenements, and hereditament." Money could not be raised on these, except at 5 per cent. Now, his proviso was for the purpose of abolishing this exemption. His object was to give a more free scope to the system of legislation which had now continued for several years. He believed they were indebted to the hon. Member for Kendal, for the first inroad on the usury laws. A period of twenty-two years had elapsed since that attempt was made, and he thought the most timid and apprehensive person could not object to see the principle carried further. Indeed, it was most difficult to understand why one portion of the community should be at liberty to make their own money bargains, and another deprived of any such power. He could perfectly understand that one rate of interest should be fixed by law for the whole community; but could not understand that some should be allowed to raise money on personal security, at any rate of interest they thought fit, and that others should not be able to do so on their title-deeds or other landed security. He believed this restriction was extremely injurious to the landed interest; and that was not his opinion solely, but that of the Committee, composed of most able men, who sat on the subject of our usury laws, in 1818. Their First Resolution was :—

"That it is the opinion of this Committee, that the laws regulating or restraining the rate of interest have been extensively evaded, and have failed of the effect of imposing a maximum upon such rate; and that of late years, from the constant excess of the market rate of interest above the rate limited by law, they have added to the expense incurred by the borrowers on real security, and that such borrowers have been compelled to resort to the mode of granting annuities on lives, a mode which has been made a cover for obtaining higher interest than the rate limited by law, and has further subjected the borrowers to enormous charges, or forced them to make very disadvantageous sales of their estates."

The Third Resolution was :—

"That it is the opinion of this Committee that the present period, when the market rate of interest is below the legal rate, affords an opportunity peculiarly proper for the repeal of the said laws."

Now, the present moment was just such as the Committee referred to, when there were advertisements every day offering money at 3½ and 4 per cent. on good landed security, their law was inoperative. But it might happen that the market rate would rise above the legal; and should that be the case, the landholder could not raise money at 5 per cent., but must have recourse to annuities, or to the sale of his estate at a great sacrifice. It was well known that in building transactions, men were now greatly jeopardized by the uncertainty attending the usury laws. Amongst the witnesses examined before the Committee to which he referred, were Sir S. Romilly, and Sir E. Sugden. The testimony of the former was—

"Has your experience enabled you to form an opinion as to the operation of the usury laws upon the landed interest?"—As far as my experience goes, I should say, that the laws against usury are very injurious to the landed interest. The effect of them, I think, is, that when the proprietors of estates are under the necessity of raising money at times when money is extremely scarce, they are obliged to raise it by the granting of annuities or in other modes extremely disadvantageous to themselves."

Sir E. Sugden, the ablest real property lawyer of this country, was also examined. He was asked—

"Have the usury laws been beneficial, or otherwise, to the landed proprietor?—They have been decidedly inimical to the interest of the landed proprietor. Every landed proprietor will have money when he wants it, and there are always two rates of interest; one the market rate, the other the legal rate. If the market rate rises above the legal rate, the landed proprietor must necessarily resort to some shift to evade the usury laws; this is done under the colour of granting life annuities. In all such dealings, the transaction is, in truth, a loan; the party advancing the money always fixes upon a rate per cent. at which he is willing to lend the money, to which he adds the costs of the insurance. The higher the terms are, the more the transaction assumes the shape of a loan, because the very exorbitancy of the terms renders it an act of duty on the part of the borrower towards himself to repurchase the annuity as soon as he possibly can; for in all these cases, without any exception, a power to repurchase is inserted in the grant of the annuity. And, in speaking of such transactions, I have invariably observed, that the parties treat them as loans, and not as a purchase out and out of an annuity.

"Are you aware of any inconvenience that would result from the repeal of those laws?—I have latterly turned that over frequently in my mind, and I entertain a confident opinion that the repeal of those laws would not in any manner prejudice the landed interest."

The fact was, these laws were the last remnant of a barbarous system of legislation, and should not in any way be countenanced by the Legislature, after the experience we had had of the working of a contrary principle.

Clause brought up and read a first time.

On the Question, that the clause be read a Second Time.

Mr. W. Williams said, that if the Bill were allowed to pass, he should support the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. M. Gibson). He (Mr. Williams) could see no reason why land should be excepted from the general rule in the transactions to which this measure referred. He considered, however, that the Bill ought not to pass for the period proposed. He considered five years far too long for its duration. He considered that its tendency would be to inflict a great evil upon the smaller class of shopkeepers and persons of the same rank in life. He did not say that the rate of interest should be restricted to five per cent., but he thought that some limits should be fixed. Wherever usury had prevailed, the most injurious consequences had ensued. In a great number of bankruptcies it would be found that the parties had failed in consequence of the exorbitant rates at which they borrowed capital. He knew himself one instance where a man, formerly in affluent circumstances, had become reduced to deep indigence. The cause of this was discovered to be the usurious terms at which he had borrowed money. He obtained a loan at as high a rate of interest as 60 per cent. He (Mr. Williams) could remember that at the period from 1839 to the beginning of 1841, as much as 15, 20, and 25 per cent. was paid upon advances of money for investment in trade. He could not assent to the argument that had been used by the hon. Member for Manchester, that money should be had as freely as possible. He (Mr. Williams) thought that while the precious metals did not form the only circulating medium, but forty-five to fifty millions in bank notes were in existence, it was highly inexpedient to leave the rate of interest without defined limits. He might refer to the whole current of ancient and modern history for confirmation of his assertion, that the sanction of usury had constantly injured nations. Besides, there were the denunciations of Scripture against the crime. ["Hear."] Hon. Members might disregard that as an authority; but if it were to have its proper weight, then the denunciations against the vice of usury should be attended to as dissuasives from the policy the hon. Gentleman recommended. The class of persons most liable to be injured by the abolition of the usury laws would be the most weak and needy class of the community; and those who would prey upon their necessities would be the most grasping and rapacious. It was to protect the former that he should consider it his duty, if the Bill were proposed to be passed for more than one year, to move that it pass that day three months.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer felt himself relieved from going deeply into the question by the great discrepancy between the position of the hon. Member for Manchester, and that of the hon. Member for Coventry (Mr. Williams). Seeing the lateness of the Session, he had abstained from raising a discussion upon a topic which he knew, if entered upon, would have had the effect of postponing the passing a measure which he believed had proved useful to the community. The Bill, in fact, was only a renewal of the Acts which had passed in 1837, 1839, 1840, 1841, 1843, and 1845. The hon.

Member for Manchester had complained that the effect of the clause he proposed to exclude, had been to prevent the extension of building speculations. He would refer to the rapid progress of building in the metropolis and its vicinity, to show how little this effect had followed. There was a good reason why they should not suddenly abrogate the provision. If they were to start de novo, no doubt the freedom of money would be beneficial to the landed interest; but circumstances had occurred which prevented the landed proprietors from acting upon the same terms with the lender as others who had borrowed money. The lender had frequently the power of compelling the landed borrower to pay money at a rate above the average value in the market. No doubt the landed proprietor might originally have made arrangements for his own protection; but it would be unfair to alter the existing system without giving time to the landed interest to make such arrangements as would relieve them from the chance of exaction. Without then deciding the question whether the distinction ought for ever to continue between money borrowed upon land and upon other security, he thought that the House would do well to continue the existing law for the limited period proposed by the present Bill. He did not think it necessary to enter into a discussion with the hon. Member for Coventry as to the benefit of the usury laws. That question had been already decided. He would only say that he believed many traders in this city had been saved from ruin by being able to borrow, at short periods, the sum necessary for preserving their credit.

Mr. Francis T. Baring collected, from what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that he was not unfavourable to the principle of the clause. He would suggest that if the Government, in a future Session, would consent to the appointment of a Committee to examine into the effect of the usury laws on the landed interest, and have an inquiry into their operation, it would be better to pass the Bill in its present shape without this clause. Such an inquiry, he had no doubt, would have the effect of convincing every man (he only wondered that a sensible man could have any difficulty as to the point) that they were, in point of fact, by being exempted under this Bill, suffering great inconvenience. With respect to the limitation of the period, the late Government, he must remind the right hon. Gentleman, had always proposed that the Bill should be permanent; it was the House of Lords which limited the term to one or two years. Not only were former Bills, as they had been introduced, permanent, but they were also general, not exempting the landed interest. In the present state of our legislation, the usury laws did not apply to Bills running for three months. What sense there was in freeing Bills for three months, and not also Bills for twelve months, he could not see. Nothing was more apparent, from the evidence before the Committee, than that a repeal of the usury laws would be beneficial. He regretted that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had thought it necessary to make his measure a mere continuation of the former Bill, for there had been trial enough of the principle, and the Bill might have been made a permanent one, without exhibiting that appearance of insecurity which a temporary measure presented. He hoped, at all events, that the right hon. Baronet would allow a Committee next year.

Sir R. Peel said, that when it had first been proposed to relax the usury laws, great opposition had been made by many parties connected with commerce. They had argued that the relaxation would subject them to the greatest inconvenience, and the greatest danger, inasmuch as it would enable persons to exact an interest of more than five per cent upon money. But experience had proved that the relaxation was of the greatest possible advantage to commerce, and that the prohibition to advance money upon good security for what that money was worth, really operated most injuriously on commerce. He did not believe that the present restriction respecting the advancement of money upon land, was for the benefit of the landed interest. But he was aware that great apprehension was entertained upon that subject; and he did not think it would be advisable, by any immediate and violent change, to create great and unnecessary alarm. He could, under these circumstances, see no objection to the appointment, during the next Session, of a Select Committee, which might by its labours throw new light upon the subject.

Mr. Warburton thought his hon. Friend might be perfectly satisfied with the result of the discussion, as he had obtained the admission that the trade in money ought to be as free as the trade in any other commodity. There had been ample experience of the good working of the Bill, both when there was a great pressure upon the money market, and when there was an abundance of money. He recommended his hon. Friend to take the Five Years' Bill, which was a further extension of the principle than had yet been obtained, and to bring in a Bill next year to do away with the usury laws as applicable to the landed interest.

Mr. Vernon Smith recommended his hon. Friend not to press his Motion to a division.

Motion negatived. Bill passed.

House adjourned at a quarter past one.

DISTURBANCES IN LEITRIM.] The Marquess of Clanricarde presented a petition from magistrates, resident gentry, and inhabitants of the county of Leitrim, setting forth the disturbed condition of the county, and praying for the adoption of measures for the protection of life and property. The petition suggested that the law which granted compensation to be levied on the county or barony, in case of malicious injury being done to a particular description of property, should be extended to all kinds of property, and also to injury inflicted on the person. It appeared from the newspapers that 500*l.* had been awarded as compensation to the widow of Mr. Booth by the grand jury. He had not been aware that that could be done; but, if not, the law ought to be altered; it would impose a considerable check on such outrages, and be an inducement to the respectable neighbours to prevent crime or apprehend the murderer. The noble Marquess then said, that he would proceed to ask the Government, pursuant to notice, what course they meant to pursue with regard to Mr. Watson, a magistrate and deputy-lieutenant of the county of Antrim? It had been thought proper not to renew the Party Processions Act, which expired a few weeks ago; and on the 23rd of June a meeting was held in Lisburne, attended by 300 masters of Orange lodges, and presided over by Mr. Watson—a most respectable gentleman, and extremely popular in his neighbourhood, but whose conduct in his public and official capacity, must not therefore go unnoticed. Resolutions were passed at that meeting, and signed by him, to reorganize the Orange institutions in the county, and to meet on one of the July anniversaries, and march in procession to the parish church, where a sermon was to be preached on the occasion. Now, magistrates were dismissed very unceremoniously in 1843 for attending Repeal meetings or subscribing to the Repeal Association. At no one Repeal meeting had there been any serious affray, still less any loss of life; but this had not been the case with the Orange meetings, with respect to which there had been over and over again cases in which magistrates had been called upon to act. He did not approve of the dismissal of the Repeal magistrates; he deemed it unconstitutional and unjust, and he believed at the time it would be one-sided; but, at any rate, it showed the wish of Government to discountenance Repeal and Repeal meetings. It was said that this was done because Parliament had disapproved the object of the Repeal meetings; but what did the Act which had just expired show, except that both Houses of Parliament and the Crown had serious objections to the Orange processions? The meetings in the one case also were held for the purpose of petitioning Parliament, but in the other case there was no such object. He had, however, deemed it unwise to dismiss the Repeal magistrates, because, in the first place, it gave countenance to the opinion that men acting as magistrates were liable to be influenced in their judical duties by their political opinions; and in the next place, it removed from the Bench those who held opinions in unison with the mass of the population, and was calculated to throw suspicion on the administration of justice. He feared that the Government had overlooked this gentleman, whose case was more flagrant than the others, and had taken no step on the information he had given that he was about to reorganize the Orange societies and the Orange processions. In a letter addressed to this gentleman by a noble Marquess (the Marquess of Londonderry), he in the strongest way deprecated the opinions advanced in the resolutions, and had given his reasons against the course proposed. What he now wanted to know was, whether the Government, after they had taken upon themselves the responsibility of doing away with the Act, which applied only to one party, had made any arrangements in its stead—whether they had paid the same attention as the noble Marquess to this matter—whether they had taken any steps to rebuke this gentleman for what he had done in reference to these proceedings, and had dismissed him from the commission of the peace? His formal question was, whether there had been any correspondence with Mr. Watson, or any steps taken to remove him from the commission of the peace, in consequence of what took place at Lisburne on the 23rd of June last?

Lord Stanley was sorry the noble Marquess had thought it necessary to enter into any discussion of various events which had no material bearing on the present case. He regretted that the noble Marquess should have brought under the consideration of their Lordships the conduct of the Government with regard to those who had promoted or attended Repeal meetings; and he hoped it would not be thought disrespectful if he declined to follow him into preceding events, or into the question of the repeal of an Act which the noble Marquess admitted to have been one-sided. He would not, however, conceal from the noble Marquess, or from the House, that Her Majesty's Government had seen with the deepest regret, and, he would add, with no inconsiderable disappointment, the manner in which the Orange societies had, with ill-judgment, so imprudently and so recklessly acted: neglecting altogether due caution, and forgetful of the friendly spirit in which Her Majesty's Government had withdrawn the prohibition of the Act of Parliament, and disregarding also the admonitions addressed to them in every direction by those among themselves who were entitled to the greatest confidence and respect. It was a melancholy picture of the state of Ireland, that so large a portion of the population of both parties, or rather factions, should be bent so much on exasperating and aggravating those animosities which it had been the object of that and of the preceding Governments to allay. So long as both parties in Ireland persisted in their determination to treat with hostility their opponents, it was a hopeless effort for the Government or the State to improve the condition of a country torn by this unhappy violence. Her Majesty's Government, he repeated, had seen with the deepest regret what had recently taken place. He would not vindicate or palliate the course which had been pursued; but he ventured to remind the noble Marquess, that the fact of processions of one description being unattended with any violence, and that processions of another description led to affrays, did not show that any greater amount of blame was attributable to the latter party, because for an affray to take place there must be two parties. The processions of the Repealers, however aggravating and annoying the provocation might be, had been borne in silence, while the Orange processions had not met with similar forbearance on the part of their political opponents; so that the blame was not wholly on one party because the processions of that party led to affrays which the others did not. He would not now discuss the merits of the particular case which was now in a course of judicial investigation: he only wished he might express a hope that in the course of this investigation all matters would receive an impartial, as well as a judicial inquiry With respect to this gentleman—if the facts were as reported to Her Majesty's Government—they would deeply regret that a gentleman, in other respects of high worth and respectability, should have been so misguided as to lend his name and his character—and the higher the name the greater was the evil—to this display of party feeling and animosity. The noble Marquess, however, was wrong in supposing that no steps had been taken by Her Majesty's Government with respect to this gentleman. He would not say that he would be removed from the commission of the peace; but the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for Ireland had directed the attention of the Lord Lieutenant to the proceeding; subsequently there had been communications between his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department and the Lord Chancellor of Ireland on the subject, and he had reason to believe, though he was not certain of the fact, that the gentleman had been called upon to explain, and that upon consideration the matter would be dealt with as should be deemed best. He trusted that the noble Marquess would not call for a premature declaration of the course which Her Majesty's Government would pursue. The subject had not escaped their attention; they had viewed the occurrences with the deepest regret, and he hoped the noble Marquess did not express his own supposition when he doubted whether Her Majesty's Government would act with anything except impartiality with respect to similar offences committed by different bodies.

The Marquess of Londonderry said, that with respect to the character of this individual, for a number of years he had occupied the highest position in the county, and that he possessed great popularity, and that up to this period, though he was a party man, his conduct as a magistrate had been most proper. He confessed that he had seen the resolutions passed at the meeting in question with regret, and had written his strong impressions against them. His noble Friend (the Earl of Roden) and others had also urged the Orange societies to take heed, as it was very easy for Parliament to re-enact the law against them; and he must say he did not believe that the great majority of the Orangemen, or the Protestants of Ireland, had taken part in these proceedings. The excuse of this gentleman was, that 15,000 men had marched in peace and tranquillity, and there had been no disturbance. This was in his own neighbourhood. With regard to the occurrences at Armagh, it was a lamentable story, and he was strongly of opinion that there were errors on both sides. He asked the Government to consider whether it would be wise and just to punish this venerable gentleman; he had been mistaken, but it would do mischief in that part of the country if anything were done against him. He believed that the speech of the noble Lord would do more good than any dismissal of magistrates, or than any resort to violent measures. For an individual so respectable great allowance should be made, though he had been misguided. In his opinion, if they would leave Ireland to herself she would right herself better than if they ripped up every occurrence, irritating one person, without conciliating the good will of the other. He had been the consistent friend of Ireland throughout; he trusted that he would always remain so; and he had given to these societies his best counsel and advice.

Subject at an end.

SYRIA.] Lord Beaumont rose to move, in compliance with the Notice he had given, an humble Address to Her Majesty, that she would be graciously pleased to allow to be laid before their Lordships certain Papers and Correspondence regarding the recent events in Syria. His object in moving for these Papers was, that their Lordships might have a continuation of the Papers and Correspondence furnished to the House in 1841, so that the whole subject might be laid before them in so complete a form as to enable them to draw a correct judgment of the great question in the Levant, which for some time threatened to involve Europe in war, and which, he feared, still contained the germs of future disturbance to the peace of Europe, and was the constant cause of jealousy and recrimination between England and France. He did not think that he should be wasting their Lordships' time if he dwelt for a few minutes on the actual state of affairs in Syria, as that question had been the subject of debate on two distinct occasions in the Chamber of Deputies in Paris; and such opinions had been expressed in the course of those debates as would, if acted upon, tend to interrupt any good understanding which might still exist between England and France on the subject; nor did he think the noble Earl would regret the opportunity being offered him of giving some explanation on this question, as the most injurious accusations had been brought against English agents in the East, and no attempt had been made to contradict them in the Chambers in Paris. The Papers furnished in 1841 to the House brought the history of this question down to the period when the Porte, aided by all the great European Powers, except France, had succeeded in recovering from the usurpation of Mahomet

Ali the province of Syria, together with the other dependencies in Asia which had been overrun by the arms of its powerful vassal; and it was at that period, or immediately subsequent to it, that the Great Powers signed the Protocol of the 10th of July, and invited France to reunite herself to the European Compact. France accepted the invitation, and signed the Protocol of the 10th of July on the 13th of the same month. From that time, France was considered as having abandoned her isolated position, and agreed to act in concert with the other Powers. If they followed her subsequent conduct, and attended to her present professions, they would see how far she had realized these expectations, or how far she had disappointed the hopes founded on them. On recovering Syria, the Sultan had to consult how he should govern his newly-restored Province. Under the Emir Bechir (its old form of government previous to the Egyptian occupation), civil wars, bloodshed, confusion, and scenes similar to those they now deplored, were familiar. Chief fought against chief, and feudal system and feudal strife were the characteristics of the Lebanon: to such a system of government the Porte ought not to have returned, nor could the European Powers advisedly recommend it. France alone seemed to have desired it, but the Porte resisted, and resisted with success. Defeated in this object, France next demanded a separation of the two people who inhabited the Lebanon; or, to use the words of the Minister of Foreign Affairs in France, instead of a purely Turkish and Mussulman ruled the establishment of nationality in the mountain. In this, and in the subsequent steps of the proceedings, she seemed to have taken the chief part in counselling the Divan, and to have been successful in her recommendations. A separate government was given to the Druse and Maronite people; but, not content with this, France required that even in the mixed districts and villages, the same principle should be carried out, and, consequently, the Druse were to be subject to Druse magistrates, and the Maronite to Maronite magistrates. This was adopted, and each people were to have kaimacans or vekils of their own. France having been the chief party in establishing this form of government, she ought, in reason to have allowed the system to have had a fair trial; but, instead of so doing, she professed to consider the plan as only temporary, and raised hopes and discontent by saying that she expected to obtain more privileges for the Maronites in the mountain. The Porte sought to establish municipal privileges instead of the feudal ones, and to place Lebanon on the same footing as the rest of the Pashalic; but, buoyed up by the conduct of France, and the language of her Minister, the Shahab family hoped to regain the authority they had lost. Intrigue followed intrigue, and a moment's repose was never allowed to the Government of Syria to try fairly the new principle adopted there. Constant outbreaks occurred; but if the Porte had been allowed to act independently, these outbreaks would soon have been suppressed; and if Omar Pasha, who was sent out to replace the Emir Bechir in the mountain, had been allowed to remain, we should have never heard of the war between Druse and Maronite. Unfortunately, the Porte was not allowed to act with a strong hand, and suppress revolt; but in an attempt to give a demi-independence and self-government to the two people who occupied the mountain, old feuds were revived, and the war broke out, which led to the late disgraceful scenes of bloodshed and cruelty. While alluding to the lamentations of France over these bloody scenes, and the indignation and sympathy she tried to excite on the occasion, saying that civilization and common charity imposed on Europe the necessity of interfering to stop such cruel occurences —all of which, by the by, she attributed to the suggestions of the British Consul, and the instructions of the English Government—while alluding to the outcry raised in France on this subject, he (Lord Beaumont) could not refrain from reflecting, that at the very same time, in a province which France claimed as her own, a scene had been enacted which surpassed in horror all the inventions of romances, and which, if we did not know it to be true, we would believe to be the monstrous production of the frenzied imagination of some new and unequalled compiler of horrors. Returning, however, from this digression to the subject immediately before the House, he would briefly recapitulate the events of the last few months. On the 30th of April, the Maronites, urged on by the intrigues of the Shahab family and the promises of France, had invaded the territory of the Druses; the Druses retaliated, and then commenced a species of civil war in the mixed districts, during which the cruelties alluded to had taken place. The Druses got the upper hand, when the Turkish authorities interfered, and an armistice was forced upon the belligerents. Such being the present state of Lebanon, and the renewal of such scenes as had been described being more than probable, it behoved them to consider well what were the conduct and policy of France. From the speeches of M. Guizot, and the debates which had recently taken place in the Chamber of Deputies, he (Lord Beaumont) gathered that it was the intention of France to separate herself from the other Powers in this question, and act singly in the affairs of Syria; she claimed, on the ground of some obsolete Treaties, the exclusive right to protect the Christians of Mount Lebanon—a claim which could not hold good in respect of the Maronites, inasmuch as at the time the supposed Treaties were made, the Maronites were not in communion with Rome. France had already one man of war on the coast, and the Minister of Foreign Affairs declared that orders had been given to two others to join her. If the discontent of the mountaineers was fomented by foreign intrigue, and the insurrection of the Maronites fed by the assistance of France, there could be no hope that the Porte would be able to restore peace in the Lebanon, and put down, with a strong hand, those who dared to break it. For his own part, he (Lord Beaumont) thought it was the duty of this country to strengthen the sovereign power of Turkey, instead of attempting to diminish it in Syria; and he considered the noble Earl called on to do his utmost to persuade France not to act singly in this case, but forego her presumed right of exclusive protection of the Maronites, and join cordially with England in obtaining equal justice to Druse and Maronite, which could only be secured by establishing in full force the supreme authority of the lawful Sovereign of both populations—the Sultan. He felt he had now said enough to justify the Motion for Papers; but he should feel disappointed if the noble Earl, when he acceded to it, should not avail himself of the opportunity of explaining the intentions of Government, and also of contradicting the aspersions cast upon Colonel Rose in the French Chambers. The noble Lord concluded by moving for the Correspondence regarding Syria since 1842.

The Earl of Aberdeen: The Papers to which the noble Lord has referred, were moved for some time ago in the House of Commons. There is, of course, therefore, no objection to their being laid on the Table of your Lordships' House. Being very voluminous, it has required some time to prepare them; they are not yet quite ready; I hope that in the course of a few days they will be; and, when they are ready, I shall be happy to furnish them to the noble Lord and the House. The provinces to which the noble Lord has referred are undoubtedly in a very disturbed state—confusion, bloodshed, and anarchy have prevailed in them for some time past to a lamentable extent. I will not say that I give any credit to that which, however, I must tell the noble Lord, is generally believed in the country itself—that the Turkish Government is the sole cause of the warfare which has been carried on between these two people, the Maronites and the Druses. It is generally believed that the Porte, being unable to govern them with a strong hand, seeks to have the power of doing so by means of setting one against the other, and thus weakening both. Now, I do not believe that. I believe that the confusion that prevails is only the result of Turkish apathy and misrule, which are but too common in many of their provinces, and not to any such diabolical plan as that which is supposed to exist. It is true that the French Government have assumed a general protectorship over all Christians in the Levant, founding their right to do so on old Treaties and capitulations, from, I believe, the time of Francis I. I shall not enter into the question of the right which the French Government may have to exercise this protection; but, at all events, in the present case they must submit to share it with us, inasmuch as we are bound by positive engagement to attend to the condition of the population of this province. Before the expulsion of the Egyptians, the Turkish Government entered into an agreement with Her Majesty's Ambassador, that in the event of the province being recovered, the inhabitants should recover their former privileges, and that their condition should be improved. We are, therefore, bound by an obligation to see that their condition is so far improved as to fulfil the pledge which was offered by the Turkish Government. As for seeing good government established in that or any other province of the Turkish empire, I am not very sanguine. But there may be a spirit of improvement encouraged, and in this case we are under the necessity of seeing that the Turkish Government fulfils its engagement. Otherwise I do not wish to interfere in the details of the government of this province, except where some very flagrant outrage is committed, with which common humanity and a regard for our fellow Christians should call for our immediate intervention. Generally speaking, I fear, it would be a vain attempt, indeed, to establish anything like such a government as would be satisfactory to ourselves and the public in any province; but in this province we are compelled to interest ourselves, in consequence of the engagement into which we have entered. It has happened in this and in other provinces where there are two parties, that one has been supposed to be an English, and the other a French party, and thus we are set in a sort of opposition to each other, quite contrary, as I believe, to the intention of both Governments; for I believe the object of the French Government is precisely that of the English Government, viz., without reference to Maronites or Druses, to see something like order, tranquillity, and peace, established in the country. There is no sort of foundation for the notion which the noble Lord seems to entertain, of the French Government intending to withdraw itself from its alliance in this case with the other Powers. The noble Lord should recollect that the Five Great Powers of Europe are acting together at Constantinople and in the provinces, by their Consuls: and, although in a case of such difficulty, and where there are such various interests, it is possible that a difference of opinion may more or less prevail, as to what may be the best mode of restoring peace to this unhappy country, I should say that, generally, there has been concert between all the Powers respecting the measures which ought to be pursued; and there is no reason to suppose that on the part of France, or of any other Government, there is any wish not to act in concert. I think it is quite unnecessary to occupy your Lordships' time any more on this subject. It appeared to me to be quite unnecessary to refer to the debates in the French Chambers upon the subject. Gentlemen there say what they please, as we take the liberty of doing here. But I do not feel myself bound to answer accusations which were made without any foundation whatever. I have not seen any report of the debate to which the noble Lord has referred, and I am not aware that any authority has been given by the French Government to such accusations; and, therefore, it is quite unnecessary to occupy your Lordships time by adverting to them. But I will say that there have been accusations made against the English Consul General in Syria which are not only most unfounded, but are without even a shadow of foundation; for, although it is generally supposed that England has espoused the cause of the Druses, and France has taken the Maronites under its protection, yet, to show how little truth there is in that opinion, I may mention that, very recently, Colonel Rose, Her Majesty's Consul, having been informed that a body of Maronites were in prison and in danger of losing their lives and property, got up at twelve o'clock at night, mounted his horse, and proceeded on a long and difficult march to the place where these people were confined. He found 600 persons, men, women, and children, and by his exertions and the influence he exercised, at the head of a considerable column, under a burning sun, in a two days' march, he brought them safely to Beyrout, and thus liberated these Maronites from danger in which they were placed. Therefore, your Lordships see that, though other gentlemen may write moving and pathetic despatches, the English Consul General exposed himself to actual fatigue and to some danger in rescuing these persons, who approached him with an appeal requiring his aid as their friend. This is the only feeling upon which I should always wish to see English agents act. While others indulge in eloquent descriptions of the sympathy they felt, yet so long as the English agent did the sufferers real service, I think your Lordships will be satisfied with the comparison which his conduct may bear with any other friendly Power. Such was the manner in which Colonel Rose acted towards the Maronites. And as to supporting the Druses against the Maronites, and encouraging their destruction by the Druses, that must clearly be an absurd imputation, hardly worthy of refutation. But so far from the Druses being protected by us, so far as I am aware of any motive that could influence our conduct, it would be most natural for us to protect the Maronites; they are Christians and Roman Catholics; they are persons who have many claims upon us, and who acted zealously in support of our measures in freeing the country from the Egyptians, whereas the Druses have no claim upon us whatever. Their religion is neither Christian nor Mahomedan; it is some superstition which nobody knows anything about; some say it is the worship of the Golden Calf; but, be that as it may, the others are certainly Christians, and deserving of our sympathy. But our object is to establish justice; that whether Christians or Druses, justice may be administered without partiality, or predilection, or interference with the Turkish Government. I hope we shall never do that which will not be justifiable towards an independent State, as it is our object to obtain the improvement of the condition of the people with as little interference as possible with the sovereign rights of an independent State—a State which, however imperfect may be its government and its condition in many respects, we have an interest in preserving and strengthening by all the means in our power. As there is no objection to produce the Papers, I do not see that it is necessary for me to trouble your Lordships any further.

Lord Beaumont said, he wished the noble Earl had read the debate in the French Chamber, because he would have seen that M. Guizot did not abandon the principle of acting alone, and was prepared to act in favour of the Maronites; and that there was a difference of opinion between England and France, not as to the object, but as to the remedy. He was, however, glad he had given the noble Earl an opportunity of making the statement which their Lordships had heard.

Motion agreed to.

WASTE LANDS (AUSTRALIA) BILL.] Lord Stanley moved the Second Reading of the Waste Lands (Australia) Bill, in doing which the noble Lord explained the state of the law as it stood at present in the Australian Colonies with reference to waste lands. One object of the Bill was to authorize the Governor of New South Wales to grant leases of waste lands within or without the limits of the Colony, on the same terms as the other lands were disposed of, namely, by auction. It was proposed, however, to restrict the leases to twenty-one years at the outside. The produce of the revenue to be derived under the Bill was to be applied in part to raise a fund for the encouragement of immigration of free labourers;—but this regarded New South Wales only. In Australia there was no want of capital, but there was a deficiency of labour. In Van Diemen's Land, on the other hand, there was a superabundance of labour seeking for employment. This, resulted, in great part, from the excess of convict labour. We, moreover, imposed a heavy tax upon the Colony on account of the convicts we sent there. The expense incurred there for police and gaols, was 36,000*l.* per annum, whilst the rest of the expenditure was only 70,000*l.*; thus one-third of the whole expenditure of the Colony was entirely taken up by the police and the gaols. It was proposed by this Bill to retransfer to this country the proceeds of land sales, which had dwindled down to almost nothing; to take into the hands of the Government the proceeds of the sales of lands, after they had been improved by convict labour, and to release the Colony from the gaol and police expenses. It was proposed to allow the best-conducted convicts to become renters of Government land in Van Diemen's Land: whereas in New South Wales, the object was to give a certain permanency of tenure, and enable the free occupier to surround himself with some of the comforts of life. He (Lord Stanley) believed the Bill would be found satisfactory to many of those who had presented petitions to Parliament.

The Marquess of Lansdowne was not prepared to oppose the Bill in its present stage. He thought a case might be made out for legislative interference. But when entering upon so large a subject, he considered it was absolutely necessary that the noble Lord should make out a case of most urgent necessity before their Lordships consented to pass a Bill of this nature, especially as they were now coming to the close of the Session, and when many important measures, which had undergone great consideration, had already been deferred to another period. Many of the clauses of this Bill might be of value, and among the rest, he thought the system of granting licenses for the occupation of waste lands might be attended with beneficial effects; but there were provisions in the Bill, giving to the Governor such arbitrary powers, that he was entirely opposed to them. By the 6th Clause, persons who had already occupied parts of the waste lands under licenses, were to be made liable, at the pleasure of the Governor, to an amount of taxation almost indefinite, assuming the shape of an agistment tax. It authorized a tax upon cattle, paying a certain sum per year for every horse, sheep, and head of horned cattle depastured upon the waste lands which Her Majesty's Privy Council or the Governor might decide upon. To this he most strongly objected. Their Lordships were aware of the effect of a law of agistment in Ireland; and he thought it would be a rash, inconsiderate, and ill-judged measure to introduce into Australia. He wished to impress it upon their Lordships, that they were now, in fact, laying the foundation of a principle of property which would affect two thousand miles of territory and vast millions of acres of land, and that without giving the measure such consideration as its importance demanded, and which if brought on early in the next Session it would of course obtain.

Lord Stanley observed, that the noble Marquess seemed to suppose that the license conferred a permanent right upon the party obtaining it. But that was not the case. It was an annual license to pasture stock.

The Marquess of Lansdowne: Was it not a license to occupy?

Lord Stanley: No; it was merely a license to depasture stock within a certain district. The Governor was at the present moment perfectly free to fix from year to year the amount to be paid by each party obtaining a license.

Lord Monteagle objected to the 6th and 13th Clauses, which he believed had excited the greatest possible apprehension and alarm. He objected to their provisions as perfectly without precedent. In 1842, an Act was passed regulating the sale of Colonial property; but the proposed Bill, which extended to the whole of the Australian Colonies, suspended the operation of the existing Statute law of the land so long as any Colony should continue to be a place to which felons might be conveyed for punishment. The noble Lord stated that he meant it to apply only to Van Diemen's Land; but an Order in Council, by sending even as few as ten felons to New Zealand, or any other Colony, would extend the provisions at once to those places.

Lord Stanley explained, that the Bill could not apply to any existing Colonies, as their charters would not permit the sending of felons there; but if new Colonies should be established, and it should be deemed necessary to found new penal settlements in such places, but for the provision referred to, those Colonies would be subject to the old Land Sales Act.

Lord Monteagle, in continuation, expressed his regret that the Bill had been introduced at so late a period of the Session, not only on public grounds, but also for the sake of the noble Lord himself. It was clearly impossible, at this period of the Session, the measure could be well considered; and it was more than probable that, if considered, it would not be satisfactory.

Lord Polwarth expressed a hope that the provision which made some amends to Van Diemen's Land for the expense incurred by gaols and police might also be extended to Australia.

Bill read 2ª.

FOREIGN LOTTERIES BILL.] Moved that the Bill be now read 3ª.

Lord Monteagle said, he wished to have a clause inserted which should provide for and insist upon the enforcement of the law with regard to the publication of notices in newspapers relative to foreign lotteries. As all newspapers and periodicals came under the inspection of the Commissioners of Stamps and Taxes, he was of opinion that that body should be entrusted with the enforcement of the law in this respect, and he should propose the insertion of some such clause as the following:

"Be it enacted, that whenever it shall appear to the Commissioners of Stamps and Taxes, from the inspection of newspapers and periodicals, that there has been inserted any advertisement or notice of foreign lotteries, they shall take the necessary proceedings to enforce the law."

Though he wished, however, to have a clause inserted, he should be satisfied if the noble Lord would give him an assurance that the law was to be enforced, and that these great frauds and nuisances should be put down by the strong hand of the law.

Lord Stanley assured the noble Lord that it was not intended that the law should become a dead letter in this respect. He did not think it would be necessary to introduce a clause; but he would take care that such instructions should be given as should secure the enforcement of the law to its fullest extent.

Bill read 3ª.

FIELD GARDENS' BILL.] The Duke of Richmond moved the Second Reading of this Bill.

The Earl of Radnor objected to the Bill, both in principle and detail. He wished to know whether the Government approved or not of such a measure, as in the former case it ought to be left to the hands of some noble Lord on the Treasury Bench, or not brought forward at all.

Lord Stanley defended the Bill both in its principle, and against the objections urged by the noble Earl. The noble Lord said that the noble Earl might judge from what he had said, whether he and his (Lord Stanley's) Colleagues in office, did or did not approve of the Bill.

Bill was then read a second time.

House adjourned.

The following Protest against the Second Reading of the Field Gardens Bill was entered on the Journals:—

1. Because by this Bill there may be established in every parish in the kingdom a Board endowed with corporate privileges, irresponsible, and armed with powers which may be used for purposes of favouritism on the one hand, or of oppression on the other.

2. Because the objects of this Bill, purporting to be subsidiary to the provisions for the relief of the poor, under divers Acts of Parliament, are, in truth, in direct contravention to their principle.

3. Because, as in each parish, where the provisions of this Bill shall be adopted, the field-wardens will be wholly unconnected with those of every other, and uncontrolled by any superior power, it cannot be doubted that in process of time there will be introduced in different parishes a diversity of practice, which will lead to heart-burnings, discontent, and confusion.

4. Because the provisions of this Bill, if carried out in the fairest and most equitable manner, will necessarily aggravate the acknowledged evils resulting from the present law of settlement.

5. Because its unavoidable tendency is to promote early and improvident marriages, and to give an unnatural stimulus to the increase of population, already superabundant in the agricultural districts.

6. Because the necessary consequence will be the lowering of the wages of the agricultural labourer.

7. Because the provisions of this Bill lead to the indefinite increase of holdings and divisions of land, and thus to many of the evils which now press so severely on the people of Ireland.

8. Because they are in accordance with an opinion much in vogue, but which I think false in itself, and injurious to the people; founded on an unfair estimate of their intelligence and spirit, and (if acted upon) tending to lower their independence, and to degrade their moral condition, viz., that they cannot manage their own concerns, but must be cared for, overlooked, and directed by others, their superiors perhaps in fortune, but I believe by no means superior to them in virtue, natural intelligence, or public spirit.

9. Because if I am mistaken in this character of the people, and their comparative worth, the evil ought to be cured by good example and education; and will only be aggravated by such measures as those contemplated by the present Bill.

RADNOR.

The House met at twelve o'clock.

On Clause 5,

Viscount Clements objected to the whole Bill. It was preposterous to introduce a measure of this importance at so late a period of the Session, and to try to carry it on in a House consisting of four Irish Members, and eleven Members from other parts of the three kingdoms. He would not be a party to such a course; and he would now move that the House be counted.

The Chairman counted the Committee; and there being only twelve Members present, left the Chair; and Mr. Speaker having resumed it,

The Chairman reported to him that there were not forty Members present.

The House was again counted, and forty Members being present, again resolved itself into a Committee on the above Bill.

On the Question, "that Clause 5 stand part of the Bill."

Viscount Clements said, he would divide the Committee.

Strangers were excluded, but no division took place, Viscount Clements finding no seconder.

On the Question being again put,

Viscount Clements said, he would move "that the further progress of the Bill be postponed for six months."

Sir T. Fremantle urged on the noble Lord the necessity of allowing the Bill to proceed.

Sir R. Ferguson would again press on the right hon. Baronet what he had often urged before—namely, to try the Bill as an experiment in those counties which had not yet been valued.

Viscount Clements had no wish to let others do for him what he could do for himself; and he therefore objected to this Bill, on the ground that it committed to the Executive Government in Ireland, what could be more satisfactorily done by the grand juries of counties, as far as related to valuation, and applotting the grand jury cess. Under these circumstances, he would persevere in his opposition to the Bill.

Mr. S. Crawford also urged on the right hon. Baronet the propriety of adopting the suggestions of the hon. Baronet (Sir R. Ferguson), of letting the measure stand as an experiment on those counties which had not been valued.

Sir T. Fremantle said, he could not take upon himself to follow the advice of the hon. Baronet, without more consideration; and, therefore, if the noble Lord would allow the remaining clauses to go through Committee, he would—if no objection existed in other quarters—comply with the suggestion; but if he could not consent to the suggestion, he would promise the noble Lord and the hon. Baronet, an ample opportunity of discussing the point at another stage, and have the sense of the House taken on it, in a much fuller attendance of Members.

Mr. George Hamilton said, that his hon. Friend the Member for Londonderry knew very well—no one better—how general was the complaint in Ireland with regard to the want of uniformity and accuracy of all existing valuations. Nothing could be more desirable than one uniform and accurate valuation on a proper principle, which would be understood. The principle of the valuation proposed in the Bill, was what he considered the only sound principle, namely, the letting value to a solvent tenant. Certainly it would have been better if the Bill had been introduced at an earlier period; but the effect of the postponement would be the delay of a year in commencing the valuation on sound principles.

Clauses to the 18th agreed to.

On Clause 15, "Decision of Sub-commissioners to be conclusive."

Mr. Sharman Crawford objected strongly to this clause.

Viscount Clements concurred in the objection. The people of Ireland should be taught to look to their natural guides, the magistracy and gentry, and not to Government officers.

Sir R. Ferguson was of opinion, that in reference to the valuation of tenements, it would be desirable to do away with the appeal, where the Sub-commissioners differ, to the Committee of Appeal, and to give it to the quarter sessions.

Mr. George Hamilton concurred, on the whole, with the suggestions of his hon. Friends; there was, in Ireland a natural and not an unjust jealousy of Government Commissioners, especially where there was no appeal from them. He thought the best machinery would be an appeal from the valuator of tenements to the Sub-commissioners, as the Bill provided, that is, if the owner of a tenement should not be satisfied with the valuation of it; the Sub-commissioners should examine and correct the valuation. He would add to that, an appeal to the Barrister at quarter sessions. Generally, he supposed, the revision of the Sub-commissioners would be satisfactory, and not the less likely to be so, if there was an appeal from it.

The remaining clauses were agreed to.

House resumed. Bill to be reported.

At the five o'clock sittings,

SMALL DEBTS (No. 3) BILL.] The Solicitor General said as this was a Bill of the utmost importance to the mercantile classes, it would be necessary to have it passed through the House with the least possible delay. He had had several communications with hon. Members on both sides of the House who were connected with the mercantile interest, and they had expressed their approval of the measure. He proposed, then, with the leave of the House, that the Bill should be read a second time, and that they should afterwards go pro formâ into Committee this evening, for the purpose of making certain alterations and adding some clauses to the Bill which were deemed necessary to render it completely satisfactory. The Bill, with the amendments, could then be printed, and delivered into the hands of Members to-morrow or Monday.

Bill read a second time.

On the Motion for going into Committee pro formâ,

Mr. Wakley suggested to the hon. and learned Gentleman the propriety of at once stating those amendments he intended to propose. The Bill, as it then stood, he thought was a satisfactory measure to the public generally, and was decidedly an improvement on that of last year. He should, therefore, like to know at once the character of the changes that were to be made in it.

Sir J. Graham thought that the course which his hon. and learned Friend proposed to take was decidedly the most convenient one, and to which no reasonable objection could be well urged.

PUNISHMENT IN STAFFORDSHIRE.] Mr. T. Duncombe wished to ask the right hon. Baronet whether he was prepared to lay on the Table of the House the Report of Mr. Robins, relative to the system pursued by a magistrate and certain constables in Staffordshire in respect to the punishment of Eliza Price; and also whether, in addition to such report, he would also produce a copy of the correspondence between the Government and the Lord Lieutenant of Staffordshire upon the subject? He had recently received a communication from the same neighbourhood, where it appeared that the same kind of treatment had been pursued against two women under the warrant of a Mr. Briscoe. The deposition in respect to the latter prisoners, which had been laid before another magistrate, stated that they were two young girls—one only eleven years of age, and the other fourteen. The first was apprehended by a constable on the charge of stealing a halfpenny worth of coals, and the latter for stealing a waistcoat of little value. The deponent, who was sister to one of these unfortunate girls, stated that she went to the constable, on the evening of her committal, who had Eliza Price in custody, when she found her sister in a back kitchen; that she asked him whether she could have a bed, when he replied in the negative, as he had not one there; that she then offered money to procure her sister a bed, which was also refused. On the following morning she again called, when she found her sister with handcuffs upon her, and chained to the grate. On the next morning she called and found her sister in the same dreadful condition, and the other prisoner, Emma Woodall, also chained in like manner to the grate. Her sister said that she had never been washed since she was taken into custody, and asked deponent for some soap. This statement was corroborated by another sister of the deponent. It appeared that Mr. Briscoe, before whom these two young girls were brought, had desired the constable to take them to his house, where they were confined for four days, and were both chained to the grate in the back kitchen. He (Mr. Duncombe) observed that this appeared to be a most monstrous case of cruelty, and that the constable, if found guilty of having acted so to these young women, should be made an example of, and the most effectual means taken to put an end to such a system that was alleged to prevail in the neighbourhood of Mr. Briscoe's magisterial authority.

Sir J. Graham said, he should not have the least objection to produce the minutes of evidence which had been taken before the Commissioner in respect to the cases referred to, and the report of the Commissioner himself upon such evidence. He would be also happy to lay upon the Table of the House a copy of the letter which he had addressed to the Lord Lieutenant of Staffordshire on the subject, enclosing the Report of the Commissioner and the minutes of evidence. The hon. Member for Finsbury would then see that he had pointed the attention of the Lord Lieutenant to this practice of chaining prisoners upon mere night charges, which he stated was most reprehensible, and he had pointed out to the Lord Lieutenant the necessity of directing the magistrates' attention to the subject, with a view of inducing them to use their influence to check this practice, which he was sorry to see had prevailed in that district. The conduct pursued in respect to the recent cases mentioned by the Hon. Member was also most unjustifiable.

CHARITABLE BEQUESTS BILL (IRELAND).] The Earl of Arundel wished to know whether it ever was the intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce any amendments into the Irish Charitable Bequests Bill?

Sir J. Graham said, the subject to which the noble Earl referred was under the consideration of Government. The Roman Catholic Commissioners appointed to preside at the Board under this Bill had represented to the Government the objections which they had to more than one point in that measure. They pointed out, especially, the duty that was imposed on them by the Act, of deciding as to who possessed ecclesiastical authority, according to the rules and canons of their Church. They stated that this point should be left altogether to the decision of an ecclesiastical authority, and not of a civil authority. This objection he had a desire, as far as possible, to remove. Another point was also dwelt upon as most objectionable, in respect to which they stated that the Bill had put them in a worse situation than they had been in before. He could only say it was not the intention of Government to place them in a more disadvantageous position than they had been heretofore. With respect to these objections generally, it was the intention of Her Majesty's Government, during the recess, to give every attention to them, with a view of ascertaining how these difficulties could be removed.

FRENCH SQUADRON AT TAHITI.] Captain Pechell said, that a paragraph had recently appeared in the public newspapers relative to the French squadron at Tahiti, in which it was stated that a letter had been lately received from that place, giving an account of the arrival of the Talbot frigate there, which was towed by the Salamander steamer. Before the Talbot could get leave to stop there, it appeared that her captain was required to ask permission from the French commander, and he was also commanded to salute the French flag. The captain of the Talbot hereupon objected to comply with these demands; and it was said that the French authorities would not allow any communication to be kept up with the Talbot, except through the Salamander steamer. The captain of the Talbot being disgusted at this treatment, sailed immediately for the Sandwich Islands. He wished to ask the hon. and gallant Admiral whether the particulars of any such proceeding had been received by the Board of Admiralty?

Sir G. Cockburn was understood to say that no report of such a circumstance as had been stated by the hon. and gallant Officer had, he believed, been received at the Admiralty.

MILITARY PUNISHMENT AT WINDSOR.] Mr. Wakley said that, pursuant to his notice, he wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary at War a question having reference to a report that had lately appeared in the Morning Chronicle, of a transaction which had occurred last Saturday, in connexion with the 2nd battalion of Coldstream Guards, at Windsor. By that statement, it appeared that a whole company of soldiers were ordered to strip themselves naked, for the purpose of being examined by the surgeon of the regiment; and in consequence of two of the soldiers refusing to obey such an order, a court-martial was held upon the spot, and an order made that these soldiers should receive one hundred lashes each, which was at once inflicted on them; the whole proceedings, including the court-martial and punishment, only occupying a period of two hours and a half.

Mr. S. Herbert said, the best answer he could give to the question of the hon. Member for Finsbury was, to state the facts that had occurred as briefly as possible. It appeared that for some time past, in a battalion of Guards at Windsor, many of the soldiers were affected with a certain disease, which, if suffered to continue, must have been attended with serious results. He had reason to believe that these men, whether from a dislike to going into the hospital, or from some other cause, had endeavoured to conceal the fact of their suffering under this disease. In consequence of this being made known to the military authorities there, a rigid medical examination was ordered; the result of which was, that sixteen men were found to be infected, who otherwise would have passed the ordinary examination, and would have remained without the application of any proper treatment to arrest the progress of the disease. In consequence of the great indisposition of the men to make known their peculiar situation, and thereby to avoid the necessity of going into the hospital, great dissatisfaction had been excited among them at the order for this examination, and two of them absolutely refused to submit to such examination. On the surgeon reporting the conduct of these men, they were called before the commanding officer, who took some pains to warn them of the serious offence they had been guilty of in refusing to obey the orders of the surgeon, who was a commissioned officer. He need not state how essential it was to the discipline of the army, that the orders of the commanding officers should be strictly obeyed; and in this case, it was most essential to the health of the men that the authority of the medical officer should not be held in contempt. The officer in command, therefore, informed these men that they were committing a most serious offence; but finding that they persisted in their disobedience, he ordered them to be confined for forty-eight hours in the black hole. The men made no remonstrance at the time to this order, and were marched by the serjeant into the guard room. On being ordered into the black hole by the serjeant, they refused to go; and on the commanding officer being again informed of their disobedience, he sent for them, and again explained to them the serious offence which they had, a second time, been guilty of. Having done so, the serjeant again gave the men orders to march; but they were still obstinate in their refusal. The commanding officer himself then gave the command, which he repeated two or three times; but the men continued to stand fast. He then ordered them back to the guard room, where he again and again remonstrated with them on the impropriety of their conduct. They, however, persisted in their refusal to obey; and the commanding officer being fully aware of the danger of this insubordination spreading, he immediately ordered a regimental court-martial, as he thought the immediate punishment for an offence of this description was much more important than if he had called a district court-martial, when the punishment would be necessarily delayed, and of a more severe character. The court-martial was accordingly held, before which the facts, as he had stated, were fully proved, and the punishment of one hundred lashes ordered to be inflicted upon them; which punishment was immediately carried into effect. With respect to the paragraph alluded to by the hon. Member, the statement as to the dissatisfaction which existed amongst those who were witnesses to the proceedings, was quite unfounded. He did not wish a false impression to be made in respect to the facts of this case. The punishment that was inflicted on those men was not for refusing to comply with the examination of the surgeon, but for insulting their commanding officer by persisting to disobey his orders.

Mr. W. Williams observed, that the right hon. Gentleman had not answered the most important charge that had been made, namely, whether those men had been ordered to stip themselves naked, in the presence of the whole regiment?

Mr. S. Herbert said, that it was a well-known custom in the army for the men to be obliged to strip occasionally for the examination by the surgeon. Also, when a regiment was ordered down to bathe together, and for the medical inspection, which generally took place in the rooms of the men in the morning. The exception in this case, as to the mode in which the men were ordered to undergo this examination, was in consequence of this disease, which was prevalent among them.

Mr. Wakley would undertake to say, that by a more private examination, a more searching inquiry could be made into the case of each particular man, than by adopting such a course as had been stated. Nothing could be more indelicate or indecent, or more repulsive to a proper and correct feeling that should be encouraged among men, than for soldiers to be placed under the necessity of undergoing such an examination naked, in the presence of a large company of their comrades. He knew that it was highly dangerous to make this House a court of appeal on these occasions; but when he knew that in the House of Correction, in this metropolis, there were at present seventy soldiers confined, it was quite clear that there was something wrong in the government of the army.

Mr. W. Williams thought, that every means should be taken to put a stop to a practice so indecent as had been described in the present instance.

Admiral Dundas begged to differ in the opinion expressed by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary at War, when he stated that it was customary for whole regiments to strip together on the occasions to which he had alluded. From his experience he could say, that it had never been customary to do so in the army, and as to the navy, he had never heard of such an instance occurring.

Mr. S. Herbert said, that there appeared to be some misapprehension as to the statement he had made. The regiment in question had stood together in a row, and each man, as he was called by the surgeon, stood out from the row, and underwent the examination.

CHINESE PRIZE MONEY.] On the Motion for going into Committee of Supply,

Captain Berkeley rose to bring forward the Motion of which he had given notice. He proposed this Motion, he said, solely from a sense of justice, from a strong conviction of what was due on the part of the nation to a most gallant body of men, who, after the most noble exertions—after undergoing the most fearful sufferings,—had been denied their rightful share in the booty which their bravery had acquired. As a proof of it he would read the following extract of a letter from Captain Grey:—

"The power of the sun during the whole period was very great, and the consequences of the unavoidable exposure of the men to it, and to the perhaps still more prejudicial night air, soon showed itself in the increasing sick lists of every ship. By the beginning of September, ours had reached 120, and before we returned to Chusan, we buried 18 men, including our purser, one lieutenant of marines, and carpenter, and some of the best petty officers of the ship. Our surgeon was invalided and died at the Cape, as well as a second carpenter. The number of men invalided I do not remember; but it was many months before the ship's company recovered their strength. In the number of men ill, many of the transport and troop ships far exceeded our proportion; and in two instances, I had out of my weak ship's company, to put officers and men on board them to take them down the river. The scene on board the Belleisle, when she passed Chin-keang-foo, I shall never forget. Of the 98th regiment, which had landed 680 bayonets at Chin-keang-foo on the 21st July, there were not 100 fit for ordinary duty, and of her ship's company, more than half were on the sick list. Fore and aft, her lower deck, every berth, was occupied by a sick man in his hammock, while in the gun room, which was used as a hospital, the men were lying side by side as close as they could be laid, in the last stage of debility. I could multiply the cases of the ships that came under my own observation while charged with the duties of senior officer at Chin-keang-foo; but I have said enough to give you some idea of the effects of the climate. I trust, I may never again witness such sickness and such suffering; at the same time, I cannot sufficiently express my admiration of the patience with which it was borne. Of the officers, one lieutenant, one midshipman, and myself alone escaped the ague. If I can afford you any further information that may be useful to you, I shall be glad to furnish it. I sincerely hope you may succeed in obtaining for the seamen some more adequate remuneration for their services than the miserable pittance of 4*l.* 2*s.*, which is all that fell to the share of those who served in the Endymion."

The pretence set up by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that no war had been declared previous to the hostilities so gallantly conducted by these men, was shabby in the last degree, and utterly inconsistent with justice and reason. In the case of the Burmese war, grants were made to the gallant Britons who had taken part in it, to the full extent of the military stores and other booty they had achieved. But the men who, by their bravery in China, had realized a booty of two millions and a half sterling, besides the ransom money, were denied the reward of their exertions. Government would not dare to refuse to the army in India the fruits of its valour; why, then, should the gallant fellows who had so nobly maintained the honour of England in China, be deprived of their rights? The officers and men in Sir W. Parker's ship, for instance, had they been justly treated, would have received, on the average, nearly 200*l.* each; but as it was, they would have got one-third more by working in peace and comfort in Plymouth or Chatham Dockyard for the time, than they realized by all their arduous exertions, their unsurpassed bravery, their terrible sufferings in China. It was sufficient to cause disgust in the mind of the British seaman to offer him such a paltry sum as 4*l.* as a return for the eminent services which he had rendered in China. Under the system which they adopted of remunerating those men, the boy who blacked an officer's shoes, or waited behind him at table, was as largely rewarded as the able seaman. To his mind, that was using the British seaman most unjustly; and he had no doubt that such a course of conduct would visit itself at a future day upon the authors of it. It was true that the Chancellor of the Exchequer said there had been no war in China; but the same argument had been used with respect to the battle of Navarino, and what took place in that case? The claims of the sailors were on that occasion resisted on the ground that there had been no declaration of war; and the consequence of resisting them on those grounds was, that on board one line of battle ship, on two occasions, the sailors said that in future they would make a bargain whether there was war or no war before they went into action. They had the authority of the greatest man that ever the Navy produced, for treating with liberality the sailors who fought the battles of their country. Lord Nelson said—

"An Admiral may be amply rewarded by his feelings and the approbation of his superiors, but what reward have the inferior officers and men, but the value of the prizes? If an Admiral takes that from them on any consideration, he cannot expect to be well supported. However, I trust, as in all other instances, if to serve the State, any persons or bodies of men suffer losses, it is amply made up to them; and in this I rest confident my brave associates will not be disappointed."

He trusted that the House would on this occasion act in the same liberal spirit which was exhibited when Admiral Codrington brought forward a Motion for the purpose of obtaining remuneration for the men who fought at Navarino. On that occasion Mr. O'Connell said that his principle was—not to pay those who did not deserve it, but to pay liberally those who deserved it. The only dissentient from the Motion was the present hon. Member for Montrose; but he did not divide the House on his opposition, and the Motion was carried. Now he would turn to Syria, and ask the House what course had been adopted with respect to the forces employed by this country on the coast of Syria? The petty officers employed in that service received each 12*l.*, or 14*l.*, or 16*l.*; whilst the petty officers who had served in China for a much longer period received but 4*l.* He had the honour of serving in that expedition, and he did not mean to put the services which were performed there in serious competition with those which had been performed in China; and he would add, that the men who were employed in Syria were not occupied in that service more than a few months, whilst those who served in China had been employed during periods of three years, two years, or one year. Notwithstanding this difference in the length of service, and the fact that the Chinese force had captured merchandise and other property equal in value to the amount of three millions sterling, which was bonâ fide their property, yet they received less per head than the men composing the expeditions to Syria and Algiers. Lord Exmouth received 100,000*l.* for seizing a fleet in the Bay of Naples, although he did not keep it in his possession for five minutes; and he would ask the House of Commons, would they, when they considered that, say that the men who were employed in those most valuable and important services in China, ought to receive so small a sum as 4*l.* each? For the service which had been rendered in other parts of the globe, liberal remuneration had been given; and he did not see why the seamen in China should be neglected. Sir H. Gough obtained a pension for life for his services; Sir W. Parker was created a baronet, and received a most important command; and Sir Henry Pottinger was created a baronet, and obtained a pension for his services. Those rewards were not too much for the valuable services which had been rendered; but he would ask, would any man in that House say that 4*l.* each was sufficient to compensate the sailors and soldiers who had been employed in China? It had been urged as a reason for giving so small a sum, that the victory in China was an easy victory; and he should remark that such an objection was a premium to officers not to put out their force or apply their science and skill in time, and with sufficient effect at once, but rather to let some of their men be killed before they injured the enemy. He trusted the House would not, on this occasion, forget the services which had been rendered by our seamen in China; that they had made the Chinese succumb to our terms, and had taught them a lesson which they would never forget. They had achieved a triumph which, in every point of view, was calculated to confer the greatest advantage; and in addition to all the other benefits which were to be expected from our proceedings in China, it ought not to be forgotten that facilities were obtained for introducing amongst the Chinese people the spirit and blessings of the Christian religion. He therefore earnestly entreated the House to assist him in doing that which he believed to be simple justice to the British seaman; and he thought that by doing justice to his claims, they were pursuing the only course which could most securely attach him to his country; and if they refused to compensate him for that which he had so hardly won, it would be useless to endeavour to make up afterwards for that injustice by emoluments or rewards, or offers of advantage. He had brought forward this Motion, not at the request of any party, but solely from his own desire to obtain justice for the British seamen; and if they refused to accede to it, they would, in his opinion, give the greatest blow to the British Navy which had been struck at it for many years. The hon. and gallant Member concluded by moving that—

"This House will, upon Wednesday, the 23rd day of this instant July, resolve itself into a Committee, for the purpose of considering the propriety of an Address to Her Majesty, humbly requesting that She will be graciously pleased to take into consideration the claims for further pecuniary recompense of the Officers, Seamen, Soldiers, and Marines engaged in the operations against the Chinese Empire, in the years 1840, 1841, and 1842."

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that if he rose for the purpose of opposing, on public principle, the Motion of the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite, he hoped the House would believe that he was not less impressed with a sense of the merit, vigour, and ability of those engaged in that war, than the hon. Gentleman. He was perfectly sensible not only of the valour and skill displayed by our forces in China, but also of the humanity which they exhibited towards their foes, and the sufferings which they endured, not only from the military operations, but also from the effects of the climate. For all these the forces employed in China deserved the respect and admiration of their fellow countrymen; but when he expressed his admiration of those who were so engaged, he would add that the House was now called upon to discuss a question totally distinct from the merits of the officers and men employed in the late operations in China. The hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite had called upon them to adopt a course which had never yet been taken by Parliament, and which was opposed to the constitutional principles on which the rule applicable to prize was founded. It had been always recognised as a principle that the remuneration of those engaged in naval and military operations should be left to the discretion and liberality of the Crown; and so strictly had that power been reserved to the Crown, that when the Crown made over to Parliament the revenues arising from droits of the Admiralty and property captured in war, the power was reserved to the Crown, in terms the most stringent, of apportioning at the discretion of the Crown the amount of what was captured from the enemy to the soldiers and seamen employed. The hon. and gallant Gentleman stated that all the property and money which had been captured in China belonged to the Crown; and when he alluded to the observation which he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) had made with respect to there being no war in China, he was aware that the observation was meant to apply to the right to seize that property. He had said that we had embarked in the operations against China, for the purpose of recovering from the Chinese an amount of money of which our subjects had been improperly deprived, and obtaining compensation from the Chinese Government for the expenses of the war, and bringing it to a proper sense of what was due to the honour and character of this country. It was not enough in order to establish a right prize, to show that it was captured as reprisal: instances without number had happened in which reprisals were made, and the property captured only retained for a time until satisfaction for injury was obtained — such captures were not prize of war. In order to establish a right to prize, certain formalities were necessary; there should be a declaration of war and a proclamation from the Crown, assigning the rights in property captured, which would give to the captors the power of making it a prize. He mentioned these circumstances, because he thought it was important that those in the House who had to decide the question should know the point on which it turned. It was true that in the case of the services performed at Algiers, 100,000*l.* were given by Parliament to the forces employed; in the case of Navarino, 60,000*l.*; and in the case of Syria, 60,000*l.* also; but these sums were not given as prize, they were given as remuneration to the men employed in those services. As soon as the operations in China had successfully terminated, the Government took into their consideration what sum ought to be given to the forces employed. The hon. and gallant Gentleman complained that the sum then awarded, gave but a miserable pittance to each soldier and seaman; and he went on to compare that sum with a magnificent account of the prizes captured by our forces in China, when in reality no prizes had been captured. There were orders given to seize certain vessels and property as reprisals, to be given up at the end of the war; but there were directions sent out to take no vessels which were engaged in carrying on the intercourse along the coast of China; and so far were those in authority from looking at the property seized as prize, that when Sir Henry Pottinger was asked to consider the captures as prize, and to appoint a prize agent, he positively refused, and appointed a public officer to superintend the vessels captured; thus laying down the principle that they were seized for satisfaction of our demands in China, and not as prize. The Government had then to consider the proportion in which remuneration to the officers and men engaged in the service of their country should be assigned and distributed. The hon. Gentleman stated that property to the amount of 1,500,000*l.* was captured. He did not know upon what data that calculation was founded; but there was a return on the Table of the House, from which it appeared that the value of prizes captured from the 25th of August, 1841, to the 22nd of August, 1842, amounted to 540,000 dollars, or 117,700*l.*; and he apprehended that the Government, in allotting 166,000*l.* for the operations in the Canton river, and 255,000*l.* for the services performed in the Yantesekiang river, amounting in the whole to 420,000*l.*, could not be said to have given a remuneration inadequate to the prize money to which the troops would have been entitled, if there had been a proclamation of prize at the time when the captures were made. The gratuities given on such occasions—as in Syria and elsewhere—were not equal to the amount of property captured. The hon. Gentleman complained that the distribution of money was made according to the Indian mode. He admitted that to be the case; but it was because above one half of the land forces employed belonged to the East India Company's service, and a great portion of the naval force belonged to the Indian navy: they were, accustomed to the Indian mode of distribution of batta. If the other mode of distribution had been adopted, there would, doubtless, have been complaints of the distribution operating prejudicially to individuals in that branch of the service. Distribute prize money as you would, the lower ranks of the service could not receive those large amounts which the hon. Gentleman contemplated. He wished that gratuities could be distributed in proportion to the merits of the individual, and the value of the services rendered; but that could not be the case, if the amount be distributed in proportion to the prizes made. In the late war many men, for very brilliant services, received inferior remuneration to that which was gained by those who captured merchant vessels without exertion. The hon. Gentleman might say, "Look at the Nile and Trafalgar, where men received 7*l.* a head for the most brilliant victories and valuable services; while the crews who captured a merchant fleet in the chops of the Channel received 16*l.* or 20*l.*:" the remuneration from prize must depend upon the accidental circumstance of the service upon which the individuals were engaged. Nothing was more painful than to resist a demand made on behalf of branches of the public service, which had done so much both for the honour and interest of the country; but still Government had a duty to perform, and in its performance there was a principle of which they should not lose sight. They objected to parties on every occasion of successful enterprise coming to that House and seeking to make it the instrument of giving to the different branches of the service—to the army and to the navy of the country—pecuniary rewards. When the hon. Gentleman talked of seamen, before going into action, considering what would be the chances of their being rewarded in this way, he was attributing motives to both officers and men by which he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) was sure they were not actuated. If such were the case, if they were actuated by such motives, it would be a melancholy consideration, for nothing more clearly indicated the ruin of empires, than when troops would not march without a certainty of additional largess, and when the military power embarked in a system of competition which had only money for its object. He resisted the Motion in the firm belief that the amount which was already given, was adequate to the amount of the captures made by the force in the war referred to, and a fair compensation for any prize which, under the circumstances, could have been laid claim to by the parties; and he was sure, whatever might be the feeling of the hon. Gentleman on the matter, that the gratuity would be thankfully acknowledged by the troops and by the navy, as a liberal acknowledgment of the services which they had rendered, and as an incitement, if any such incitement were required, to the cheerful and proper performance of their duty on any future occasion on which the country might have need of their services.

Captain Berkeley observed, that he never stated that the officers and men were actuated by the feelings alluded to by the right hon. Gentleman, but that the system pursued was one which held out to them temptations to act upon such motives.

Sir C. Napier wished to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how long were vessels taken to be considered as droits of the Admiralty?—and he also wished the right hon. Gentleman to tell the House exactly, if he could, what money, after the expenses of the war, that was to say, after the expenses of the additional ships required by the transactions in China were paid, went clear into the Treasury? [The Chancellor of the Exchequer: None.] The right hon. Gentleman included the whole of the force that was there, and he thought it very probable that it had absorbed the whole of the money. The Chancellor of the Exchequer intimated that, in the case of China, there had been no declaration of war. But he would wish to know whether, when they sent a squadron of four frigates, in 1804, to intercept four Spanish galleons, a declaration of war had taken place or not? He believed not, and yet prize money was served out both to officers and men; and in consequence, as the Spaniards conceived, of our improperly seizing their vessels, a declaration of war followed. Was there a declaration of war after the Treaty of Amiens? He believed there was no such declaration, and yet all vessels taken, whether merchantmen or men of war, were regarded as prizes. Nor did he believe that there was a declaration of war even in the case of America, and yet the same rule obtained. Nor was there such a declaration in the case of Denmark, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer refused to give the Danish claimants any remuneration for their losses because the war was not declared; and now the Chancellor of the Exchequer refused to give prize money to the seamen engaged in the Chinese war because war was not declared. He would leave the right hon. Gentleman to reconcile these two cases if he could. In China, an active, severe, though not bloody war, was carried on for three years; and yet the Chancellor of the Exchequer told them that, notwithstanding this, there was no war at all. He remembered the Duke of Wellington, in the other House of Parliament, complaining of little wars; when he also said that if we had not war, it seemed something very like it, as war was going on in America, in Syria, and in the East Indies; and yet, although these were regarded by the illustrious Duke as wars, they were now told that that which they carried on in China was no war. If such were the case, then were they nothing better than pirates in seizing the property and the vessels of a nation with which they were at profound peace. The Chancellor of the Exchequer told them that the sum of 420,000*l.* was given to the army and the navy in the East Indies. But let them consider the magnitude of that army and navy. They should then examine whether that sum, for a war of three years' duration, was a sufficient remuneration for those who had taken an active part in it. A numerous army and a large fleet were employed in the operations on the coast of China; and the question for consideration was, whether the sum mentioned by the right hon. Gentleman would afford sufficient remuneration to the forces engaged in those operations. The right hon. Chancellor of the Exchequer had stated that no captures were made on the Chinese coast, because it was thought prudent to let vessels go along the shore, in order to insure supplies to the fleet; but was the right hon. Gentleman aware that a levy of 10 per cent. was made upon all Chinese vessels entering or leaving the ports? He believed that no account of the amount derived from that source had yet been furnished to the House. The battle of Navarino was an affair of one day; and yet 60,000*l.* were given for the services of one day, he might say of a few hours, for a fleet consisting of three sail of the line and two or three frigates. A large sum was granted at Algiers for the work of a few hours, although no war was declared. And in these cases, the Secretary of the Admiralty did not forget to take his war pay. He then said it was war, though war was not declared, and did not refuse his war salary. The petty officers at Navarino got 17*l.* For six weeks' service in Syria the same rank of officers got 13*l.*; whilst here, for his hard services in this the Chinese war, covering a period of three years, the petty officer received but 16*l.* He would ask the House if that was a fair and proper remuneration for a seaman who went to an unhealthy climate, who staid there for three years, and performed his duty like a man, insomuch that he, in common with all who shared with him the hardships of that service, was thanked by the House of Commons for so performing his duty? The Chancellor of the Exchequer told the House that the British army and navy in India were always in the habit of receiving batta. But when their placards were stuck up in Portsmouth, and in our other seaport towns, inviting men to enter the service, and holding out hopes to them that they might make their fortunes by prize money in the Chinese war, did these men then think of batta? The right hon. Gentleman also spoke of the honest pride and gallantry of our seamen, and of their love of glory and honour being sufficient as an incitement to the performance of their duty. But the sailor well knew, notwithstanding the right hon. Gentleman's panegyric, what prize money was. It was an idea which went down with him from father to son, and he would and must get his prize money. The British sailor also knew very well when he was well treated, and when he was ill treated. He was extremely sensitive. To prize money he looked as his own, as his right. He went to sea for his prize money. That was the plain English of the matter. He knew nothing of honour and glory. [Cries of "Oh, oh."] Let hon. Gentlemen hear him out. The British seaman, whatever might be his love or his regard for his country, fought for his prize money, and to do so was natural to him. To that he looked forward as his remuneration, as an addition to the scanty pay which was given him. The right hon. Gentleman asked the gallant Officer if the 21,000,000 of dollars which were given by the Chinese as a condition of peace, were to be considered as prize money? That they should be so considered, never for a single moment entered into the head of his hon. and gallant Friend. But the 6,000,000 of dollars paid for the ransom of Canton was as much prize money, as if our men had stormed the town, and seized as much property. In addition to that, other transactions took place, such as at Chusan, Amoy, &c., by which large amounts of property came into our possession, of some of which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had given no account, and much of which was given back to the Chinese, in order to enable them to pay the 21,000,000 of dollars which were to go into the Treasury. Why was not all this property taken into the account by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, to see whether it would not amount to a larger sum than the 420,000*l.*, which the right hon. Gentleman contended exceeded the value of the prizes taken? If this was to be the course to be in future pursued by the Government, he would recommend that the Admiralty, whenever it became requisite to equip another armament, should send down orders to their officers not to deceive the men, not to put into their placards that the men were to be sent to this or that place to get prize money, but to tell them honestly and plainly that they were going to fight for their country, with a clear and perfect understanding that they were to have no prize money; but that Parliament, instead, was to take into consideration the services which they should render, and to reward them according to its pleasure. He would like to see if they would then be able to man their ships; he much feared that, in such a case, they would be compelled to have recourse to impressment.

Mr. J. A. Smith observed that there never had been a war in which a greater amount of property was exposed to British seamen; and never, perhaps, on a former occasion, had the force of discipline been manifested to a greater degree. With regard to these men, the course which the Government was now adopting was a most unwise course, as they did not hold out that reward for conduct of such a nature, which in true wisdom, and with a due regard to the interests of the country, they were bound to hold out. He was persuaded that, when, on similar occasions, vast amounts of property were exposed to plunder, the recollection of the decision of the Chancellor of the Exchequer would not be lost upon our seamen, as they would find that the most profitable course for them to pursue was not to respect the property thus put in their power, in obedience to the orders of their superiors, as they had done on the occasion now alluded to. He much regretted the course taken, in reference to this matter, by the Government.

Mr. Henry Berkeley said, as there appeared a great disinclination on the part of hon. Gentlemen opposite to open their lips on this debate, and as his hon. and gallant relative, by the rules of the House, on a Supply night, had no right of reply, he should venture to offer a few remarks. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, spoke under great uneasiness, and mingled his refusal to do justice to our seamen, with much praise of their merits. By his account, so that you gave them hard knocks and glory, pay or prize money was a matter of indifference to them. Now he differed with the right hon. Gentleman, and believed that English seamen were well described in the words of an old writer—they were men who preferred "solid pudding unto empty praise." The right hon. Gentleman was ready with his praise, but not with his pudding. But did not the past bear him (Mr. Berkeley) out in thus thinking? Look to the last American war. Who assisted in taking our frigates? British seamen in the pay of the enemy. He appealed to the gallant Admiral opposite (Sir G. Cockburn) for the fact. Who assisted to lower the flag of the Guerrière, the Macedonian, the Java? Who were found in the Chesapeake, Argus, and Essex, when captured? British seamen. And why? Because they found better pay, and more prize money in the American service than in the British. Let the House remember that 80,000 English seamen were now serving in the American mercantile and national navy. Was this a time to disgust those who remained in our service, by refusing them justice? What the nature of the service was on which they had been employed might be ascertained by the loss in one frigate, which was a fair average for the others. The Blonde had dead, or invalided, during the China expedition, 1,094 men, besides 84 killed and wounded; and the Chancellor of the Exchequer assured us, we had not been at war. He hoped the House would put aside precedent for justice: prudence dictated that course, and not run the risk of disgusting, by turning the cold shoulder upon a body of men who, in the event of a war, must be looked upon as the best bulwark of the British Empire.

Captain Pechell said, that in addition to the ordnance referred to by his hon. and gallant Friend, the Government had not accounted for the brass ordnance taken at China, and the ransom received in respect to Canton and other places in China. It was said by the Government, this Motion was an interference with the Royal prerogative. That was the way they were always met when the claims of the navy were advanced; but he contended that the question was not one for the Royal prerogative at all, but for the House of Commons. As to the batta, it was never understood that the seamen were to be paid in that manner—they expected to have their fair proportion of prize money, and very great dissatisfaction existed as to the way in which they had been treated. The Government were in possession of sufficient funds which had accrued from the services of the army and the navy, to do justice to both services. Then, again, was the large field which those services had opened to British commerce to be considered as nothing? He called upon the House to support the Motion of his hon. and gallant Friend.

Sir R. Peel trusted the House would be sensible of the great importance of the question at issue; and that, notwithstanding the appeal which had been made to them, they would not consider it their duty to interfere with the exercise of the prerogative of the Crown; and that, unless a case were satisfactorily and fully made out, they would not, by agreeing to the present Motion, hold out to the army and the navy that they were to look in future to the House of Commons, instead of the Crown, as the dispensers of favour and rewards for military services. There could be nothing more dangerous, or more replete with evil in its consequences, than for the House to interfere as a court of appeal from the Crown, as to those acts of favour and indulgence which it might think fit to show to the army and navy for great military services performed. Then, again, let the House recollect what was due from public men in regard to the public interest. It seemed to be thought the Government had no duty to perform to the country in the matter; that they had nothing to do in guarding the public purse. According to some of the arguments which had been advanced by the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite, it might be thought that the Members of the Government had appropriated the money received from China to their own private purposes; at all events, the argument of the hon. and gallant Gentleman went to this, that they should show the greatest liberality to every claimant who came forward, and take no care of the public interest. The hon. and gallant Gentleman said, be liberal to the army and navy; but all he could say, was, that if the commercial community were not to have more reason to complain than the army and navy, of being defrauded of a portion of the money they had a right to expect for the purpose of meeting their demands—their claims must be considered; and if their claims, and those of naval and military men, were to be liberally treated on the principles now advocated, all he could say was, that the House would set an example to the Crown which former Parliaments had not thought it prudent to set. Nothing could be more easy than for responsible Ministers to recommend the Crown to be liberal in these matters, and thus to gain popularity and favour. All their sympathies and prepossessions were naturally in favour of acceding to these demands; and nothing was so easy, if the House of Commons would support him, than for a Minister to be liberal in this way, and to concede claims of this nature, if he was sure, that in so doing, he would receive the support of those who were the guardians of the public purse. He did not deny that the House of Commons had a right, in some measure, to control the Crown, and to compel the Crown to be liberal under circumstances in which great liberality might be required; but it would be a most dangerous interference with the Royal prerogative, and would place the House of Commons in a most invidious position with respect to those services, of the value of which the Crown was then the natural and the constitutional judge. He repeated, that the House possessed the right to interfere; but, before they did interfere, they must ask, had the Crown so acted as to make interference necessary? The question, then, for them to consider was, had the Crown acted in this matter with that indulgence and justice to those two great branches of the public service of this country—the army and the navy—which they had a right to expect on account of their gallant exertions and good conduct in the Chinese war? With regard to those exertions there could be no doubt. He admitted at once, and no one could estimate higher than he did, the important and gallant services of the commanders of that expedition, and the resolution, the determined valour, and the exemplary forbearance of the troops engaged. He did not, therefore, place his opposition to the Motion of the hon. and gallant Officer on the ground of denying the distinguished services of that portion of the army and navy which had been engaged in the military operations in China. With regard to the character of the war, whether there had been a formal declaration of war or not, it could not be denied that the service in China was of a very peculiar nature. When we entered upon a course of hostilities with China, we felt that we were in the position of a most powerful country coming into hostile contact with another far less advanced in civilization, and of far less experience in military proceedings. All the instructions given by the noble Lord opposite to the conductors of the expedition were founded on that admission of the inferiority of our opponents. We had no wish, in carrying on the war, to take that advantage of China which we should have taken of a more powerful and a more civilized country, under similar circumstances. The instructions, therefore, which were given to the officers commanding the expedition were, "Try to make an impression on the Chinese—by the occupation of a portion of their territory if you will—but conduct the war upon novel principles (he admitted they were, and even after hostilities had broken out), suffer the commercial marine of the enemy to go unmolested—take the war junks and destroy them; but in order to make a favourable impression upon the Chinese, permit those merchant vessels which were the property of private persons, of Chinese merchants, to pass unmolested." The natural consequence of this course was, that the number of prizes was materially diminished. He would not deny that the state of our relations with China during those proceedings was that of war; but what had been the result of that war, conducted upon the principles he had described; and what were the objects for which it was undertaken? We were, in the first place, to recover a certain sum of money from the Chinese for injuries sustained by our merchants; we named a stipulated sum to be paid by the Chinese, part of which was to be applied to the payment of those merchants whose opium had been seized, part to the payment of the Hong debts, and another part was to be applied to the defraying the charges connected with the expedition. 6,000,000 dollars was the sum required to compensate the opium merchants; 3,000,000 on account of the Hong debts, and the remainder was to go to pay the expenses of the war. That was the understanding of the noble Lord (Palmerston). Now, he apprehended, when they had paid all these charges, so far from having any surplus—and if there had been any surplus after paying all these expenses, there might be some force in the present demand—but after payment of these expenses, he apprehended, that, instead of a surplus, there would be a great deficiency, notwithstanding that we had recovered a large sum from the Chinese as ransom for Canton. But suppose there had been a declaration of war, and all the formalities had been gone through; suppose there had been a proclamation of prizes, and an Act of Parliament passed appropriating those prizes; supposing this had been the case, still, was there any ground for saying that the claims to prize money on the part of the army and navy engaged in that war had been defeated by the Government? 117,000*l.* was the total amount of prizes that had been realized. [Sir C. Napier: But the merchant vessels?] They were given up in accordance with the principles upon which the war was originally commenced and afterwards conducted; but the hon. and gallant Officer took into his account the ransom for Canton: that had never been considered as prize money, nor was it usual so to appropriate money obtained under such circumstances. In the case of the Spanish galleons, which had been referred to by the hon. and gallant Officer, one-eighth only had been appropriated as prize money. In the present case, the whole amount realized in the shape of prizes was, as he had said, 117,000*l.* Now, what was the amount which had been awarded? The Government had awarded to the naval and military force engaged 420,000*l.*, not as prize money, he granted, but in the shape of batta. It might be true, that by such an appropriation one might suffer and another might gain; but it was considered by the authorities on the spot that as the operations were Indian, the distribution of the money, 420,000*l.*, to be appropriated as rewards, should be on the principle adopted in India—namely, by batta allowance, rather than on the principle of prize money. The Government could have no interest in allotting the money as batta, instead of as prize money. A reference had been made to the proportion which had, in this case, been awarded to the Commander-in-Chief and the principal officers of the expedition, in comparison with what had been given in former operations of a like character. He believed, that on previous occasions the principal officers had received a larger proportion than on this. His right hon. Friend had stated, that in respect to Algiers, a most severe battle, as all would admit, the sum of 100,000*l.* had been granted by the liberality of the Government, to be distributed as rewards amongst the force engaged; in regard to the battle of Navarino 60,000*l.* had been allowed; and 60,000*l.* had also been awarded in the case of the Syrian war. But he asked, was the House now prepared, departing from its proper functions, to act as a court of appeal against the liberality of the Crown in the exercise of its prerogative? Whatever the prevailing opinion of hon. Gentleman might be as to the merits of this particular case, he would appeal to them, whether they thought it was right or prudent to set the precedent of teaching the army and navy to look to the House of Commons for rewards and indulgences for services performed, instead of to the Crown? How easy it would be to say that the value of any particular service depended upon its merits, and not upon the amount of prizes obtained, and how easy it would be to call on the House of Commons to vote on every occasion, where no prizes were taken, a sum of money by way of largess to the troops engaged! But was it not the Crown which should judge of what was a fair return for the service performed? He repeated, he hoped the House would not think this a case in which it would be proper to interfere with the legitimate and constitutional functions of the Crown, and to intimate to the Government that they had no duty to perform in protecting the public interest. And if, as he contended, there was no want of liberality in the present case, he trusted the House would not discourage the Government in their attempt to reconcile a due liberality to the two branches of the service of this country — the army and the navy, with what was due to the interest of the public. Above all, he would say, it would be most dangerous for a popular assembly, like the House of Commons, to constitute itself the judge of military service.

Mr. Williams thought the statement of the hon. and gallant Officer (Captain Berkeley) had been completely answered by the right hon. Gentleman; and if the Motion was pressed to a division, he thought those hon. Gentlemen in the House connected with the Navy would act most unadvisedly, and he must oppose them.

Viscount Palmerston was disposed to concur in principle generally with what had been stated by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the right hon. Baronet the First Lord of the Treasury, that the House of Commons should be careful and sparing in its interference with that part of the prerogative of the Crown which had reference to the rewards to be given for military and naval services. He argued that the army and navy ought to be taught to look to the Crown for rewards; and, as a general rule, it was most inexpedient for that House to interpose. At the same time the Motion of his hon. and gallant Friend was not altogether without example. In the case of the battle of Navarino, the House did interpose repeatedly, and at length the advice of the House prevailed with the Crown; and that payment was made which the Government had, for a long time, thought it their duty to withhold. And he thought the present was a case in which his hon. and gallant Friend was justified in urging the House to express an opinion that the Government ought to reconsider the decision it had come to. The right hon. Baronet stated correctly, that official men were naturally inclined to take the most liberal view of claims of this nature. Their personal feelings in the first place would lead them to look favourably upon them; but considerations of revenue, and considerations connected with the supplies, when the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the First Lord of the Treasury came to look at the expenses of the country on the one hand, and its income on the other, counterbalancing feelings of duty arose in their minds; and after all, it was a question dependent on duty rather than feeling, which would overrule those first impulses and those natural feelings to take the most liberal view of such demands. And if he thought that in this instance the Government had not extended its liberality to that extent which the just claims of the two services required, and their brave and brilliant achievements would justify, he did not impute to them any intention to overlook the just claims of those services; but in taking a less liberal view than he could have wished, they had, he believed, acted under the influence of what they considered their paramount duty, and upon the judgment they had formed upon the merits of the case. It was all very well to say, that soldiers and sailors were men who, in entering the service, were actuated by high and patriotic feelings only; and whose whole object was the honour and advantage of the country. No doubt those motives did influence them, and that those were the feelings with which many enlisted in the service of their country; but, at the same time, it could not be denied, that the expectation of prize money added a zest to the service, and gave an impulse to the soldier or the sailor when the day arrived for exertion, which it would be most unwise to withdraw from the mass of motives which influenced the conduct of men. And there was something of a wild, romantic nature in the very name of prize money, which rendered a small sum so obtained far more gratifying to the man who gained it, than a much larger amount received in the way of mere ordinary pay. Then it must not be forgotten that there were services which both soldiers and sailors were called upon to perform—perhaps the most difficult, the most hazardous, and the most dangerous —services full of continued exertion and painful endurance, for which no reward, no prize money was given. Take, for instance, the sufferings of the troops in Affghanistan; but neither the soldiers in that expedition, nor sailors engaged in a corresponding case at sea, would ever complain that the reward of prize money was not to be looked for by them, for they knew that by the established regulations of the service, no expectation of such reward was held out to them, and therefore no feeling of injustice was felt. But, on the other hand, when they were in a situation in which, according to the established rules of the service, they might expect some such advantage, if they did not receive it, they considered, and most materially so, that they had fair ground of complaint. Now the question was, did that fair ground of complaint arise in this case? Strictly and legally speaking, there could be no capture made before war was declared; but, as had been decided by Sir W. Scott, in the case of the Danish claims, that when, in a case of hostilities, a declaration of war followed, it gave the right of prize money for captures made before. He was not aware whether any declaration of war had been issued in the present case or not; but that was not the question. The Crown had waived the ground of right, and had granted the remuneration. But what was the nature of that remuneration? The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that the payment of batta was chosen as the mode of reward, instead of prize money; that part of the force engaged belonged to the India Company; and that batta, and not prize money, was the usual mode in which the troops of that Company were rewarded. He doubted if in this the right hon. Gentleman was altogether correct. He had been informed by persons who had been engaged in the Indian service, that it had been customary to give to those soldiers batta and prize money too, and that in the case of Lord Harris's exploits, and also in the war under Lord Hastings, the troops of the India establishment received both pay and batta. The question, then, was not as the Chancellor of the Exchequer had put it, that batta having been paid, nothing more was due; but it was, why was not prize money given as well as batta in this case? In point of amount, comparing it with the nature of the service, its duration, and the importance of its results, the amount which had been paid in this case was not so great as had been awarded on previous occasions. If he was rightly informed, he believed that a petty officer, who had served in China during the three years over which that expedition extended, received 16*l.*; whereas the same class of officers engaged in the expedition against Algiers, received about 17*l.*; and the reward paid to officers of the same rank, who had been engaged in the short Syrian campaign, was 18*l.* But, then, it was said that there was no other fund from which the money could be taken. Now that was not putting the matter quite correctly. The right hon. Baronet had stated very truly, that the orders given to the naval and military commanders before the operations begun, were to abstain in a very signal degree from inflicting the calamities of war on the population of the country. In fact, it was our anxious object, that whereas peace and friendship with the people of China was our ultimate desire, that nothing should be done unnecessarily, in the course of the war, to stir up hostile feelings among the population at large. But the right hon. Baronet was mistaken in supposing that orders were given in the outset of the operation to abstain from taking the junks. On the contrary the seizure and detention of these vessels was one of the modes of reprisal which was to be resorted to, and one of the modes by which it was proposed to exercise a pressure upon the Chinese Government. Our officers then received instructions to blockade the coasts, and to seize upon coasting vessels. The last portion of these instructions was not carried out, for a reason which might sound insufficient, but was not so in reality. It was not that there were not junks to be found: quite the contrary. But the fact was, that the Admiral stated that they were so numerous, that if he began to take them, he had no means of doing anything with them; that to put crews on board of them would entirely unman our squadron; that to keep them at Chusan would be useless, and to try to send them to India or Singapore would be still worse. The plan of capture of the junks was, therefore, given up. But, even were it otherwise—if Government, as a matter of policy, had ordered the force to abstain from these captures—that would be no reason why the troops and the seamen employed should receive a less amount of prize money than they would otherwise be entitled to. But, then, it was said that was no fund from which to pay any increased amount of prize money. The demands upon the Chinese, as the right hon. Gentleman had said, were made in a threefold shape. We demanded money, first, as compensation for the opium seized; secondly, to pay the debts of the Hong merchants; and, thirdly, to cover the expenses of the war. That was all quite true; for if the Government would look back to the instructions given, they would see that our Plenipotentiary was ordered to demand the sum required, in the following manner: — First, the value of the opium, to be ascertained by subsequent investigations; secondly, the debts of the Hong merchants, which were then known and ascertained; and, thirdly, the expenses of the war, which were to be ascertained, and accounts sent in to the Chinese Government after the affair was over, and the Treaty of Peace was signed. These were the instructions; but the last time that he saw Sir Henry Pottinger before he set out—on the very morning, indeed, that he left London—Sir Henry suggested to him that there might be some advantage (supposing that the Chinese acquiesced in the principle of our demands) were he authorized to treat for the payment of the whole in one round sum. "I said (continued the noble Lord) that may certainly be an advantage; how much do you think now, we may be able to get? 'Why,' said Sir Henry, 'the Emperor is a rich old gentleman enough, and I fancy we might look for five millions sterling from him—do you think that would do?' Well, I thought the matter over for a moment, and then I said, 'I think that will do very well if we can get it—it will probably pay for the opium, for the Hong merchants debts, and the expenses of the war.'" That was when Sir H. Pottinger left England; but the war did not conclude so soon as was then anticipated. The expenses were, of course, great in proportion, and the sum actually obtained fell short of what was required to meet the expenditure for which we had become liable. Certain communications then passed between the Government and the Plenipotentiary as to the sums which might be sufficient, and if it was deemed expedient to accept from the Chinese Government a sum which fell short of the full amount which might be demanded to include the expenses of the war. That was an act of political expediency, which formed no sort of answer to the demand made in the Motion now before the House. The ransom paid for Canton would have been considered, had the declaration of war followed, as prize money; and this circumstance ought not to be left out of the reckoning in discussing the present question. It had been said that 450,000*l.* was a large sum. Abstractedly it was so, perhaps; but sums were large or small in proportion to the objects for which they were paid; and if the sum in question was not sufficient to give to the troops and naval force employed that which would be a fair reward for their successes and achievements, then he maintained that it was not the aggregate sum which they must consider, but the amount per man that that sum would afford to pay. That the operations in China constituted a series of remarkable exploits would be admitted by everybody. He believed that Lord Stanley wrote a letter to the commander-in-chief of the expedition, in June, 1843, in which he stated that it was the determination of Government to cause a medal to be struck in commemoration of these services. In that document his Lordship expressed himself nearly as follows. He stated—

"That, although Her Majesty was of opinion that the award of a distinction of this nature should be reserved for very peculiar and special occasions—as, no doubt, it ought to be—and that great evil would arise from the frequent and indiscriminate granting of medals, in order to commemorate military and naval exploits, yet that it appeared to Her Majesty that, in the instance of the recent events in China, an exception could properly and usefully be made from the rule to be generally observed. The difficulties with which our forces had to contend on the recent expedition—difficulties arising from the absence of that local information which would have been accessible in respect to almost every other country—had been of the most formidable character; but they had been as gallantly met and triumphantly surmounted. Wherever opportunities had offered—and they were not wanting—for displays of skill and courage, our naval and military forces had nobly kept up the character of their respective services; and Her Majesty was happy in the belief that the great moral effect which had been produced upon the Chinese people, and to which Her Majesty principally looked for permanent advantages, had resulted not more from the irresistible power displayed, than from the moderation shown in victory, and the studious abstinence from unnecessary aggravation of the horrors of war; the discipline which prevailed during the excitement of success, and the good faith with which, on the first intimation of acquiescence in our demands, the invading forces had been withdrawn. Under these circumstances, Her Majesty was of opinion that the Chinese war, and its important results, should be commemorated by the issue of a medal, to be granted to those whose skill and valour had brought about its termination."

If, then, this war was so remarkable by the circumstances under which it was conducted, and if it had led to commercial advantages, so great that no man could trust himself beforehand to calculate them, he thought that it was an occasion on which Government would be justified in taking a more liberal view of the claims now submitted to them, than under the different circumstances they would be inclined to apply to similar demands. He thought that the Government had not, on this occasion, given way so much as they might to that spontaneous impulse which, the right hon. Baronet stated, was apt to animate a Ministry upon such questions. He could only hope that, whether Government would, or would not, refuse the Motion of his hon. and gallant Friend, that no course which they might take, that no majority which they might command, would prevent them from giving these matters a fair and liberal consideration; and should it be found, on a comparison of what had been done in similar cases with what had been done in this, that the scale of recompense to the naval and military forces had been lowered from its old standard, then, he hoped, that nothing which had passed would be taken to pledge Government so as to preclude them from giving the united service a more ample reward.

Captain Harris had no doubt the soldiers and sailors who had been engaged in China would perform their duty in the same manner that they had done if they were called on to do so. But he certainly did not think the batta donation was a fair reward; 210,000*l.* had been distributed to the navy; but in such a way that only 4*l.* was paid to the petty officers. That was not a fair remuneration. He would not say what sum ought to be given; but he hoped that Government would increase the grant, and give such a sum as seemed fair under the circumstances.

Captain Plumridge thought that the appeal made by his hon. and gallant Friend was to the justice, not to the liberality, of the House. The shares awarded to petty officers were no payment for the services they had performed, and the dangers they had undergone. He contended that the petty officers had a right to a larger share of the prize money that the common sailors and boys. It was all very well to talk about honour and glory to seamen, but prize money was the great stimulus to which they always had and always would look.

Sir James Duke deplored the tone in which the discussion had been carried on on one side of the House, and deprecated the mercenary spirit so frequently during the debate attributed, but he believed upon no good grounds, to the seamen of the British Navy.

The House divided on the Question, that the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question:—Ayes 69; Noes 27: Majority 42.

IRISH ECCLESIASTICAL COMMISSION.] On the Motion that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair,

Mr. Evelyn Denison rose to call the attention of the House to the management and disposal of that part of the property of the Irish Church vested in the hands of the Irish Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The hon. Gentleman commenced by stating that the Irish Ecclesiastical Commission had received upwards of 450,000*l.*, as the produce of lands sold under their direction in Ireland. He had taken some pains to ascertain the average value of land in that country. In England it was worth about thirty years' purchase; but in Ireland, taking one year with another, he thought that he was within the mark in stating that the land there was worth at an average above twenty-three years' purchase. Notwithstanding this, however, the land under the charge of the Commission had none of it been sold at a higher rate than twenty years' purchase. Now, if land worth twenty-three years' purchase had been sold for twenty, it would appear that a much larger sum than 450,000*l.* ought to have been realized by the Commission, had they properly exercised their functions. It was impossible to look into the subject without seeing that property, to a very large amount, had been sacrificed by this system of management. It would perhaps, be asked, how if such terms had been offered to the lessees, had not all the Church property held in Ireland been converted into freehold property, and so enfranchised? The reason was this: at the end of the Temporalities Bill was a clause permitting all persons whose property fell into the hands of the Commissioners, to renew their leases on the same terms as those on which they had been in the habit of renewing them under the bishops. The consequence was, that when a lessee thought that he had made a good bargain in enfranchising his land, his neighbour would probably tell him that he might have obtained the same advantages without the three years' purchase, as by the Bill a power was guaranteed of obtaining the renewal of leases, and without those chances and contingencies under which they were held under the former tenure. Now, he wished to know what had become of the money sacrificed to this system of management pursued by the Commission? Every farthing was gone in the annual outgoings. When he saw such an amount gone in such a way, he thought he should not discharge his duty, if he did not call on the House to check this great and growing evil.

Sir T. Fremantle was not prepared to dispute in the main the statement made by the hon. Gentleman; but he must state at the outset that the attention of the Government had, for some time, been directed to this subject, and that, at the suggestion of his right hon. Friend the Secretary for the Home Department, an official communication had been made by the Lord Lieutenant to the Ecclesiastical Board, calling their attention to the circumstance of the money realized under the Commission not being devoted to the annual expenditure. It must be borne in mind that these Commissioners were an independent corporation, over which the Government had no direct control; and they must judge for themselves as to the manner of exercising those powers entrusted to them by Act of Parliament. The two points to which the hon. Gentleman had called attention were the terms on which the leases had been converted into perpetuities, and the mode in which the money realized had been expended. Now, a large number of the tenants holding Church leases had not converted them into perpetuities. Only one-third, and no more, had availed themselves of the terms offered. He believed that in the suppressed sees the fines were fixed on the renewal of the leases. That power did not exist as to the sees not suppressed. As to the manner in which the money had been expended, he was not prepared to say that if greater economy was used, a considerable sum might not have been saved. But, at the same time, he must point out the heavy charges which the Commission had to meet. There was, in the first place, the repair and rebuilding of all the churches in Ireland; and no doubt when the trust was first undertaken the churches were in a dilapidated state. A heavy expenditure was therefore incurred in repairing old churches and building new ones; and the Commissioners had often to determine, when local contributions in favour of such an object were large, whether it would not be better to advance a somewhat larger sum for the erection of new churches, than to expend a smaller amount in inadequate repairs of old churches. Under this head the sums expended were 69,000*l.* and 54,000*l.* some years, and even 26,000*l.* last year.

For the requisites of divine service the sum laid out was 32,000*l.* The expenses of the Board itself were 6,000*l.*, and the whole expenditure was about 79,000*l.* per annum. The Archbishop of Dublin told him that there were applications for churches to the amount of 100,000*l.*, which the Board was unable to answer. He did not undertake to say that this statement was perfectly satisfactory; and he did not at all deprecate the attention of the Government being called to the subject. He hoped when a larger revenue accrued that the expenditure would be kept within the income, and that the amount realized by the sale of perpetuities would be devoted to the annual expenditure, and not wholly disbursed.

Mr. Hawes must say the statement of the right hon. Gentleman was anything but satisfactory. Here was a sum of 450,000*l.* realized by the conversion of leases into perpetuities, and they were told the whole capital was expended already. The people of England had a direct interest in this question; for he did not see why, if this property were properly managed, it might not have been devoted to such a purpose as that of increasing the College of Maynooth. The right hon. Gentleman said the expenses of the Commission were 6,000*l.* He found by a return on the Table they were double that amount. When Lord Stanley's Act had led to consequences so pernicious, he did not see why the Government did not immediately take steps to amend it. The Government acknowledged the mode of applying the money to be unwise, and yet they permitted half a million of money to be wasted. It was said, however, that this body was a corporation, and the Government could not interfere with it. But Parliament, which created the body, could surely remedy the evils which it caused. If there was a loss of 500,000*l.* on a third of these conversions, it was easy to calculate that a million and a half would be lost on the remainder. He called on the friends of the Church to see this subject sifted, and he put it to the Secretary for the Home Department, whether he could have any objection to appoint a Committee to inquire into this subject?

Sir James Graham acknowledged this was a very grave subject, and by no means improperly brought under the consideration of the House. It was a question which attracted his anxious attention, and nearly a year ago he thought it necessary to call the attention of the Lord Lieutenant to the facts disclosed. He differed from the hon. Gentleman as to his estimate of the inadequacy of the sales arising from the conversion of church leases. It being the object (for purposes of general policy) to render those conversions general within a limited time, it was of course desirable to hold out inducements to the tenants to come into the terms of the Commissioners. He believed, after careful and anxious inquiry, that the terms were only liberal and fair. Having stated that he concurred in the other view of the hon. Gentleman, that the expenditure of the capital, instead of considering the sum realized as an usufruct, was, though in conformity with the Act of Parliament, an unfortunate view taken by the Commissioners of their duties as trustees. He considered that this money was, in the broadest sense, trust money, and he demurred altogether to its being devoted to Maynooth, or perverted in any way from the original use. [Mr. Hawes: But the Church has not got the money.] It must be recollected that when the Church Temporalities Act passed, a heavy burden was raised by a vestry cess on persons of every persuasion, for the maintenance of the fabric of the Church and the usages of worship. That was felt to be a great grievance; and, with the view of promoting peace and concord, a sum of 50,000*l.* a year was cast on the property of the Church of Ireland. In consequence of the opposition to such a charge, the fabrics of the Church had, in many instances, fallen into decay. And the average expenditure of the Commissioners for the first years of its operation was much higher than it would be in future. In many cases, too, the claims put forward by private subscribers for aid, were felt to be irresistible, and such advances were, of course, made out of the funds of the Church. Out of a loan also of 100,000*l.* 40,000*l.* had been repaid. But, on the whole, he considered it an unsound and unwise discretion—that for the interest of the Church, well understood and carefully guarded, the capital realized by the sale of these leases should be expended. There were on the Board two paid Commissioners. The Executive had, therefore, a direct control over it. And he was bound to state that the official communication of the Lord Lieutenant was received by the Commissioners in a most frank and candid spirit. They stated that the amount of capital expended in the last year was less than that in the antecedent; and he had reason to believe that in future years the expenditure of income, without any entrenchment on the capital, would be strictly adhered to. He was bound to say that if he saw the safety of the Church property in Ireland required it, he should not hesitate, for a moment, in introducing a Bill next Session on the subject of these leases; but he did not anticipate that any such necessity would arise. Whatever past errors were committed, he believed they were in the progress of correction.

Sir R. Ferguson was very glad to hear the speech of the right hon. Gentleman; for he considered the Government clearly responsible for every proceeding of that Board. He thought not a full but a sufficient price had been obtained for the lands under lease. His hon. Friend (Mr. Denison) contended they were worth twenty-three years' purchase; but his hon. Friend spoke of lands where a rent was reserved of one-fourth of the value, and this always fetched a higher price than that held in fee-simple. There were returns in the value of these lands, one by Mr. Finley, and the other by the Commissioners themselves, on the Table of the House. The first estimated them at 1,500,000*l.*, and the latter at 1,250,000*l.* Now, according to the Commissioners themselves, they should have fetched 200,000*l.* more than the 450,000*l.* which the right hon. Gentleman gave as the return. The right hon. Gentleman said, only a third of the tenants had accepted the perpetuities. Now, he knew one-half the property was sold, and he should give his authority. The landed Commissioners summoned the treasurer of the Ecclesiastical Commission, and he deposed that fully one-half were sold. The right hon. Gentleman said, too, that the expenses of the Commission were but 6,000*l.* He could prove, however, that the sum for clerks, architects, solicitors, &c., amounted up to 13,587*l.* The expenditure was very great, not to say anything worse of the Board. They at first paid their architects by a per centage on the outlay for their works, and this sometimes amounted to 9 per cent. They were now placed on salaries. But this only showed how necessary it was to look into the proceedings of this body. He did not want to throw blame on the Government, for previous Governments were more to blame than the present; but it really seemed as if the office of Lord Lieutenant only existed as a cover for a horrible system of jobbing.

Mr. Henley must say, the disclosures made startled him not a little. It appeared while parties in this country were quarrelling as to the application of the surplus revenue of the Church in Ireland, some gentlemen in that country took very good care that no surplus should exist. The matter was one with which that (the Ministerial) side of the House had nothing to do, for it originated with the Government of the hon. Gentlemen opposite. He did hope, that there would be some strong steps taken to put the question on an honest footing.

Viscount Bernard fully concurred in what had fallen from the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for the Home Department. Without entering into the question whether the different contractors might not have done their work cheaper, he would beg leave to say that there was full employment in Ireland, in the repairs of churches, for the 400,000*l.* that it appeared had been expended by these Commissioners. His principal object in rising was to remark that there was still a considerable number of parochial churches in Ireland in a most disgraceful state. In one diocese alone divine service was celebrated in no less than fifty school-houses, in localities where churches did not exist. In a case which had come under his own knowledge, the Ecclesiastical Commissioners were called upon to build a church in a place where divine service had not been before performed, and where no Protestant congregation existed. They declined doing so, and a church was now in course of being built there by voluntary contributions. The consequence was, that a Protestant congregation was now formed in the parish, and divine service would, in future, be celebrated without any aid from the Commissioners. He wished also to remind the House that 100,000*l.* given by the late Government as a part of the 1,000,000*l.* advanced to the clergy of the Irish Church, had been since taken away from them.

Mr. M. J. O'Connell said, he thought the discussion which had taken place on the question a very important one. They had very strong contradictions between two right hon. Secretaries—one, the right hon. Baronet the Chief Secretary for Ireland, having stated that the Ecclesiastical Commissioners were independent of the Government—and the other, the right hon. Baronet the Home Secretary having alleged that they were completely under the control of the Government. However, it appeared that the right hon. Chief Secretary of Ireland was right; for the right hon. Baronet (Sir James Graham) had admitted that he had called attention to the matter nine months ago without effect. There appeared to be great discrepancies as to the value of the property sold; but one thing, he thought, was clear, and that was, that the subject could not be left as it stood at present. He would beg to suggest to the hon. Member for Malton (Mr. J. E. Denison), the propriety of his moving for the appointment of a Committee next Session to investigate the matter. In his opinion, there was no use in going into the question of the establishment of this Board. But finding it established, and that it worked badly, they had a right—no matter what opinions they might entertain as to church property in Ireland—to call for inquiry, and, if necessary, for further legislative provisions.

Sir Thomas Fremantle begged to explain. It was a mistake to suppose that he was at all indifferent on the subject. He had already taken occasion to express his satisfaction that the question had been brought under the notice of the House, and he was fully sensible of the great importance which was to be attached to it.

Mr. Grogan said, he was glad that an investigation was likely to take place on the question; as he believed the Board had not given entire satisfaction either to the clergy or the public. He would mention one instance, which had come under his own notice. It was the case of a parish church in Dublin, which had been taken down as being unsafe. The parishioners had, it was true, consented to the removal of the church; but it was on the supposition that it would be rebuilt. Repeated applications had been made to the Commissioners to rebuild it, but without success, as they persisted in declaring they had no funds for the purpose.

SUPPLY—MISCELLANEOUS ESTIMATES.] House went into Committee of Supply on the Miscellaneous Estimates and Civil Contingencies.

On the First Vote being moved, of 32,011*l.* 10*s.* to defray law charges, and the salaries, allowances, and incidental expenses in the office of the Solicitor for the affairs of Her Majesty's Treasury for the year 1845-6,

Mr. W. Williams wished to know from the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether there was really any necessity for having seven lawyers in this department. They had a solicitor, an assistant solicitor, and five clerks, all of whom, he presumed, were lawyers, and the salaries of these officers amounted to no less than 6,011*l.* 10*s.* He also perceived that the estimated cost of prosecutions was put down as 26,000*l.*, and he thought the House should not vote such a sum without being at least apprized of what these prosecutions were.

Mr. Cardwell said, the Solicitor for the Treasury had to discharge the business of no less than thirteen departments of the public service. The gentleman who at present filled that situation, was a most invaluable public officer; and by all who were acquainted with the manner in which he discharged his duties, the amount of salary which he received—2,850*l.*—would, he was convinced, not be thought too great. Arrangements had, however, been made, by which, on any future occasion, the gentleman selected to fill that office would not receive more than 2,000*l.* a year. The prosecutions were such as would be necessary in the thirteen departments to which he had alluded; but on this subject the hon. Gentleman might rest assured that the greatest economy would be practised.

Vote agreed to.

The next Vote was 16,218*l.* to defray the expenses of the Pentonville Prison.

Mr. W. Williams said there were 475 prisoners in this prison, and the salaries of the officers placed over that number of prisoners amounted to no less than 7,558*l.*, being an average of 16*l.* for taking care of each prisoner. In addition to that sum there was a cost of 31*l.* for each prisoner. Now, it had been shown by the Anti-Corn-law League that the wages of an agricultural labourer in the southern counties was, on an average, not more than 7*s.* a week, or 18*l.* 4*s.* a year, so that the cost of one condemned felon was more than the amount of the entire support of two families of the labouring population. The salaries of the persons employed to teach the prisoners trades and manufactures amounted to 1,500*l.*; while the entire produce of their labour amounted to only 1,498*l.*, or 12*l.* less than the salaries amounted to. Thus, notwithstanding all that had been said in praise of this labour system, the result was, that the produce of each prisoner's work was less than 1½*d.*

a day. He also objected to the item of 360*l.* for washing in the prison, as he thought the prisoners ought, at least, be made to keep the prison clean.

Colonel Sibthorp said, he did not know what the hon. gentleman paid his labourers, but he could assure him that he (Colonel Sibthorp) and hon. Friends near him paid their labourers from 12*s.* to 15*s.* a week.

Mr. Hindley would wish to know how many officers were in the prison, and what salaries were paid to them.

Sir J. Graham said, that the hon. Member for Coventry was rather a hard task-master. Last year he complained in like manner of the annual expense of this establishment, when the grant amounted to 20,364*l.* In 1843, it was 25,850*l.* This year it was 16,218*l.*, showing a decrease on last year of 4,146*l.*, and on the previous year of 9,632*l.*; without any diminution, he should rather say, there was an increase in the number of prisoners. Viewing the system abstractedly, he admitted that it could not be regarded as economical, although he could assure the hon. Member that every attention was paid to economy in the arrangements of the prison. All the prisoners confined in the establishment were convicts under sentence of transportation for a period of not less than 7, and in many cases 10 and 14 years. Unless the system of this establishment proved successful, it would be the duty of the State to maintain those prisoners in a penal Colony, for the period of their sentence. If successful, if by the discipline to which the prisoners were subjected, a reform were effected in their character and habits at the expiration of eighteen months, that being the time for which they were here imprisoned, they might be said to be no longer a source of expense to the State, because, from the moment of their arrival in the penal Colony, the State was relieved from the cost of supporting them. As far as the experiment had gone, it had proved eminently successful. He admitted that the system of prison discipline was not in itself economical; but if he were right in the position he had just attempted to establish, it eventually proved so to the nation; because the comparatively trifling expense attendant upon the instruction they received during the short term of their imprisonment here, superseded the necessity of a very heavy expense during the prolonged period of their transportation. The right hon. Baronet read an extract from the Report of the Commissioners, recently presented to Parliament, to show that the experiment of training the prisoners to the higher branches of labour, by which they might be enabled to earn an honest livelihood in another country, and the attention paid to the improvement of their morals in the Pentonville establishment, had been attended with success. In reply to the hon. Member for Ashton-under-Line, he wished to say that he believed the Paper containing a return of the number of the instructors, which was considerable, and of their salaries, was ready, and could be presented at once.

Mr. Ewart expressed his approbation of the system adopted in the Pentonville establishment; but regretted that it was not carried further, and applied to Van Diemen's Land, the system of which was quite at variance with this, and ought to be abolished.

Mr. Williams had heard the statement of the right hon. Baronet with great pleasure. He rejoiced at the success of the experiment, and the improvement it had effected in the habits of the prisoners; but he confessed, he doubted the policy of making those men tailors or shoemakers. What the Colony to which they were sent wanted was persons having some knowledge of agriculture or agricultural labour. Their services would prove much more valuable and important. With regard to the question he first started, he must observe that the right hon. Baronet had not at all accounted for the inability of the prisoners while in this establishment to earn more than three-halfpence a day.

Sir J. Graham said, it must be remembered the system of Pentonville prison was the system of complete separation, so that labour could not be carried on so as to meet the hon. Member's views.

Mr. Hindley asked what were the respective salaries of the chaplain and the medical officer.

Mr. Cardwell replied, that the chaplain received 400*l.* a year, the assistant chaplain 200*l.* a year, and the medical attendant 300*l.* a year.

Mr. Hindley considered such a charge to be monstrous. It was paying more than a pound a head for each prisoner.

Mr. Hawes said, that he had repeatedly visited the prison, and he knew that the duties of the chaplain were most laborious. It was utterly impossible to carry out the system without having such an officer as chaplain. He believed that the money for this purpose was most properly and beneficially laid out.

Mr. Wakley said, that the system of administration in that gaol could not be tried without a large expenditure of pounds, shillings, and pence. He had often been in this prison, and he believed that nothing could be better than the system existing there. In the first instance, he had viewed the foundation of the establishment with feelings of horror, and as being merely an instrument of torture; but the results had been most astonishing, and most gratifying. He had examined the prisoners themselves closely, and he had watched the proceedings, and he firmly believed that not one in fifty of the unfortunate inmates of the prison, when liberated, would again violate the laws of the country.

Vote agreed to.

On the Vote that 28,118*l.* be granted to defray the expenses of the Millbank Prison for the year 1845-46, being put,

Mr. W. Williams said, that he observed that in this Estimate, there was a charge of £200 a year each for three inspectors of the prison. This appeared to be a new species of appointment; he, therefore, wished to know what was the object of it?

Sir J. Graham observed, that this charge certainly appeared for the first time in the Estimates, but it was necessary, in consequence of new arrangements with respect to this prison. Complaints were formerly repeatedly made by several hon. Gentlemen as to the system of prison discipline carried on in this prison. He had considered it expedient to alter the whole system in this prison. By this new arrangement, every male and female convict, sentenced to transportation, was, as soon as possible, conveyed to Millbank, and there they remained for three months under the close inspection of these three officers. The persons appointed to these offices, were the three inspectors of prisons. One or other of these inspected the convicts in Millbank prison constantly, indeed almost daily. At the end of three months the inspectors, in their report to him, recommended the course which should be adopted as to the future destination of each convict. They selected a certain number for the Pentonville prison, where they would be taught a useful trade, which would be of essential service to them when removed to the Colonies; while others, who had been guilty of the most serious crimes, the commission of which was formerly attended with capital punishment, were selected to be sent to Norfolk Island. On the arrival of the former class at Van Diemen's Land, after having been taught a trade, there was a further gradation. Some of them received a conditional pardon, while others received ticket of leave, which was a gradation something short of pardon. With respect to every convict, there was a special report made to him, and on such report he, on his responsibility, provided accordingly. He need not allude to the high character of those three gentlemen, as they were well known. Their respective salaries, as inspectors of prisons, was only £800 a year; and as these additional duties had been imposed upon them, it was only considered proper that they should have an increase of £200 a year, making altogether £1000 a year.

Vote agreed to.

On the vote of 250,000*l.* to defray the charges of Convict Expenditure in New South Wales and Van Diemen's Land,

Mr. Ewart took occasion to object to the whole system of transportation at present adopted. He stated that the free settlers in Van Diemen's Land were extremely indignant at the letting loose amongst them of the most depraved characters. He understood that morality was no longer safe in that Colony, and that the free settlers were about petitioning Parliament against what the noble Lord the Secretary for the Colonies termed "the probationary system." He was of opinion that much more good might be effected than at present by substituting the Pentonville system for that of transportation, whilst he believed that the expense would not be so great.

Sir J. Graham could not deny that there were many serious moral objections to transporting felons into a Colony; but, taking the balance of good and evil, he thought it was far better that they should be transported, than be retained in the mother country. On the average, the number of prisoners convicted of felony in Great Britain, amounted annually to some 5,000. Pentonville would not contain above 600; besides, he could not think of recommending that the Pentonville system should be applied to the whole of these 5,000; he doubted, in fact, whether it could be properly applied to more than the present number out of the average number annually convicted.

Mr. Wakley trusted that some means of improving the minds and morals of prisoners would be adopted in the gaols of this country. He hoped that the right hon. baronet would propose some measure with reference to prison discipline generally, founded on the system pursued at Pentonville.

Vote agreed to.

On the Vote of 2,006*l.*, for defraying the salaries of certain professors at Oxford and Cambridge,

Mr. Wakley complained that a salary of only 100*l.* was appropriated from this Vote to the professors of Chemistry. He thought, considering the importance of that science in connexion with medicine, manufactures, and the arts, that all possible facilities should be afforded for its study.

Vote agreed to.

The next Vote was for 4,540*l.* to defray the expenses of the University of London.

Mr. Ewart said, with reference to the observations of the hon. Member for Finsbury, that he considered it most desirable for the interests of the country that the utmost encouragement should be given to the cultivation of the science of chemistry.

Mr. Warburton said, that during ten months in the year very good laboratory instruction in chemistry could be obtained in London. The laboratory in University College had recently been enlarged, and that institution could now receive thirty laboratory pupils. Hon. Gentlemen must not suppose that many of these laboratory pupils came from the agricultural districts; they came almost exclusively from the manufacturing districts.

Mr. Wakley expressed his desire that a national institution for affording instruction in chemistry should be established. He believed that during a recent visit of Professor Liebig to this country, the right hon. Baronet (Sir R. Peel) had had an interview with him, and that the professor had made some most startling statements with reference to this subject. Professor Liebig had told him that it was frightful to see the waste of capital in connexion with manufactures in this country, in consequence of our ignorance of chemistry. He hoped the right hon. Baronet would turn his attention to the matter, with a view to providing better means of instruction in the science.

Sir R. Peel said, he had had an interview with Professor Liebig on this subject, but he was not quite convinced of the policy of direct Government interference in such a matter. He was by no means satisfied that an institution for the express purpose of teaching chemistry would be so successful and efficient in this country as similar institutions had been abroad; but he thought, considering the splendid educational establishments which existed in this country and in Scotland, that it was the duty of those by whom such institutions were conducted, to make proper provision for the cultivation of that important science.

Vote agreed to.

House adjourned at a quarter to three o'clock.

PENINSULAR OFFICERS.] The Duke of Richmond said, in accordance with the Notice which he had given on Friday last, he begged leave to present a petition from the undecorated officers who had served in the Peninsular war, on the subject of decorations conferred on the army engaged in the late war; and praying that this House will interpose in behalf of the said officers, and bring their case to the notice of Her Most Gracious Majesty. The petition was drawn up in so proper and respectful a manner, that he felt the best course he could adopt would be to read a portion of it in the House. The noble Duke then read an extract from the petition, stating that the petitioners did not deem it necessary to trouble their Lordships' House with any details of the services in which they had been engaged, because the Thanks of Parliament had been repeatedly offered for these duties, and because self-adulation would ill become the character of British soldiers: That they threw themselves on the recommendation of their Lordships, with an earnest hope that the House would interpose in their behalf by drawing the favourable notice of the Sovereign to their case. He thought it was scarcely necessary for him to detain their Lordships at any length on the subject of that petition. He felt, however, that he ought to remind the House of the great importance which the operations in the Peninsular war were to the ultimate pacification of the world. There were many of their Lordships who might remember that period of the history of the country, when alarms prevailed throughout the greater part of the nation —when the walls of Parliament, night after night, re-echoed with melancholy forebodings that the British army would, before long, have to fall back on their ships for refuge, and be forced, probably at no distant day, to return to their native land defeated and disgraced. But, thanks to the transcendent talents and skill of his noble Friend (the Duke of Wellington), and the bravery and heroism of the troops who acted under him, the glory of the British arms was not only maintained, but the flag of England was planted on the soil of France. Every one would admit that the British soldiers did their duty during that period—not in one short campaign alone, but during a struggle, the duration of which extended for several years. Nor should it be forgotten that, throughout all that time, they were opposed by the veteran legions of Napoleon—by men who had been reared in the midst of war, and who were as intelligent as they were intrepid. He would not urge, in support of the claims of the petitioners, any fear that the English army would not hereafter do its duty. On the contrary, he believed their brave armies would ever be found ready to maintain the honour of their Sovereign and their country. He believed that the natural bravery of the soldier—the enthusiastic esprit du corps which he possessed—the feeling that, on his own personal exertions, as it were, might depend the fate of the day, would ever lead the British soldier to do his duty. He would not, therefore, put the case of the petitioners on this ground, but he asked what they required as a simple act of justice; for he could regard a debt of gratitude only as an act of justice, and in this light he was sure the country at large would also view it. He did not wish to impute blame to any individual in the country, still less to his noble Friend the noble Duke, for whom he ever did and ever would entertain the strongest feelings of attachment and regard. He sought not to attach blame to those who gave medals to the men who fought and conquered at Waterloo, and to those who conferred the honours that were bestowed on the soldiers who fought their battles in India and China; but this he would say, why should they not place those whom they saw covered with wounds received in the Peninsular campaigns, on the same footing with their brethren in arms? He felt that, in presenting this petition, he was but doing his duty to their Lordships in offering these remarks. He would not detain the House longer, because he felt it was unnecessary for him to recapitulate the heroic achievements of the great army to which he had been referring. He felt it to be a personal compliment to himself to have this petition entrusted to him for presentation, by gentlemen with whom he had become acquainted in early life, and for whom he necessarily felt a deep admiration, on account of their heroic deeds. In conclusion, he begged to present this petition from the veterans of the Peninsular war.

The Duke of Wellington: My Lords, the petitioners do me but justice in stating that I have never mentioned or referred to the war in the Peninsula excepting in terms of praise of their conduct. But, my Lords, it gives me the greatest concern to feel myself under the necessity of submitting to your Lordships, that your Lordships cannot regularly, and according to your usual practice, interfere in a question of this description. Some years have elapsed since these same petitioners made an application to me—if I recollect rightly in the year 1840—on the same subject which they have now brought under your Lordships' consideration. I then stated to them the relation in which I had stood both towards them and towards the Government during a considerable number of years. I stated to them that it had been my duty for several years to report their conduct, whether as an army, or as divisions of that army, in brigades or regiments, or as individuals belonging to the army, to the Government of the Crown, and to bring it thus under the knowledge of the Sovereign: but, my Lords, I stated that as to the rewards to the army, these were matters to which I could otherwise make no reference—that they were acts which were confined to the Sovereign, and to the advisers of the Sovereign—and that in this light I had never presumed to interfere in any manner, excepting when called upon to give my opinion, or to carry into execution the orders of the Sovereign to recommend persons for honourable marks of distinction. My Lords, I then recommended those Gentlemen to make their representation to the Sovereign through the proper channel. Since I received notice from my noble Friend of his intention to present this petition, I have inquired whether any such application has been since made; and I can not only find no trace of such application, but I cannot find any account of such an application having been ever made. I have heard, indeed, that a similar petition to that which my noble Friend has brought before your Lordships was presented by an hon. Gentleman in another place; and the present petition is addressed to your Lordships. But, I beg leave to submit to your Lordships, that the proper course for these petitioners to adopt is, to present their petition to the Sovereign, and not to come to the Houses of Parliament in order to require the interference of the Legislature in a matter which is strictly and exclusively the prerogative of the Sovereign. My Lords, I invariably, and I believe, in a satisfactory manner—at least I never heard a complaint on the subject—reported the services of the army, or of the individuals composing it, to the attention of the Sovereign. I have frequently received the order of the Sovereign to recommend officers of distinction for reward and promotion; and not only have I received such directions from the Sovereign of this country, but in repeated instances from the Allies of the Sovereign of this country; and I have submitted the names of officers to those Sovereigns, I hope in a manner satisfactory to those who were selected. The Sovereign of this country has been pleased to give his approbation and consent to the acceptance by those officers of the honours to which I have recommended them. But in no case whatever would I ever have interfered until I was called upon to give my judgment or recommendation and opinion on the subject. It is perfectly true, as the noble Duke on the cross benches (the Duke of Richmond) has stated, that marks of honour of a particular description have been conferred upon other armies, which have not been conferred on the armies serving in the Peninsula, however meritorious their services may have been. But, my Lords, have no marks of honour been conferred upon the armies of the Peninsula? Have no rewards been bestowed on those officers? What my noble Friend has stated is perfectly true, that the service in the Peninsula was not an expedition, but a war carried on for several years—for six consecutive campaigns, and some winter campaigns. Nearly the whole of the British army served in that war. Out of one hundred and odd battalions, of which the British military force consisted, there were about sixty which served in that army. My Lords, this and the other House of Parliament returned to that army their Thanks not less than sixteen different times, for as many different engagements; and new modes were discovered and adopted of distinguishing and rewarding the officers of that army. Medals were struck in commemoration of actions of gallantry and distinguished actions in the Peninsula upon no less than nineteen occasions; and these medals were distributed upon the rules and regulations laid down on the occasion to about 1,300 officers of the army. And will it be said that 1,300 officers is not a considerable number in any army to receive such marks of distinction, and this on nineteen different occasions? Then a new mode of promotion was adopted, for the first time, in the Peninsular army—I mean the issue of special brevets for extraordinary services; and a vast number of officers were promoted by these special brevets in this very army, whose services are now said to be unacknowledged. Subsequent to the war, upon various occasions, arrangements were made for the benefit of the whole army, cavalry, infantry, and artillery, recommended, not by me, nor have I the credit of them, but by the Duke of York, who commanded the army in chief up to the period of his death in 1826, and also by Lord Hill, who succeeded in command up to the year 1828. First of all, various allowances were made to all the different officers. In 1826, the officers holding brevet rank on full pay had the advantage of retiring upon the advanced half pay of the next rank above. Lieutenants serving on full pay whose commissions were dated prior to 1811, had the option of retiring upon the unattached rank of captain on half pay. By an Order in 1834, in every three vacancies upon the retired full and half pay, one promotion was granted in the ranks of captain, major, and lieutenant-colonel—all these arrangements being in favour of these officers. In 1835 a further arrangement was made in favour of captains promoted under the General Order of December 1826; and 20 lieutenant-colonels, 20 majors, and 115 captains received full pay instead of retired half pay. These were solid boons conferred upon those individuals by the public. Then I would beg your Lordships to remember that among your Lordships there are not less than seven officers who have been promoted to the peerage on account of their own services, or those of their fathers or grandfathers, in this very army. Not less than 400 of the different classes of the Order of the Bath were conferred on the officers who served in the Peninsular army. My Lords, it is perfectly true that the late Sovereign was pleased to confer a medal on the army that fought at the battle of Waterloo—upon every individual who was present on that occasion. This was an honour which had never before been conferred on any body of troops, and certainly not on the army that served in the Peninsula, although they had fought several great battles, and most undoubtedly their service was of a most important description during the six years that they were in the Peninsula. But, my Lords, I beg you to recollect that the battle of Waterloo was an occurrence of an extraordinary nature. A general peace had been made, after a war of a quarter of a century, in the year 1814. Circumstances occurred which rendered imminent the probability that the war would be recommenced, and great preparations were made on all sides. The greatest anxiety was felt, not only in this country, but throughout Europe, upon the breaking out of that war. That battle was fought, and its decision certainly gave, at the moment, every reason to believe that there was an end to all the operations of the war; and not a shot has been fired in Europe from that time to this, upon any occasion referable to the operations of that war. It was natural that the Government of this country should be desirous of testifying their approbation of the conduct of the army on that occasion; and it is true that the late Sovereign and his Government did order that medals should be struck to commemorate that great battle, which should be distributed to every officer and soldier, and should be worn under His Majesty's directions. My Lords, until lately this distinction was confined exclusively to that one affair, and was not conferred on any other army. Until events occurred recently in the East, this honour was not extended to any other army. I am not at all desirous of adverting particularly to the events which, a short time ago, happened in that quarter of the globe; but undoubtedly it is an historical fact that the greatest disaster which has happened in that part of the world for more than sixty years, occurred a few years ago in the north-eastern part of India. It was of the utmost importance to our tenure of the possessions which we had acquired—nay, to the very existence of the British name—in India, as well as to the maintenance of the spirit of the army, that their reputation should be revived by success; and my noble Friend, the noble Earl who was Governor General of India, and under whose auspices the operations were carried on in all directions, which restored to the army the credit, reputation, and honour in which it was always held up to that moment, and which tended so much to the advantage and honour of the country—the noble Earl thought it proper to follow the example of the case of the battle of Waterloo, and ordered medals to be struck, and distributed to every individual of the army that fought in the north-east of India. The noble Lord judged most correctly that it was important to give some mark of the approbation of the Government at the conduct of the army; to take a step promptly to make the men sensible of the estimation in which their conduct was held; and that it should do so promptly, to revive the spirit which had existed before, and that confidence in their own exertions which was so important to re-establish discipline, subordination, and good order. The noble Lord had the power of carrying into execution this measure within the territories under his own government; but it required the assent of Her Majesty in order that those who received this mark of honour from the noble Lord the Governor General of India should be enabled to wear this decoration in this country; and Her Majesty was pleased to express her approbation of the measure which had been adopted by the noble Earl. This is the history of this medal. There is no doubt that the army retrieved the misfortune which had previously occurred, and the good conduct of the troops regained the character of the army, and restored confidence to the public, and peace to India. There was afterwards another instance with regard to such medals, with respect to which, I think, from what I shall state, it will be exceedingly clear that they were given on such distinct and exclusive grounds that they will form an exception to the general rule, and I think that I shall, in a few words, show your Lordships a full justification for the distinction that was made—I mean the medals given in the case of China. I have before had occasion to draw your Lordships' attention to the extraordinary operations performed in that war. My Lords, we had fleets and armies there carrying on joint operations on a hostile coast, carrying on operations against fortified harbours and rivers, against fortresses and fortified coasts, and manœuvring against the enemy exactly as if they had been a body of troops with their cannon in the field, and carrying everything before them. My Lords, you must all recollect the anxiety with which those of us who knew anything of the nature of warlike operations, regarded the risks and dangers of that war in China. My Lords, the British troops overcame all their difficulties; and I must add that there was this peculiar circumstance attending these operations, namely, that they were carried on by the native troops, who, as was known to all Governors of India, had notorious prejudices against embarkation, and whom it was difficult to prevail on to embark. They did, however, give their services in aid of Her Majesty's troops, enduring all the hardships, and not being backward in their services, or in their efforts to get the better of the enemy. My Lords, after an extraordinary short period of time, the operations of that war were eminently successful; they were successful at every point; and they terminated in a peace satisfactory to all parties, and which I hope, will be the permanent bond of peace between this country and that great empire. Her Majesty's Government thought proper to reward the services rendered by the army and the fleet concerned in those great operations, and ordered that medals should be struck, to be given to each individual who had been concerned in carrying on those operations; and this, I say, is another singular case, which forms an exception to all general rule, and which cannot be quoted as a precedent for any other case. My Lords, I have already stated to your Lordships, that the army which served in the Peninsula is by no means an army that was not favoured; I have stated that it has been highly distinguished and rewarded; and hose services are considered on every occasion in which it is possible to regard them, with a view to promotion. But I would beg your Lordships to recollect that this is not the only successful army which has served this country; your Lordships must not forget the army of Egypt, you must not forget the army that fought in Calabria. And when you recollect these services, I would beg your Lordships also not to forget the fleets. Did anybody ever hear of a general medal for a fleet? And yet there have been great naval victories acquired, such as the battle of the 1st of June, the battle of Cape St. Vincent, and the battle of the Nile. Did anybody ever hear of a general medal worn by everybody for those services? Surely, if the Peninsular army is to have a grant of this description, and an address is presented by your Lordships for that object, it is impossible that your Lordships should not notice these other occasions. Then there is another circumstance which I beg you to recollect in favour of the navy: I mean those long winter campaigns, if I may so venture to call them, in the blockade of the coast of France, and in the Bay of Biscay. Month after month, week after week, and night after night, that blockade was persevered in through the skill of the officers and seamen in the ships of war of the Sovereign of this country. Are these services not to be rewarded equally with continued campaigns on shore for six years in winter and summer? Certainly they must be. If you take the step now proposed, you must take others; and it would be impossible that you should not carry the measure to the full extent of giving a general brevet, in fact, to everybody who ever served during the whole war, as well of the French Revolution as in the Peninsula.

The Marquess of Londonderry, after the speech of the noble Duke, in which he fully concurred, thought it superfluous to add anything; but he must say a few words on the one point mentioned by the noble Duke on the cross benches, when he alluded to the services of those distinguished officers in the Peninsula who were not so fortunate as to obtain decorative honours. He would not yield to the noble Duke in his high value of those officers engaged in those services; but he regretted that the noble Duke had come forward to present this petition, and that the language of British officers should be such as to seek a decoration or a reward by a petition to Parliament; it was unworthy of British officers to demand any decorations or rewards for any services they might be called upon to perform. The right of giving rewards was vested exclusively in the Sovereign, and it could not be exercised with impartiality if the subject could be referred to that or the other House of Parliament. The noble Duke might have taken warning by what had taken place in the other House of Parliament, when Colonel Hay presented a similar petition. That Gentleman was answered by the then Secretary at War, who was now Governor General of India; and so incapable was the case of counter argument, that the petition was rejected unanimously, and, he believed, without a division. And they had the other day the opinion of another individual, who had also filled the office of Secretary at War, and he was a civilian, who deprecated the interference of Parliament with the rewards conferred. What did these petitioners say? They set out by saying that the language of supplication would ill become British soldiers, and yet they proceeded to ask a boon which they said they would have received voluntarily from the justice of the country; and they concluded by calling upon their Lordships to interfere in their behalf. Besides this, the lapse of time had been so great that he defied the noble Duke to point out any mode by which the just claims of these officers could be established; the only thing that could be done would be by giving a general measure, and his noble Friend the noble Duke had given substantial reasons why this should not be done, and why, instead of an honourable distinction, it would, owing to the misapplication, be entirely valueless. A soldier could look upon a decoration as valuable only when it came from the direct recommendation of the commander under whom he served, or by the order of the Sovereign of his country. It was said, that the officers serving in India and in China had received medals, and therefore, that the Peninsular officers ought to have them; but supposing the officers in India and China had not been decorated, did they suppose that the Indian and Chinese army would have come to their Lordships' House, and have asked for a boon, like those officers who had petitioned for this boon for their services? He was surprised that the noble Duke should have been the person to countenance a petition which was totally unworthy of British officers, because the supplication for compensation and reward was the last thing which they should make to that or the other House of Parliament. That House had not the power to grant the prayer, and it would be unconstitutional if it did; and he was certain that afterwards, when sitting by their own firesides, these very officers would think a medal so obtained totally without value.

The Duke of Richmond replied. The noble Marquess had taken upon himself to give him a lecture because he had thought it his duty to present a petition which he thought respectfully and properly worded, and the noble Marquess had wondered that he had not taken warning by what had occurred in the other House. Now, he was not in the habit of giving up his opinions in consequence of anything that took place in the other House; and he conceived that he was doing his duty to those who had fought and bled in their country's cause, and who, as he thought, had been neglected by their country. The noble Marquess said it was unconstitutional, forsooth, that this House should give rewards to the army and navy. Did he not think that it was a reward for the army and navy to receive the thanks of of Parliament? The army and navy had ever been proud to receive the Thanks of either House of Parliament, and there was no reason why such a petition as he had received should not be presented to their Lordships. All that these undecorated officers asked was some memorial to show that they were the individuals to whom for these sixteen actions the House had given its thanks. The noble Marquess defied him to show any mode by which these rights should be ascertained; but the roll-call of every regiment that served in the Peninsula was preserved in the Secretary's Office. What he complained of was, that the general officers, the commanding officers, and those on the staff who had not brevet rank, did receive rewards; and he asked, why the captains, the lieutenants, the subalterns, the non-commissioned officers, and the soldiers, were not allowed to wear some mark of distinction, to show that they had served? And the noble Marquess asked whether the officers of the army lowered themselves by coming here and asking for a boon? He (the Duke of Richmond) thought not at all. It was very well for those who were covered with decorations to say, "Don't give medals to captains and subaltern officers, and non-commissioned officers and privates." He should like to know whether, without these officers and men, they would have got their honours themselves. With regard to the Waterloo honours, it was very well known that one corps which received them did not know of the action till some days after it was fought. Yet the officers who had gone through all the hard service of the Peninsular war, were allowed no testimonial. All must admit, that it was a laudable ambition in these officers to be able to transmit to their posterity some memorial of their own merits—of their country's gratitude. He was sure that not one of the petitioners would object to similar rewards being conferred on the troops who had served bravely in Egypt or elsewhere. They were willing to share the honour with all who deserved it; but they had a right to expect (at least he thought so) that they should have something to show that they had gone through the campaign in the Peninsula, and had done their duty. Peninsular officers, who had gone to reside with their families upon the Continent, if they went to a review, going themselves without decorations, found officers there with decorations who had never been in action. His noble Friend (the Duke of Wellington) said he approved of medals being given in India, because it was necessary to revive the spirit of the troops, which had had the shadow of a shade cast upon their reputation. He (the Duke of Richmond) did not think it was very expedient to tell the army, "Only suffer a disaster; then rally and distinguish yourselves again, and you will receive decorations to revive your spirits." His case was this—that when the thanks of Parliament were given to the army, the commissioned and non-commissioned officers and private soldiers should have some record that they had been in the engagement and done their duty there.

Petition read, and ordered to lie on the Table.

COLLEGES (IRELAND) BILL.] Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

Lord Stanley said: In moving your Lordships to agree to the second reading of the Bill to enable Her Majesty to endow certain Colleges in Ireland, it is hardly necessary to remind your Lordships of the gracious speech delivered by Her Majesty from the Throne, in which She recommended to Parliament to provide for the improvement and extension of academical education in Ireland. In obedience to that recommendation, Her Majesty's Government submitted to Parliament a Bill for that object, which has undergone very minute and lengthened consideration in the other House of Parliament, and it passed all its stages there, though not with unanimity, undoubtedly with very large majorities. My Lords, I should only waste time if I were to go into any argument to prove the advantage of extending to all classes in Ireland the benefits of the best education, and of the duty of Government to advance the public interest by lending its aid to promote such education throughout the realm. But in the expenditure which has been made by Parliament and the country for the purposes of education, and amidst the commendable anxiety which has been generally evinced of late on the subject, I cannot but think that there has been one great omission. Whilst liberal provision has been made for the education of the higher orders, and while the Legislature has shown its wisdom and liberality in encouraging the education of the lower orders, while these two extremes have absorbed attention, the middle classes have been neglected in the great scheme of mental improvement; whereas, if there is one class which, more than any other, should obtain the advantage of a liberal and sound education, it is the middle class—and by "middle class," I mean the class below the highest and above the lowest; and this is the class which your Lordships are now called on to legislate for. Your Lordships cannot fail to recollect, that from the circumstances of the country, many (I will not say most) of the large landed proprietors of Ireland, men therefore of the most powerful and beneficial influence, do not exercise the influence they have upon the society of Ireland, being habitually residents in other countries. I say not this in condemnation of those individuals; it is one of the unfortunate consequences of the peculiar situation in which Ireland is placed. But the effect is to give a much larger influence over society to the class immediately below the highest—the inferior gentry and tradesmen, than is properly their due. Your Lordships will also bear in mind that by the extraordinary munificence of Parliament the lower orders are at this moment to a great extent in the receipt of a liberal and extensive education; I hope it will become a religious and moral education, but it is certainly an intellectual education; and, in this state of things, whilst the lowest classes are having their intellects sharpened, their powers cultivated, and their minds refined, it is most material the class immediately above them should have provision made for their improvement, since the provision for the education of that class is more deficient in Ireland than elsewhere. How stands the case? Ireland does not stand on the same footing in respect to education with any other part of the Empire. In this country, besides our ancient Universities, many of the great towns, by their own exertions, had established collegiate institutions. What is the case in Ireland? With the exception of the Institution at Belfast, you have one College, and only one, the single establishment of Trinity College, Dublin. Now, Trinity College, Dublin, is open not only to the highest classes of the community, but also to those who do not belong to that class; and the system of education in Trinity College is, in respect to religious distinctions, of a very liberal character; I believe there about 100 Roman Catholics receiving education within its walls. Not only Roman Catholics, but Dissenters from the Established Church, are admitted into Trinity College, Dublin, and receive the benefits of education there; they may compete, too, for honours; but when you come to the emoluments, the Roman Catholics and Dissenters, though admitted to the benefits of education, are excluded from the emoluments. Is this the course that should be pursued? I have heard the petition which has been presented to-night by the noble Earl near me (the Earl of Eldon), not from the University of Oxford, but from certain Members of that University; and if we were legislating for a country in which there were no religious differences; if we were all members of the same church, followers of the same creed, and acknowledged the same spiritual head, I can readily conceive the advantage of making science in all cases the handmaid of religion, and binding both together in indissoluble bonds. But is it so in Ireland? Recollect that we have to deal practically with the case of Ireland; a case where the established religion is the religion of a small minority; with the case of a country which is separated into various religious creeds, and subdivisions of those creeds. Then what are you to do? Are you, for the purpose of extending the advantages of academical education in Ireland, to cling to the system of Oxford and Cambridge, to require that tests shall be taken, if not by the students, at least by all the professors? Are you, in establishing academical education for a people mainly Roman Catholic, to insist that all the institutions shall be built upon the basis of the Church of England? And if not, what will you do? Will you, if I may coin a word, unprotestantize Trinity College, Dublin? Will you open the emoluments and the endowments—will you deal with the revenues and the statutes of that College, and throw it open with, if you please, increased endowments to all classes of the population, without religious distinction? Her Majesty's Government do not think it would be expedient, wise, or just, to take such a course. They consider that Trinity College is, and always has been, a Protestant establishment endowed for Protestant purposes, supported by Protestant funds, and intended as a nursery for the formation of clerical members of the Protestant Church as established in Ireland. And here I must be permitted to do justice to a Gentleman from whom I widely differ on some points, in admitting the liberality of a sentiment which he expressed in giving his evidence before your Lordships in 1825. Mr. O'Connell, to whom I refer, deprecated on that occasion, as an act of injustice, the diversion of any portion of the revenues of Trinity College, for the purpose of conferring scholarships or advantages of that description on persons not professing the religion of the State. I think, my Lords, that such an interference with Trinity College would unnecessarily and dangerously excite the Protestant feeling of the country, raise against you Protestant prejudices, and create Protestant animosity, without at at the same time tending to the harmony or advantage of the institution itself. What then? Will you establish in Dublin itself three or four rival colleges, each dedicated to the support and maintenance of a particular creed, with professors belonging to that creed, endowed by the State? I think that such a proposition would not be likely even if the Protestant population of this country were willing to concede it, to tend to the harmony of the city of Dublin. I think that the inevitable consequence of having three or four such rival institutions within the precincts of the metropolis would be, that their rivalry would lead to controversial disputes and discussions, which, in a short period, would generate bitter hostility. You have now to deal with a case in which it is necessary to provide for the moral education of a large portion of people who differ from you in their religious creed. I think it would be most unfortunate that you should deprive Trinity College, Dublin, itself, of the advantages of educating within its walls a considerable number of Roman Catholics. I think it is a matter of infinite importance that you should not discourage—I would say that you should rather endeavour, by all the means in your power, to encourage the combined instruction, as far as it can be combined, of the young men of Ireland of different religious persuasions. I am satisfied that the fact of being educated in the same College, of being brought up under the same teachers, of being competitors for the same honours, of being admitted impartially to those honours, of mixing together in familiar society at a period of life when the affections are warm, and the heart open and ready to receive impressions, not only of a lively, but permanent nature—I am satisfied that such a course tends more than any other that could be devised to soften those asperities which may arise in after life, and lead both parties to judge more calmly, and make greater allowances for their different religious feelings, however great and fundamental may be the points upon which those differences rest. Would that object be likely to be effected by different Colleges being established in the city of Dublin? I think, my Lords, it is quite clear that the infallible consequence of establishing within the limits of the city of Dublin a Protestant College, a Presbyterian College, a Roman Catholic College, and a Unitarian College, would be that Roman Catholic parents would send their children to the Roman Catholic College, Presbyterians theirs to the Presbyterian College, members of the Church of England theirs to the Protestant College, and the Unitarians theirs to the Unitarian College, thus breaking up that union which now subsists, and most advantageously subsists, within the walls of Trinity College, and reducing the College itself to a merely exclusive institution. Thanks to the abolition of the penal laws, the Roman Catholics of the country are rapidly rising in station and amount of property. There may be those who regret to see their Roman Catholic fellow countrymen thus rapidly ascending in the scale of society; but for my part, my Lords, I cordially rejoice at it. But, at all events, rejoice at or regret it as we may, it is a fact, my Lords, with which you must deal; and if you are to educate the middle classes of the people, you must necessarily educate the Roman Catholics of Ireland. What, then, will you do? I reject the alternative of opening Trinity College, and doing away with the existing application of its revenues and its existing distinctions; I deprecate the establishing of rival Colleges in the Irish metropolis; and I have, therefore, only to entreat your Lordships favourably to consider the only other alternative—at least the only one that presents itself to my mind—namely, the establishment of different Colleges in different provinces in Ireland—Colleges that shall be placed in such a position that while they disclaim and disavow, and steadily repudiate all sectarian principles, all proselytism, and all religious sects, yet shall be able to teach somewhat of the prevailing opinion and creed of the people in the district in which they were established. You may ask, why not establish a Presbyterian College in Belfast, an exclusively Roman Catholic institution in Cork, Limerick, and Galway, and an exclusively Protestant one in Dublin? My answer is, that I set too much value upon the advantages to be derived from a united education to assent to any such proposition. I think, that as you have given your sanction to an exclusive system in Trinity College, Dublin, for the purpose of supplying clergymen of the Established Church, and as you have connected theological professors of the Presbyterian creed with the Presbyterian institution at Belfast, so do I think that you have wisely and liberally agreed to contribute to the education of the Roman Catholic priesthood, by endowing the College of Maynooth. All these, however, are theological endowments: when dealing with the laity of these three persuasions, I do entreat of your Lordships to throw, if possible, one drop of sweetness into that amount of bitterness which too unhappily prevails throughout Ireland, and permit the youth of that country to be educated in common, and under the same teachers, in all those branches of learning which do not, and cannot, affect their religious opinions. The plan which Her Majesty's Government are anxious to lay before your Lordships, and which has already obtained the sanction of the House of Commons, goes to establish in the four provinces of Ireland academical collegiate institutions, of which the basis and fundamental principle shall be this—that there shall be no religious test required; that no theological examination shall be deemed necessary as a part of the College discipline; and that there shall be no attempt whatever to interfere by the College authorities with the religious opinions of the students. But, my Lords, I repudiate altogether that stigma, for so I consider it, which is sought to be fixed upon this scheme, by designating it, as it has been designated in another place, as a "gigantic scheme of godless education." That designation, if justly applicable to the plan now propounded by Her Majesty's Government, applies with equal, if not greater force, to the University of London, in which the absence of tests, of theological examinations, and of divinity lectures, is a fundamental rule of the institution itself. The Scotch are anything but an irreligious people, and yet I believe it is a principle of all Scotch Universities without exception, that with regard to the pupils, there shall be no religious tests, no compulsory attendance upon public worship or upon divinity lectures, and no theological examination. These are not merely not compelled to be observed, but they formed no part of the course of study adopted by the Colleges. And yet I have never heard of those Universities designated as being based upon a system of "godless education." The success of this Bill rests, I admit, entirely on the same principle; for unless your Lordships are prepared to sanction that principle—the principle of entire religious equality and the exclusion of religious endowment by the State—I must call upon you to reject the Bill, as otherwise tending to evil rather than to good. But if your Lordships do not mean to adopt that principle, what will you do? Do you mean to endow one theological professor and one only, and is he to be of the Established Church? Do you mean, that in Dublin, Cork, Limerick, Galway, and Belfast, there shall be endowed by she State one theological professor of the Established Chnrch, and that all the other donominations are to depend upon their own efforts and resources? Do you mean to apply that principle to those three out of the four Colleges, the great bulk of the students of which are sure to be Dissenters from the doctrine of the Established Church? If not, do you mean to have four professors to suit the different denominations of Protestant, Presbyterian, Unitarian, and Roman Catholic, and by the authority of the same State, and the same Government, to endow those four persons for the purpose of teaching to the young men of the several Colleges the various and conflicting doctrines of their respective creeds? When the education scheme was first broached, in 1831, one of the conditions first insisted upon was, that all persons should, under the authority of the Board, be compelled to attend the service of their respective churches every Sunday; but it was subsequently struck out, because members of the Church of England and of the Presbyterian body said that, in their judgment, it would be a sin to which they could not be a party to compel attendance upon a Roman Catholic place of worship. Then I ask you, my Lords, are the same class of persons now to turn round upon us and recommend, objecting to our Bill for not containing it, that in these Colleges you shall endow a Roman Catholic professor for the purpose of teaching exclusively the tenets of that religion? I ask, you would such a course—the appointment of four theological professors—lessen or do away with the danger of proselytism, or the inconvenience of theological controversy. or tend to the harmony and good feeling of persons of different religious persuasions? And, if you are to endow those professors, have you considered who is to appoint them? I speak with all respect of the memorial of the Roman Catholic prelates of Ireland; and I agree with the noble Lord in thinking, that, as a Government, we are bound to consider not only the authority of, but also the weight of argument in that memorial, and to meet the objections it urges where we deem them reasonable. But I do not think we are bound to yield to such an objection as this—that the faith of the Roman Catholic student is in imminent danger, if he be called upon to attend lectures upon anatomy, by any but Roman Catholic professors. I think it is essential that the Crown should have the power, in the first instance, of appointing the president, vice-president, and professors. I do not see the slightest danger that the Crown will abstain from appointing in Cork and Belfast those who are best qualified to discharge the duties of their respective professorships, because they happened to belong to the creed of the great majority. I see no danger in leaving to the Crown the appointment of the civil professors; but I do see danger in leaving to them the appointment of theological professors. While, however, I say this—while I say that it would be highly injudicious to establish a religious distinction within the walls of these institutions, or endow religious professors, or insist upon theological examinations, I freely admit it to be our bounden duty to give every possible facility for the inculcating of religious knowledge. We adopt the professorial, as contradistinguished from the tutorial system. To that system I have heard it objected that the young men are exposed to all the temptations incident to Colleges in the midst of large and profligate towns; that they are taken from under the eye of their parents, and they withdraw themselves from the influence of the professors. Now, as tending to morality, I think it is not wise to bring up young men in a sort of monastic institution from the age of sixteen to twenty, in strict seclusion, if such could be maintained within the walls of a College, and then throw them loose upon the temptations of the world. Oxford and Cambridge, Edinburgh and Glasgow, London, Belfast and Dublin, are all profligate towns. But, according to my recollection, I do not think there was such absolute security to the morals of the students under the system of collegiate seclusion adopted at Oxford as should make it a model which we ought to follow in preference to the system adopted at Edinburgh and Glasgow. If placed within reach of a great town—and the convenience of having a College so placed is very great—I cannot see, whether the pupils live within the walls of the College, or in houses in the town, that any more control can be exercised over them in one case than the other. In Ireland the advantage of placing the Colleges in large towns is still greater than in this country; for a very large portion of those who will send their children to them will be actual residents within those towns; so that in those cases they can secure for their children the benefits of an academical education, and at the same time those of parental superintendence and protection. Then we propose by this Bill that no young men shall be permitted to be members of those institutions unless they are living within their parents' houses, or in houses licensed for that purpose by the governing body. who have the power of withdrawing those licenses if a proper control be not exercised; and recollect, that none except the Principal is to reside within the College; what is, then, more certain than that the professors, taking houses in the town in which they are to deliver lectures, will themselves open boarding-houses for the pupils who come from a distant part of the country, and who will thus be placed under the immediate superintendence of a professor, Protestant or Roman Catholic, according to the feelings or wishes of the parent, and have secured to him at the same time the advantages of a domestic supervision? But we go further; for if parents should prefer the tutorial system, we will give every facility for the establishment of halls, the rules and regulations of which may be laid down by the party endowing them, provided they do not violate the religious faith of others, and subject to the veto of the governing body. I have thus briefly stated the principle of the measure. I will not enter into the details. I entreat your Lordships, in dealing with a country in which the education of the middle classes is most strongly felt, and in which you cannot deal with a class belonging only to one religion, that you will take the only course by which you can fairly confer upon them the advantages of a liberal and academical education. I am convinced that if you reject this measure, it will be attended with the most serious consequences; on the other hand it is impossible to overrate the good which may be derived to generations yet unborn, from introducing into Ireland, by the unanimous consent of Queen, Lords, and Commons, and a liberal endowment from the national fund, an establishment for the diffusion of an enlightened system of education, under professors qualified to give instruction to the rising generation throughout all Ireland, by which a literary, scientific, and moral education may be conveyed to all the middle classes, and which cannot fail in the result to confer the unquestionable benefit of religious instruction also upon the people.

The Earl of Shrewsbury: My Lords, willing as I am to give the Government every credit for the best possible intentions in this measure, still I cannot but lament that it has not been presented to us in a form more suitable to the wants and wishes of those for whose benefit chiefly it is proposed; nor have I heard anything from the noble Lord who introduced it, to induce me to alter that opinion.

My Lords, this measure has been declared to be "dangerous to the faith and morals of the people," by the unanimous voice of the Catholic hierarchy of Ireland, because the requirements of religion are not incorporated with the scheme. Nor will I believe there is one noble Lord in this House who does not feel that education without religion is a moral evil; and that even the so-called superstitions of Rome, are a fair substitute for infidelity. That admitted, how comes it that you are about to establish for a very large and intelligent portion of the community over which you rule, a system of public instruction, which has been so truly and emphatically described; and which, notwithstanding the few modifications since introduced into it, is still, (as I think, at least) to be so truly described as "a gigantic scheme of godless education"? My Lords, is not the reason to be found in this—that you are fearful of another conflict with the fanatical prejudices of the country? For is not this an analogous case to the payment of the Catholic clergy? on which the noble President of the Council not long since thus expressed himself:—

"That as to himself, he had long since expressed his opinion on that point. He had, when in the Commons, voted for the measure proposed by Lord Francis Egerton. But he would fairly state, that, until he could see that the people of England would be favourable to such a measure, he did not think it would be prudent in any Government to propose it. He did look forward with hope to a time when a change would take place; but there were now so many difficulties in the way, that he did not know how any one could conceive that the Government had any intention of proposing such a measure. It would be for the Government to watch the feelings of the country on the subject; and in the mean time they proposed this measure (the Maynooth Bill), as one which was important in itself, and as an earnest to the people of Ireland, that it was their wish to do all that lay in their power to conciliate them."

Now, my Lords, I will not stop here to inquire how far this avowal may be consistent with the principles of the Constitution under which we live: whether it be not merging both your Lordships' privileges, and the rights of the Lower House, in a power which the Constitution only recognises as represented, not representing. But, considering this present measure as analogous to that to which these observations of the noble Lord refer, the enigma is at once solved; nor can I see any other solution of it. Yes, my Lords, though you have been victorious once, and would undoubtedly be victorious again, yet, by some strange fatality, do you dread another conflict with the fanaticism which assailed you under the Maynooth Bill.

My Lords, the people of Ireland ask you, why it is that they who are Christians are to be educated like heathens without the knowledge of God? and you answer them—because you are the vassals of Protestant England, which deems your creed superstitious, and your worship idolatrous. My Lords, is this a wise or a safe answer to give to the cry for Repeal? And are these the people whom you are so studious to conciliate? You did not argue thus under the Maynooth Bill; or rather, you crushed that argument under the weight of your authority. Why listen to it now? Had you listened to it then, you knew that you had lost for ever the whole moral force of every effort you might make against Repeal; for that was a measure founded upon the strongest claims of right, justice, and expediency—supported by the strongest Government which the country has seen for years—carried eventually by large majorities in both Houses of Parliament, in spite of an opposition, though numerically small, yet bold and uncompromising—but a measure which, had you yielded to the influence which now appears to arrest you, had been thrust aside by the wild clamour of a mere section—as I am sure it is—of the people of England and of Scotland; a section, however, which you are now elevating to the highest pinnacle of power, by openly avowing yourselves subservient to it! My Lords, I do think that the inference is just; for between the principle of the two measures there is no difference, nor yet between them and the payment of the Catholic clergy; but for which latter (whether it might be for good or for evil, religiously speaking, is another question, and not now to the purpose)—but for which, presuming it to be politically advantageous, as it is asserted to be, we are now to wait for the good pleasure of the fanatical party in England—we must watch the feelings of the country on the subject. My Lords, had such been your policy only a few weeks since, you never after could have told the people of Ireland that they were represented in the Parliament of England; yet, such is your policy now, admitting as you must—and no man doubts or denies it—that religion ought to form the basis, the strength, and the handmaid of every wise system of education.

It is a mere mockery, my Lords, (at least so it appears to me,) to tell the Catholics of Ireland that they may provide this for themselves; for, divested as they have been of the whole of their own ecclesiastical property—taxed for the support of two Churches—continually exhausted by their own heroic efforts, as I may justly call them, to supply their own miserable deficiencies in suitable places of religious worship, by the erection, in many instances, of splendid structures in the true, old, ecclesiastical style; and in which, to the credit of their Protestant landlords be it said, they are often generously assisted by them—thus circumstanced, it is not possible to suppose that they either can or will provide those very large resources necessary to carry out the task you have imposed upon them. Why, my Lords, before they are in a condition to do this—if ever your measure come into operation, which I very much doubt—one generation after another must have grown up under the miserably defective system which you now offer them, till perhaps, till probably, there are none who care any thing about the matter. While, on the other hand, every requisite will be speedily growing up around the small Protestant minority, under their own superior wealth, and the fostering influence of the most richly-endowed Church in the world.

You have provided a sufficiently religious education for early youth: is it the less requisite for early manhood? when the passions are contending for the mastery; when impressions for good and evil are the more deep and permanent; when the reason is developing its powers, and demanding a clear and definite foundation for what it had hitherto been content to receive on trust, on the mere dictum of authority?—a period in which faith may readily yield to scepticism, when backed by the influence of the passions, and perhaps by the known indifferentism of the Government professors.

Again, my Lords, will not this scheme of yours vividly contrast in the minds of those for whom it is, or ought to be, principally intended, the great Catholic majority—will it not vividly contrast in their minds, not only with the state of their more fortunate Protestant fellow countrymen, but also with what they fancy at least would be their own condition under a domestic Legislature? Will they not picture to themselves the college, the common hall, the refectory, the cloister, the chapel, (the library they are to have,) the strict Catholic collegiate discipline, every requisite for a good moral education, every thing that in former times they enjoyed in so superlative a degree, every thing, in fine, that they know to exist in Protestant England—but from which they are debarred because their lot is cast in Catholic Ireland? My Lords, till you make up your minds to govern Ireland as a Catholic country, as in fact it is, so long will she be your difficulty, and you never will succeed in what I believe the Government sincerely to desire, to conciliate her people, and make them your strength instead of your weakness.

My Lords, it has been said that this measure has been devised to Protestantize Ireland. My Lords, I do not believe it: however this result may be contemplated by some, I do not believe it to have entered into the scope of the original framers of the Bill. It would be a device altogether unworthy of any honest man, still less creditable to an Administration which professes to be guided, and I am willing to believe it is, by high and liberal principles in the government of the country. To what, then, are we to ascribe it, but to that same apprehension so candidly avowed by the noble President of the Council, in reference to another, though in my mind, a perfectly similar question—we must watch the feelings of the country on the subject. But is it not the duty of the Government rather to create and guide, than to follow, and be subservient to the feelings of the country? And in reference to this present measure, as applicable to this present case, what are those feelings, and what proportion do they bear to the sterling sense and virtue of the country? Why, my Lords, these are the very feelings that, but just now, you so wisely disregarded and so signally defeated. And is it in the flush of victory that you hold this language—that whatever Government may think of the beneficial character of a measure, however just in itself, however advantageous not only to Ireland, but to the whole Empire—till the people of England, that is, the clamorous, ignorant, uneducated sections of the people, who believe that all Catholics are Jesuits, and Jesuits the very children of Satan; who have been taught to cant upon the enormities of Rome, that Babylon of the earth, and mother of iniquity; upon the superstition and idolatry of her system, her sanguinary propensities against her enemies, her disloyalty to the State, her infidelity to man, and her treasons against God—matters upon which they know nothing, and, if possible, understand less—till this single section of the people be renewed in spirit and in truth, till they be remodelled and enlightened, and the veil of prejudice be removed from before their eyes—till then, the progress of good government in Ireland, which had so happily set in, is to be arrested? My Lords, if this be the case, new generations must arise, for the present, I fear, are irreclaimable, before that consummation so devoutly to be wished, but otherwise so impossible to be accomplished, can be effected, and the course of good government be again allowed to progress. My Lords, if this be an evil, as undoubtedly it is, instead of leaving it to cautious and distant observation, is it not our duty to grapple with it, and overcome it, as you have so lately done? But if, on the other hand, these feelings are to go unchecked and unrestrained, governing the very Government itself; if having conquered we are now to yield; if they are to become a recognised principle in the Commonwealth, exercising dominion over the most important destinies of the country; it behoves us at the very least to examine them more closely, to sift the means by which they have obtained so fatal an ascendancy, and to see whether it be not possible to counteract them by some other method.

My Lords, they who represent these feelings in Parliament, and they who constitute them out of doors, tell us, one and all, that they have their origin and their force in the doctrinal errors, and tainted morality—the superstition and idolatry of Rome. Let us begin with those without. But in dealing with this subject, do not fear that I shall detain you long, or weary you with an argument on every point; I shall select one only as a sample, and for that even I crave your indulgence, though I think I have a right to it—for remember, that we are continually accused of high crimes and misdemeanor before God and man, and if it were only to rescue ourselves from dishonour, putting all consideration of the well-being of the country out of the question, I do think that I have a right to demand your attention for a few moments.

My Lords, I will bring but one witness to the means by which these feelings are created and sustained throughout the country: it is a Sermon, and a pretty one it is, with this title, "Popery our Giant Foe: a Sermon preached in the Church of St. Matthew the Evangelist, Rugby, on Sunday evening, the 18th May, 1845, being the evening previous to the Third Reading of the Maynooth Endowment Bill, by the Rev. C. R. Alford, M.A., incumbent."

After a deal of fanatical trash, page 5, the rev. incumbent is pleased to say, (but I should first observe that the congregation were so delighted with it that they requested it might be printed for the benefit of the world at large, thinking it a pity that so much knowledge should be confined to themselves alone;) well, page 5, the rev. incumbent says—

"We have to contemplate the foe whom we are compelled to dread. That foe is Popery—a system of religious belief and practice which, in every age of its existence, has proved itself to be a master-piece of evil, exquisitely adapted to the unrenewed heart of man, and for the destruction of the soul.

"The system is idolatry in religion; inasmuch as it inculcates the payment of Divine honours to other beings than God;—angels, men, and women, the Virgin Mary in particular, are the objects of its adoration, &c.

"The system is treason in politics, inasmuch as it teaches that kings have no dominion over their subjects, if the Pope be pleased to declare the said kings deposed or excommunicate; and also, that the oath of allegiance to any sovereign not thus deposed, is not binding, if the cause and interests of Romanism can be served by breaking it, &c.

"The system is vice in morals, inasmuch as it teaches that it is not murder to kill men who oppose the system; that it is not perjury to break any oath or promise, if, when you made it, you did not intend to abide by it, &c.

"Once more, the system is absurdity in general, &c., &c.

"Such, brethren, is Popery; idolatrous, treasonable, vicious, and absurd, &c., however fostered by our rulers, and likely to obtain ascendancy in this country!"

Again, p. 10—

"In the second place, we distinctly charge the sin of gross idolatry upon the Church of Rome. . . . Through each of these (the saints) is the Divine Majesty to be approached, and prayers are to be addressed to them. To them, did I say?—nay, to their images and pictures! And this surely is idolatry, beneath its grossest form."

Now let us see his proofs for this last point:—

"The Creed of Pope Pius IV.," says he, "thus states this doctrine:—'I believe that the saints who reign with Christ are to be worshipped and prayed to.'—'I most firmly assert that the images of Christ, and of the Mother of God, who was always a Virgin, are to be had and retained; and that due honour and worship is to be given to them.' The Council of Trent declares, that 'it is lawful to represent God and the Holy Trinity by images,' in defiance of the Second Commandment, and that 'the images and relics of Christ and the saints are to be duly honoured, worshipped, and venerated; and that in this veneration and worship those are venerated who are represented by them."

Now, my Lords, will you believe it?—that this minister of justice, charity, and truth, while he vouches for the accuracy of his statement—he may have taken it from another, but that is no excuse, for he vouches for its truth—will you believe it, that he has had the audacity to interpolate these three passages, each placed between inverted commas, to show them to be real and true quotations—he has had the audacity to interpolate every one of them with the word, and the only word upon which his whole argument turns, his whole accusation reposes—the word worship; without that, he knew that his accusation could not stand, for that the real doctrines of the Church were precisely the contrary to that which he represented them; but he was determined to carry his point, and he carried it by the most unblushing forgery!

My Lords, this is a sample, and only a sample, of the many blasphemous—as some of them are—and disgraceful falsehoods contained in this blind, strange effort of bigotry. I wish it were as solitary as it is strange, and yet has the rev. incumbent the effrontery to put his name to it, as a further guarantee for its truth!

Are you then surprised, my Lords, that a petition numerously signed should have come up from Rugby against Maynooth, or that with such appliances as these, your Table should have been loaded with them? To be sure, the rev. incumbent does say in the next paragraph, that—

"The later writers (that is, subsequent to the Council of Trent, meaning there were none such previously) of the Romish communion have endeavoured to meet the charge of idolatry, by making a distinction between the worship that is paid to God, and that which is offered to the saints. But this is a mere equivocation, and it is brought forward, not to caution the Romanist against idolatry, but merely to silence the Protestant opponent," &c.

Here, my Lords, are two fresh falsehoods, two new calumnies, in one short sentence, against his Catholic fellow countrymen! Now let us just see how these passages really stand. The passage cited from the Creed of Pius IV. stands thus in the original:—

"I constantly hold, that the saints reigning together with Christ are to be honoured and invocated, that they offer prayers to God for us, and that their relics are to be venerated. I most firmly assert, that the images of Christ, and of the Mother of God, ever a Virgin, and also of the other saints, are to be had and retained; and that due honour and veneration are to be given them."

Now for the Council of Trent. The Synod decrees—

"That images of Christ, of the blessed Virgin, and of other saints, are to be exposed and retained, particularly in churches, and that due honour and veneration are to be shown to them; not as believing that any divinity or virtue is in them, for which they should be honoured, or that any thing is to be asked of them or any trust placed in them, as the Gentiles once did in their idols, but because the honour given to pictures is referred to the prototypes, which they represent; so that through the images which we kiss, and before which we uncover our heads and kneel, we may learn to adore Christ, and venerate his saints."—Sess. xxv. De Invoc. S. S.

Now let us see how this doctrine is explained in the catechism drawn up by order of the Council. Amongst other things, in explaining the lawful use of images, the pastor is enjoined to—

"Inform the unlettered, and those who may be ignorant of the proper use of images, that they are intended to instruct in the history of the Old and New Testaments, and to revive the recollection of the events which they record; that thus excited to the contemplation of heavenly things, we may be the more ardently inflamed to adore and love God. He will, also, inform the faithful that the images of the saints are placed in churches, not only to be honoured, but that, also, admonished by their example, we may imitate their lives and emulate their virtues."—Pages 361, 2.

And again, in explaining the different manner of addressing prayers to the Almighty and to the saints, they say—

"In the performance of this duty, it is strictly incumbent on all not to transfer to creatures the right which belongs exclusively to God; and when, kneeling before the image of a saint, we repeat the Lord's Prayer, we are also to recollect, that we beg of the saint to pray with us, and to obtain for us those favours which we ask of God in the petitions of the Lord's Prayer; in fine, that he become our interpreter and intercessor with God. That this is an office which the saints discharge, we read in the Apocalypse of John the Apostle."—Page 467.

Now, my Lords, I will ask what warranty is there in all this for the accusation of the rev. incumbent? And I will also ask what warranty is there for the reiterated assertion of the noble Duke upon the cross benches (Newcastle), that Catholics are idolaters, because they put up images in their churches to worship them—an assertion which was cheered when he made it, and which the noble Duke said he would persist in making, in presence of the Catholic Members of this House as well as in their absence, before their faces as behind their backs. But I must tell the noble Duke that as long as he persists in making it, so long must I persist in contradicting it; but I beg of your Lordships to observe the difference between us—that the noble Duke asserts without his proofs, I contradict with my authority by my side. And why will not that authority convince him, and those who think with him? It is as accessible to him as it is to me. Am I yet to tell him, before he will disbelieve it, am I yet to tell him that there are 150 millions of Christians now in existence ready to swear that his assertion is false? Am I yet to tell him that he may in vain ransack the whole history of the Christian Church for one single authority—for one single authority in favour of picture or image worship, from the first rude efforts of the pencil in the catacombs of Rome, to the matchless wonders of Michael Angelo and Raphael, in St. Peter's and the Vatican—from the day on which St. Augustine, the apostle of England, advanced in procession to King Ethelbert, as the envoy from Rome, with the cross, the emblem of redemption, carried before him, to that on which his venerated shrine was pillaged and made desolate by the rapacious hands of the Iconoclasts of the sixteenth century?—and, my Lords, I have ever fancied that the weight of gold and jewels which encased them, was far more precious in the sight of the profaners of these relics, than the principle for which they contended. Am I yet to tell the noble Duke, that also from that time to this, do I defy him to bring one single atom of evidence in support of his assertion, more worthy of credit than the interpolations of the rev. incumbent of the church of St. Matthew the Evangelist at Rugby? My Lords, I defy the noble Duke to show that the Church Catholic, from the first day of her existence to the present hour, occupying, as she ever has done, the most civilized portions of the globe; exposed to the gaze and scrutiny of all; the nurse and mistress of the arts and sciences, both sacred and profane; whether filling the world with her learning, and illustrating her doctrines by her virtues; or in less happy times, too many of her members disgracing their profession by their vices—still do I defy the noble Duke to show, that, under any change of circumstances or condition, did she ever once inculcate or connive at the heinous crime of idolatry, that is, the payment of divine honours—as idolatry is very justly defined by the rev. incumbent at Rugby—the payment of divine honours to any other than to the one, only true, and living God!

My Lords, in approaching the next portion of this question, I mean the declaration so long made by the Legislature against the so-called superstition and idolatry of Rome, and which, though abandoned as a test, save in one solitary instance, is still so prominently brought forward, I will at least promise not to detain you long. But that declaration having been very recently appealed to by noble Lords and right rev. Prelates, in a solemn protest on our Journals, not only as a warning to your Lordships, and for the purpose of influencing the policy of the country, but also as a proof of the truth of what it asserts, it seems necessary, besides what I have said already, to consider under what circumstances that declaration was first framed and accepted by the Legislature, and what right it has acquired thereby to exercise the control which, used as it is, I believe it does, over the feelings and delusions of the people.

Your Lordships are too well versed in the history of those times, for me to do more than just to remind you that that declaration was the immediate consequence of Oates's plot, commonly called the Popish Plot.

Here the noble Earl was interrupted by Lord Brougham, who declared that there must be limits to the debates in that House; the noble Earl was going into questions which had nothing whatever to do with the subject before the House—he was introducing a theological controversy for which there was no occasion.

The Earl of Shrewsbury: I am sure that theological questions have not been introduced by me: I am only on the defensive. I had always understood it to be conformable with the usage of the House to enter upon the state of the country, and the influences under which measures were passing through the House. A Minister of the Crown had told them that a particular measure had not been introduced in deference to the feelings of the country—a measure analogous to that now before them—and he thought it necessary to discuss the nature and cause of those feelings. Would the noble and learned Lord promise not to introduce theological questions himself?—would he promise to desist from indulging in his invectives against the Catholic religion—against the religion of the Catholic Members of this House?

Lord Brougham would pledge himself on the present occasion to avoid going into what the noble Earl tempted him to go into, by his most gratuitous defence of the Catholic religion, and what had not been brought into question.

The Earl of Shrewsbury continued:—My Lords, I was saying that the declaration in question was the immediate consequence of Oates's plot—a plot hatched and supported on those very same popular delusions, those very same charges against Catholics, and their religion, which noble Lords and right rev. Prelates brought forward on the Maynooth Bill; a plot which characterizes the most disgraceful period of our history, which was eagerly seized by the unprincipled leaders of the factious Opposition of the day for their own unprincipled ends, chiefly to support the credit of the party which they represented, (the fanatical or country party,) to maintain the belief throughout the kingdom in the truth of these very charges, and thereby to raise themselves to power; a plot, the incidents of which were so improbable, nay so impossible, that Mr. Fox declared they could not have been believed even from the mouth of Cato, but which were nevertheless, though secretly discredited by the leaders, eagerly received as so much gospel by the credulity of the unreflecting multitude; a plot which speedily immolated no less than seventeen innocent individuals, one of them seventy, another eighty years of age, (for the plot itself was a pure, pure fiction,) and which, condemning seventeen others to death, some of whom died in prison, and subjecting the whole Catholic population of the kingdom to the extreme of misery and vexation during two whole years, at length terminated—no, it did not terminate with Lord Stafford, for there was still another victim to its thirst for blood in the venerable Archbishop Plunket, the Primate of Ireland—but requiring at that particular juncture a higher and more distinguished victim, lest its credit should slacken and depart, Lord Stafford was selected for the purpose. Sprung from the best blood in England, venerable for his years, remarkable only for the quiet innocence of his life, his only crime that he was a Catholic, his only offence that he was a man of unpretending talent. For this, was Lord Stafford selected from the five Catholic Peers who were imprisoned, and selected to stamp the judicial proceedings of that unhappy period with eternal infamy! But why, my Lords, do I dwell upon this scene? Why! but to show the character, the iniquity of the men who proposed, and the ferocity of the times that accepted that declaration; and from which noble Lords and right rev. Prelates still seem to draw the inference, that because it was accepted by the Legislature, therfore was it true. My Lords, it was not likely that men who were imbruing their hands in the blood of so many innocent victims should stop to inquire into the truth or falsehood of anything that they found so adapted to their purpose, the exclusion of Catholics and the destruction of their religion, to gratify the fanatics—Parliament too largely and too fatally participating in the crime, to gratify the fanatics through whom they aimed at power and place. For this was the plot devised and prosecuted; and when Shaftesbury, the principal leader in those iniquitous transactions, was taxed by a friend with the improbability of its incidents, what did he answer? "The more nonsensical the better; unless we can make them swallow worse nonsense than that, we never shall do any good with them." Such, my Lords, was the man, and such the Parliament, that proposed and accepted that declaration, and which now carries such weight with it because it was accepted by the whole Legislature of England! My Lords, from the Parliament—and remember that one House was the prosecutor, and the other the judge of Lord Stafford, both involved in one common guilt; and remember, too, that thes things were done not in the green wood, but in the dry, when the new principles had enjoyed 150 years of fair play to purify the faith and improve the morals of the country!—from the Parliament, let us ascend to the Sovereign, the third estate of the realm. My Lords, the Sovereign who gave his unwilling assent to that declaration, sealed his disbelief of it by dying a Catholic!

But why do I still dwell upon those times? Why, but because these very same charges of noble Lords and right rev. Prelates were then, as now, ever foremost on the scene;—because they then, as now, governed the feelings and regulated the legislation of the country—because I verily believe them to be even now the cause of the defective character of this very measure now before us—because upon them the whole framework of Oates's plot was built—because they were thrust forward at the opening of the prosecution against Lord Stafford, to prejudice the minds of your Lordships' House, then trying that innocent man, and which consequently—consequently, as is well attested, for the evidence itself was not fit to hang a dog—which consequently condemned him by a verdict at which posterity will never cease to shudder.

Do not fancy, my Lords, that these charges were not contradicted and disproved then, as they are contradicted and disproved now; Lord Stafford himself appealed for their contradiction to a work then recently published, and universally considered to be, as it has been ever since, a true, correct and faithful exposition of the real doctrines of Catholics on those points. It is entitled, "Roman Catholic Principles in reference to God and the King." It passed through no less than twelve editions during the first six years, has been printed and reprinted ever since, has frequently been distributed gratuitously through the country, but yet has it never proved any sufficient antidote to the poison, for the charges themselves are as rife as ever.

There is one passage in the Preface so exceedingly apposite to our present purpose, that I trust your Lordships will allow me to read it to you, and I have done.

"You tell me," says he—he is writing to a friend—"and you are in the right, that the thing which hath rendered credible the testimony of otherwise incredible witnesses against us, and which hath invalidated all contrary evidence given in our behalf, is a persuasion many Protestants have, that the Catholic religion is made up of traitorous principles, destructive of peace and government. You say you have been informed by common report, by printed books, nay, by some ministers in their very pulpits, that Catholics hold it an article of faith to believe that the Pope can depose kings, absolve their subjects from allegiance, and dispose of their kingdoms to whom he pleases. That to murder Protestants and destroy the nation by fire and sword for the propagation of the Catholic faith, are works of piety, and meritorious of heaven. And is it not strange, and severe," continues he, "that principles—and those pretended, of faith too, should be imposed upon men, which they themselves renounce and detest? If the Turk's Alcoran should in like manner be urged upon us, and we be hanged up for Mahometans, all we could do or say in such a case, would be, patiently to die with protestations of our own innocence. And this is the posture of our present condition."

My Lords, he speaks feelingly in this matter; for he was a Benedictine monk, and one of those tried for Oates's plot, but fortunately acquitted.

"We abhor, we renounce, we abominate such principles; we protest against them, and seal our protestations with our dying breaths. What shall we say?—what can we do more? To accuse men as guilty in matters of faith which they never owned, is the same thing as to condemn them for matters of fact which they never did."

The author then proceeds to give a true and candid explanation of his belief in the main points of faith and loyalty, controverted between Catholics and Protestants, as they severally relate to God and the king; and, in conclusion, says—

"These are the principles, these the treasons, these the idolatries and superstitions which, though no other than what we have received from our forefathers, and what the greatest part of the Christian world now professeth; yet have drawn upon us poor Catholics in England such dreadful punishments. Sweet Jesus, bless our sovereign! pardon our enemies; grant us patience, and establish peace and charity in our nation! This is the daily prayer of, Sir, your faithful though distressed friend."

Now, my Lords, as I said, I have done; but I trust that an impartial survey of the history of those times—and a careful perusal of it will amply repay the trouble—it is beautifully given in Lingard—I trust that it would serve as a caution to every man of station and influence not to encourage, nor yet to yield to these popular delusions, now seemingly become hereditary in the country, though resting only upon so many traditionary falsehoods.

My Lords, if I have mistaken the true import of what fell from the noble President of the Council, or if I have overstrained my inferences—though I do not think that I have done; for I have a very strong additional argument in favour of my opinion, in a declaration made only the other day in another place, that you do not mean to relax the penal laws against the Regulars; for upon what conceivable principle is it that you should continue to proscribe such men as Father Mathew in Ireland, unless it were upon the principle of concession to the fanatics in England?—but if I have overstrained my inferences, the noble Lord ought to be obliged to me for giving him this opportunity of explaining. But let but the Government disown all pernicious control from the Ultra-Protestant party—let them openly declare their determination to pursue their promised legislation for Ireland in the same spirit, and with the same magnanimity, as they displayed upon the Maynooth Bill—through good report and evil report—neither declining to the right hand nor to the left—equally regardless of the clamour of the fanatics in England, as they are of the cry of the Repealers in Ireland—weighing only the intrinsic virtue, merit, and wisdom of their measures, and their adaptation to the declared purposes for which they are intended—not acting with the vacillations of a party seeking to retain power and place at the expense of principle and consistency, but as a real, effective Government in the country, capable of controlling the bad, and of encouraging the good—busy in closing our lamentable divisions, and remedying the evils of the miserably diseased state of our population—thus professing, and thus acting, I trust that the blessing of Heaven would be upon their labours, and that they would ever receive that support from Parliament and the country which they would then so deservedly have earned. As a proof of their sincerity, I wish they would withdraw this measure for a season—for if they persevere in it, it will be but a fresh source of discord, instead of a boon of conciliation, in that unfortunate country for which it is destined—unfortunate only because you do not govern it with justice—I wish they would withdraw it for a time, and return with it in a fashion more suited to the wants and wishes of those for whom principally it is intended.

My Lords, I trust I have not said that which should reasonably offend any one—nothing was further from me; but I have deemed it right thus openly to express the deep convictions of my mind: more especially do I trust I have not said that which should hurt the feelings of the noble Marquess near me (the Marquess of Breadalbane) — I thought he had been still in the House—for I have ever admired the honesty of purpose which he has displayed, though I cannot but lament the delusions under which I believe him to be on these matters, and the countenance and support he thereby gives to a multitude of others less honest, and far more deluded than himself.

Lord Brougham begged to correct a misapprehension into which the noble Earl who had just spoken appeared to have fallen. He had meant nothing disrespectful by the interruption he had offered, either to the noble Earl himself, or the religion to which he belonged; but he wished to avoid an interminable controversy, quite wide of the subject before them. There was nothing so vexatious, unbearable, and harassing, as a speech of great ability, in which the talents and abilities of the excellent speaker only winged him away from the question at issue. In such a case, when the speaker turned his back upon the subject, and at every step he took receded farther and farther away, the suffering caused to the hearer was acute beyond conception. Returning to the question now before the House, he regarded this as a most judicious, wise, and liberal measure; judicious in its foundation, and in its superstructure answering to the excellence of its groundwork, for the establishment of four Colleges in Ireland, in which should be educated all Her Majesty's subjects, without distinction of party or sect, by the exclusion of all sectarian differences and theological education. What earthly connexion with the question, with any view men's wisdom could take of it, or any arguments men's faculties could raise upon it, could there be in a discussion of the historical merits of the Catholic religion? It seemed as if the noble Earl thought there was to be a professor hostile, in his teaching, to the Roman Catholic religion, appointed in each of these Colleges; but instead of that, there was to be no professor of theology either Catholic or Protestant. And for this simple reason, that if you were to teach theology, you could not make it a truly catholic College; that was to say, a College at which all sects of religion could be equally taught. The noble Earl had passed a splendid panegyric on the religion to which he belonged, as the nurse of arts, the patroness of science, enshrined in virtue, adorned by humanity, and founded in eternal truth. That might be true, or the reverse of true, but it was a question utterly foreign to the present discussion. If there was any one subject which ought not to be discussed in Parliament, it was the faith and creed of their Members, for which each individual was responsible only to his Maker. With respect to what the noble Earl said as to the sermon of the rev. incumbent of St. Matthew's, Rugby, in which he had discovered absurdity, fanaticism, disgraceful and notorious falsehood, he presumed the noble Earl had been actuated by a wish to show that all the abuse was not confined to one side of the controversy. He (Lord Brougham) had given his support to the Maynooth Bill, not because he had lowered his approval of Protestantism, or his disapproval of the Roman Catholic system, which he held to be as perfectly false in a theological sense as the noble Earl believed it to be perfectly true. Nor was there any inconsistency in his supporting that Bill, and maintaining his Protestantism, which he had as much right to do, as the noble Earl had to repudiate the present Bill, and uphold his Catholicism. He rejected the errors of the Roman Catholic Church, not only for its theological tendencies, but for its political mischiefs, and should do so until a more subtle doctor, and more powerful reasoner—one who could stick to the question, and argue upon it, and would not fly from it—than the noble Earl appeared. To come now to the measure before the House:—he held this to be one of the greatest measures, in its beneficial tendencies, as well as in the truly catholic (he did not mean Roman Catholic) and liberal principles on which it was constructed, that ever had been brought before the Parliament of the United Kingdom. It was of no more use to tell him that the whole Roman Catholic hierarchy were against this measure, than it would be to say that the whole Protestant hierarchy were against it. If the whole clergy and laity, Protestant and Roman Catholic, were against it, he should still maintain the soundness of the views on which it was founded, and the excellent machinery by which they were carried out. He had, infinitely, rather see the Catholic clergy approve of it; but he could not in any event, withhold his hearty gratitude to the Government for having brought it forward. He had never yet heard of any class of priests who were prone to approve of a measure that tended to sap their influence over their flocks Whether the present measure had that tendency he would not stop to inquire; but it was enough for them to think that it had such a tendency, in order to be alarmed at the prospect, and irritated to opposition. The principle on which the measure proceeded was, that whatever ought to be the case in England, it was most desirable and beneficial in Ireland, that all the youth of that country should unitedly participate in the benefit of education to be conferred by the new Colleges. It was on the ground of excluding all sectarian religious instruction, that the London University had been erected, in establishing which he had aided. He was not, however, one of those who hailed the present measure as the triumph of this principle; because the circumstances of the two countries were so different, that a man who was against it in England, might yet support its application to Ireland. While the proportions of the adherents of the established and dissenting Churches remained as they now were in Ireland, if you were to have any teaching at all, you must keep religious instruction apart. This was denounced as "a gigantic scheme of godless education," equally by the Repealers in Ireland, and their greatest enemies the high-church party, with a harmony more astonishing than edifying. The noble Earl argued that they would thus suffer their youth to grow up without religious education, which was far more important than any secular learning. He utterly denied that statement. Would they exclude religion by teaching the classics, mathematics, and natural philosophy, at certain hours, within the walls of the Colleges, while religious instruction was left to be given at home by the parents of the pupils, or the pastors of their several persuasions? Was it to be said that this system of giving religious instruction was not as good as that pursued at Oxford and Cambridge? If the advocates of the present Bill cared nothing about religion, then they might consistently say that Roman Catholics and Protestants, and Mahomedans and Hindoos, and all the sects of Protestant Dissenters — Baptists, Unitarians and Presbyterians — might all be taught the general principles of religion together, and make use of a common ritual among them. But they said "no" to that doctrine. They said, they could not allow religious principles to be compromised in any such manner, and it was on that account that they deemed it absolutely impossible to teach any system of religion within the walls of these Colleges. They acted according to the common consent of mankind in such matters. Where, he would ask, was it supposed necessary to combine religious education under the instruction given by a French master, or an Italian master, or a dancing master, or a professor of drawing? Were these branches of education deemed to be essentially connected with religion? Most decidedly not. He was at perfect liberty to procure a French master, or an Italian mistress, or a music or singing master, to teach his daughters, without at the same time thinking it necessary that these individuals should give religious instruction also; and had he not the same right to send his sons to learn Greek or mathematics, or anatomy, or chemistry, without connecting any of these branches of education with religious instruction? What possible difference, he would ask, could apply to one case, which would not be applicable with equal force to the other? Why, in one instance, should the system be thought perfectly safe, and in the other be characterized as a godless system of education. But then there was a wide distinction to be drawn between the Colleges proposed to be founded under this Bill, and some of the Universities of this country. A young man going to Oxford was entirely removed from the eye of his parents and pastors, and he was, therefore, in a very different position from children living under their fathers' or guardians' roof, and going daily to study at the College. That distinction ought to be always borne in mind in considering this question. In the case of Oxford or Cambridge, it was quite right and necessary that religious instruction should be combined with secular learning; but in University College and King's College, and, above all, in those four Irish Colleges, where the pupils were not to live within the walls of the institution — in those establishments which were, in fact, to be only day schools on a large scale—the case was very different. Such, then, being the fact, the total absurdity was obvious of the attempt to charge these Colleges with being of an irreligious tendency, to talk of their institution as a 'godless' system of education. Why such a charge should be made, he was really at a loss to find out; unless, indeed, it was because the system was one of 'priestless' education. The term 'godless' education, in fact, meant nothing except 'priestless' education, and the not instilling the youthful mind with such description of study as might be designated properly by the term, at the same time with secular education. The priests would much rather have the entire control of the education of all children in their own hands. They would much rather that no person should teach anything except themselves, they being perfectly well aware that if it were so, religious instruction would form nine parts out of ten of all the education they would impart, and that even the tenth would be strongly tinged with their religious opinions. Why was it that he made this remark? Because he had heard it openly avowed that it was dangerous to Catholicism and to the Romish faith, for Roman Catholic children to be taught any branch of learning—even anatomy, it had been said — if religion did not find its way, at the same time, into the youthful mind, through the person who used the dissecting knife, or who lectured on the uses and relative position of the bones. No instruction in the science was to be given without a sprinkling being at the same time imparted of Roman Catholic truth, as they called it, but Roman Catholic error, as it was termed in that House. There was another class of objectors to the measure, who were represented by the noble Lord opposite (Lord Eldon), who had introduced a petition to their notice in opening the debate from a hundred and odd Members of the University of Oxford. He had understood that noble Lord to say that these petitioners objected to any education which was not grounded on the religious 'system' of the Oxford and Cambridge Universities. Now, he marvelled greatly that so profound an ignorance should have obscured the learning of those distinguished individuals, as that they should speak of the 'system' of Oxford and Cambridge in the singular number; because, as regarded the question of religious instruction, no two systems could be more unlike—nay, more opposite to one another—than the systems followed by these bodies. In Oxford one could not matriculate without subscribing the Thirty-nine Articles, and consequently no person who was not a member of the Church of England—for it excluded Protestant Dissenters as well as

Roman Catholics—could enter any of the Colleges. At Cambridge there was no such subscription. The student might go through the whole curriculum without having any inquiries made respecting his form of faith, and it was only when he came to take his degree that he first heard of subscription. Therefore, instead of one system, they had two; and the system propounded by Her Majesty's Government for Ireland was precisely the Cambridge system, as opposed to that of Oxford. Therefore, if they had not the authority of the two great English Universities in favour of the present Bill, they had, at least, the authority of one of them, namely, Cambridge, in support of it. The University of Cambridge allowed all persons to study in it. The Mahomedan, the Hindoo, the Roman Catholic, and the Jew, could, as well as all the varieties of Protestant Dissenters, pursue their studies there; and as his noble Friend near him (Lord Monteagle) just reminded him, they might even pass their examination and take honours, though they could not acquire a degree of Bachelor of Arts, without subscription. With the exception of the post of Fellow, and the nominal, though he admitted highly respectable, titles of Master of Arts, Bachelor of Arts, Doctor of Divinity, and Bachelor of Divinity, there was no one part of the academical curriculum which persons of any religion might not go through. A man may be senior wrangler though a Roman Catholic or Jew; and in point of fact he knew one of the most eminent wranglers in Cambridge—he might, indeed, say two—who were Jews, and who ranked among the best mathematicians of the day. In the same manner some members of the Society of Friends had acquired eminence in that University, though they were obliged to stop short of taking a degree. One word more, and he would conclude. He confessed that he was one of those who, in the late controversy on the Maynooth question, could see no reason whatever for the line of argument which was now revived with regard to the present Bill, of confounding those questions with the principle of endowing the Catholic clergy. He never saw any connexion between the two measures, or never could perceive why a person who voted for one, might not take an opposite course with regard to the other. He thought the two lines of argument and of conduct perfectly consistent; but he should go a step further, and state as his opinion that the prospect of danger held out had nothing formidable in it. He had always thought, and the experience of every day of his life strengthened him in the belief—every reflection of his mind rooted the conviction more strongly within him—that it was a matter deeply to be regretted that they did not at the Union carry the Catholic question. The country ought ever to lament that fact; but having omitted it then, it was to be regretted that when they did carry that question in 1829, they did not accompany it with a wise, a liberal, and a wholesome measure for endowing the Roman Catholic clergy. And if ever he lamented this omission more than at another time—if ever he felt really vexed at it beyond what he had language to describe, it was when he reflected that without any more opposition than the Maynooth grant had met with—that without any more ferment in the country than existed on that occasion—that without any disagreement or dissension among political friends and co-religious fellow believers, than had been roused by the comparatively unimportant questions of the Maynooth grant and of the present Colleges—they might have carried that great measure, which every hour he lived made him think the more strongly was the only really effectual and ample cure for that unhappy part of the United Kingdom. He was told that if that question were brought forward, the Roman Catholic clergy would not thank them for the offer; that they had already repeatedly refused to have any thing to do with a state endowment; and that they would persist in resisting it. Credat Judæus! He had on a former occasion told them of a conversation which had taken place on this subject in Ireland, in which a noble Earl and a prelate of the Roman Catholic Church were concerned. He had stated that the opposition would be very great and very searching—that it would run through the whole Catholic hierarchy, but that it would have a limit in point of time, though it would have none in point of space. That it would be very strenuous—that it might be even very sincere, he would not deny; but that it would, notwithstanding all this, be limited as to time—of this he felt satisfied. But what was the moment when all this opposition to it would cease? It was the very instant when the Bill was carried, and provision actually made for the Roman Catholic clergy. To use the picturesque expression characteristic of their Irish neighbours, which he had before mentioned as having fallen from a prelate of that Church, no sooner would the State provision be offered to the lowest bidder, but the clergy of the Roman Catholic persuasion would be seen filling the Castle-yard like a flock of rooks. That was not his language; but it was the language of a right reverend prolocutor of their body. He must again express his regret, first, that no provision had been made for the Catholic clergy at the time his noble Friend, the noble Duke opposite, had added to his illustrious military name by the great act of statesmanship with which he was connected, and to which he (Lord Brougham) had before alluded. He regretted that at the time when that measure—which was the basis of all conciliation in Ireland—without which no measure of improvement could be worth anything whatever—which of itself was not everything, no more than the air is everything to life; but as without air life becomes extinct, so without the great measure of 1829 no other measure of conciliation could be applied, or have any hope of success—he regretted deeply that at that time, the measure of relief was not accompanied with a provision for the payment of the Roman Catholic clergy by the State. But he lamented still more that the Bill for the endowment of the College of Maynooth had not been accompanied with a provision for the Roman Catholic hierarchy. He begged to remind their Lordships that this was not the first occasion when the question of endowing the Catholic Church in Ireland had been brought forward. In the year 1825, Lord Francis Egerton, in the other House of Parliament, proposed to grant 250,000*l.* a year for the endowment of the Roman Catholic Church, and he (Lord Brougham) voted for it. The proposition of that noble Lord was to pay 1,500*l.* and 1,200*l.* a year each to the archbishops; from 800*l.* to 1,000*l.* a year to the bishops; from 400*l.* to 500*l.*, or rather he believed 300*l.* a year to thirty or forty deans or cathedral appointments; and from 150*l.* to 250*l.*, and 300*l.* a year to parish priests. When he heard it objected to his right hon. Friend (Sir R. Peel) in the other House, at the present day, that he was inconsistent in bringing forward the Maynooth grant and this other measure, for the founding of Colleges in Ireland, after his former opposition to the Catholic claims, he could not forget that his right hon. Friend, on the occasion of Lord Francis Egerton's Motion, had stated in answer to a question raised by him (Lord Brougham), that his objection to the measure was twofold—first, that he did not know whether the Roman Catholic hierarchy would be pleased with it; but yet that he did not rely on that objection so much as on the second, which was the main objection, and but for which he would have given his support to the Motion; and that was, that the Catholic question had not been yet carried. "If," said he, "the Catholic question had been carried, the case would have been wholly different. We are beginning at the wrong end. Let the Catholic question be carried, and then the Roman Catholic hierarchy may be pensioned." Some two months ago, when he heard the clamour which had been raised against his right hon. Friend, he had resort, in order to satisfy himself on the point, to the debates for the period. He had compared two different accounts together, and the result was the statement which he had just made. It was a very great mistake to suppose that by such a Bill they would weaken the foundation of their Protestantism. On the contrary, his entire and full persuasion was, that the established religion would become more secure by such a step. He well remembered having been told by a noble Friend of his, who was now present, that the late Lord Castlereagh, than whom no man was more consistently anxious for the Catholic question, had always treated the repeal of the penal code, and the necessity for endowing the Roman Catholic clergy, as one and the same measure; that he could not conceive the one without the other. He had this statement from his noble Friend, who—connected as he had been with that noble Lord by marriage—had a full opportunity of knowing his sentiments on the subject, and he had seen it since stated also by the Knight of Kerry in a pamphlet. That noble Lord had been a high authority on the subject; for no man could be more attached to the Establishment, or to the necessity of continuing Protestant ascendancy in the country; and no man could be better acquainted with the priests, as well as the laity of Ireland. When he found such an authority, supported as it was by all who had most profoundly consulted the national interests of the Irish Church and of the Irish people, he thought as if he had found a rock whereon to rest his case. The noble Lord then continued:—"I can cite the venerable authority of the dead, as well as the great names of the living, on this point. It gives me pain, but at the same time a melancholy satisfaction, that I am to-night bound to enrol among that illustrious class who have departed from amongst us one who for so many years was one of the greatest ornaments of this and of the other House of Parliament. And if among the clouds of political controversy, and the still denser mists of religious differences, I may be permitted to pass for an instant to another subject, and to cast my eye to that illustrious name that has just departed from amongst us,* I trust my feelings will be pardoned for taking this first opportunity that has offered of saying that, although I have seen many men of powerful mind—many men of high, unsullied honour—many men of pure and amiable feelings and disposition—yet it has never happened to me to know of these three excellencies being found in such combination as in the person of my illustrious Friend who has now paid the debt of nature, and who, from that happy combination, lived only to be admired, and venerated, and beloved. He, of all men, held this opinion most strongly, most consistently, and for it made the greatest sacrifices. To give liberty to Ireland, by emancipating the Catholics—to give equal rights to our fellow subjects, by making one law serve for the poor as for the rich too—and to adopt all other courses consequent on these great improvements which would make that country no longer the scene of civil faction and religious feud, but the abode of peace, and of that national prosperity to which her natural resources and the talents and the virtues of her people entitle her; and as subservient to that end, to take the mischief from the hands of the mischief maker, by paying the clergy by a State endowment—liberally to endow the Catholic Church—judiciously, but liberally, was one of the most favourite objects of the life of the statesman whose loss we now deplore. It has been said—Ut malignos cessare faciam, otiosos reddam. To make them no longer agitators by leaving them no longer a grievance about which to agitate—this was the doctrine which he held through life, and to which no man of any party ever made greater sacrifices.

The Earl of Carnarvon: Having given, on a very recent occasion, my uncompromising support to my noble Friends on the Treasury Bench on a great question of religious policy, and being a decided advocate for the adoption of large and liberal measures towards Ireland, I find myself, with pain, compelled to oppose the Bill which Her Majesty's Ministers have just introduced into the House. I quite concur in the temperate address of those temperate and enlightened, calm thinking, and considerate men, whose petition from the University of Oxford has been presented by my noble Friend who has just sat down (the Earl of Eldon). Like them I come forward in reluctant but decided opposition to the present measure. I quite concur with them in thinking, that interests the most sacred are endangered by this Bill; they feel, indeed, that, with this conviction on their minds, silence would be servility; and that, when weighed in the balance, their natural desire to support the Ministers of the Crown must not be put even in momentary competition with what they conceive to be their duty to their country and their God. And I am sure, my Lords, that, proceeding from men influenced by such feelings, and so well qualified to form a sound judgment on a question of academical instruction, I am sure that, whether or not your Lordships may respond to the prayer of their petition, you will at least give it all the weight and consideration it deserves. In the observations which may fall from me on this Bill, my noble Friends on the Treasury Bench must be well aware that I am not actuated by any feeling of general hostility towards their Irish policy. Much of that policy I approve, but with reference to the measure before us, Her Majesty's Ministers take one view of the subject; and I, in common with your Oxford petitioners, take, most distinctly, another. In the universal ferment of the public mind for and against Maynooth, this Bill did not at first attract very general attention; at first it slept under the shadow of Maynooth, but it is, in my humble opinion, a question of far mightier moment. From the absence of those elements of success which usually give practical effect to legislative measures, from the undisguised aversion in which it is held by parties the most dissimilar in Ireland, it may indeed fail in the results contemplated by its projectors, and be alike powerless for good or for evil; but if this measure be attended by what my noble Friend on the Treasury Bench calls success, if it attract a great concourse of scholars, I shall then regard it as one of the most important measures of domestic policy which has been for many years submitted to Parliament; and when I reflect on the probable consequences resulting from the determination of Government to exclude religious instruction as a regular part of their system; when I think of the direct evil of positive religious ignorance which may be anticipated from this mode of leaving religious instruction to adjust itself as it may, and on the indirect mischief produced by that discredit into which religious instruction may fall in the minds of people from seeing it severed, by a deliberate act of the Government, from secular instruction, the one required the other barely tolerated; when I remember that this is a system to operate upon the middling classes, upon the rising generation and future strength of Ireland, and which, if sanctioned on the present occasion, may hereafter be introduced into our old collegiate bodies, perhaps into that very University of Oxford which has to-night sent up its prayer against this Bill; why, then, my Lords, when I ponder on all these considerations, I feel that this indeed is one of the most important measures we have ever had to consider; and I greatly fear that if your Lordships permit this Bill to pass into law in its present form, you will have dealt the heaviest blow that has ever yet been struck against the interests of religion by a British Parliament. In a religious point of view, I believe, my Lords, that those noble Lords who, from conscientious feelings, were opposed to the Maynooth endowment, and those who were friendly to it, sought the same end, though by widely different means. Noble Lords who were opposed to that measure resisted it as calculated, in their opinion, to impede the advance of true religious knowledge; we, on the contrary, who voted for it, felt that we were advancing truths, intermixed with error, but still great Christian truths, in the only way in which they could be practicably introduced among a Roman Catholic population. They in their opposition to, we in our advocacy of the measure, sincerely felt that we were fighting for the cause of religious instruction; but in the Bill before us, we disclaim religious instruction of any kind, as a necessary part of the educational course; we utterly abandon that field of instruction which we have been accustomed from our cradles to regard as the most essential to the welfare of man in his position here, and with reference to his views hereafter. Let us consider, my Lords, a little, the tendencies and provisions of this Bill. At what age will youths be admitted into these Colleges? At the age of fifteen, or sixteen, or seventeen, at latest, I suppose; for my noble Friends have given us no very exact information on this point. Well, my Lords, from this early period of existence, as far as the fundamental laws of the Colleges prescribe, religious instruction may be to them a sealed page; habits of attendance on divine worship which, if not embraced in early life, are seldom taken up in the business and multiplied avocations of after years, are either entirely dispensed with, or left to the option of the youth himself, at a time of life when he generally consults the inclination of the hour, and is incapable of deciding with judgment on moral points. I cannot call this a Christian measure of education. You cannot, indeed, force a man to be a Christian; but you are bound to instruct him in the Christian faith at that tender age, when you are commanded to "train him in the way in which he should go." Religion disowned, or, at least, unhonoured by the State, will be too often utterly neglected by the scholar; and he will leave these Colleges stored, perhaps, with every species of knowledge, but that which teaches a man how to live, and how to die. An accurate knowledge of the Scriptures—an accurate knowledge of the external and internal evidences on which our faith depends, cannot be really obtained without much labour and investigation; and is it likely that in the race for those secular honours which you are about to establish, in the struggle for pre-eminence between youthful competitors, which, if the Colleges grow into importance, will become keener and keener; is it likely, that in the midst of the stringent examinations you have announced your intention to institute; is it likely, I say, that under all these circumstances the student will pause long on that species of instruction, which you permit indeed but do not exact; which does not forward him one jot in the eager race he is running; which conduces to no immediate results; which leads to no immediate distinction; and which, however valuable, has not that kind of value which youth readily appreciates. If religious and secular instruction be thus dissevered, the advance of the one must necessarily be injurious to the progress of the other. By the plan now proposed, we afford every possible incitement for the acquisition of secular knowledge; we hold out no one inducement to the attainment of that which is religious. This is a false position for any Government to take up, or for any educational institution to occupy in a Christian country. My noble Friend the Secretary for the Colonies, has adverted to Oxford. Far different is the case at that University. Religious knowledge is there essential to the attainment of a degree; and, therefore, in the course of study pursued by the undergraduate, religious and secular instruction advance pari passu, and work harmoniously for the general good of the scholar. My noble Friend has stated that every facility will be afforded by the Government, and has argued as if religious endowments instituted by individuals must necessarily take place. Years, however, may elapse, before these endowments are made, and I do not feel secure that they may be ever made at all; but granting that there is a prospect—granting even that a high probability exists that such endowments will be founded, can it be right to leave so grave a matter, so great an interest, to the hazard of the die? I shall consider it, my Lords, a deep reproach to this House, if a single year roll over our heads, and religion be untaught in any academical institution founded by the State. Facilities have existed for establishing private endowments at Maynooth for fifty years; but I believe this power has never been exercised, with the solitary exception of the Dunboyne appointment. What then has taken place at Maynooth, may well again occur at these new institutions. I cannot think that a measure which assures no religious discipline, which leaves attendance on divine worship contingent on the enactment of by-laws, and even the opportunity of acquiring religious instruction on the charity of individuals, can be right in an institution founded by the State. I think, that if a Government actually interferes with the education of the country, it should stand, as far as it can possibly do so, not only loco parentis, but in the place of the most judicious and solicitous parent; and what solicitous parent would leave the religious education of his child a matter of conjecture and of hope, and not, as far as he could assure it, of moral certainty? We are told that religious instruction is conferred on our children at public schools, not by divinity lectures, but by placing them under some religious man as a tutor, and are asked why may not a similar course be pursued in these institutions? My Lords, there is no analogy whatever in the two cases. Almost every tutor at our great public schools, at least at those with which I am acquainted, is a clergyman of the Established Church; and now that the public eye is so much directed to our public seminaries, the tutors are generally chosen from men not only of considerable attainments but of known piety, and whose attention has often been for years directed to religious subjects. But in the Colleges proposed, where the tutors will be chosen without any reference to religious qualifications, what certainty can a parent have, that a single professor may be found, to whom he can entrust the religious education of his child with any degree of certainty that it will be really and earnestly inculcated? At Oxford—with Cambridge I am less acquainted—but at Oxford certainly, at Eton under Dr. Hawtrey, and at Winchester under Dr. Barter and Dr. Moberly—religious instruction has greatly improved within the last few years; but there, the ministers of the Established Church fill the different posts of instruction. At Eton there are seventeen tutors, men not only learned, but enlightened up to the general knowledge of the day, and, in my humble opinion, to the incalculable advantage of the youth committed to their charge, ministers of the Established Church. Where such is the prevailing system, a religious spirit becomes necessarily mixed up, to a certain extent, with the studies, and still more with the intercourse, which takes place between the tutor and pupil; and thus, religious impressions, which are quite as efficacious in determining the future bent of mind as religious knowledge itself, become habitually and almost unconsciously picked up by the pupil. But where religious opinion is no qualification for the post of instruction, and no security is given that the professors be not completely latitudinarian, mere scientific worldly knowledge is just as often opposed, as it is favourable, to the growth of a religious spirit. Let it not, however, be supposed, from what I have just observed, that religion at Eton is only indirectly taught. I have a son at that flourishing establishment, and he regularly attends his tutor's * religious examinations. The most objectionable feature of this Bill with respect to the education of our youth in the new Colleges, has reference to the mode in which it totally dissevers them from the established clergy of the country. To the superintendence of that clergy over the youth of the country, and to the discipline carried on under their auspices, do I attribute, in a great measure, that steady principle, and tempered manliness of thought and character, which are so frequently perceptible in men brought up at our public schools and Universities, and which presents so strong a contrast to that exaggeration of opinion and of conduct which marks so large a portion of the foreign collegiate youth. But, my Lords, this influence, this salutary influence of the clergy, has no place under this Bill; no Prelate or ecclesiastical superior will be called upon to exercise a judgment, or even to have a voice in the nomination or removal of the professors. ["No!"] A noble Friend near me dissents; but I say there is no such provision in the Bill; and, consequently, there exists not a shadow of reason for supposing that their opinions will be called for with reference to those appointments; nor will there be any chaplains to instruct the mind of youth in the Holy Word; nor any discipline to enforce attendance upon public worship, and to train up the young student in virtuous and regular habits; nor any theological professor to lead the mind into a course of serious investigation; nor any examinations to ascertain, that religious instruction, if indeed any religious doctrines, by any fortunate chance, be ever broached within those walls, is duly acquired. My Lords, that close connexion between the clergy and the education of the youth of this country which has made our gentry the first gentlemen in the world, because they are the first in principle, and has gone far in rendering the people of this kingdom not only great but good, is proscribed by the Bill before us; and the influence of the Church of England, and the spirit of religion, will be alike extinct—nay not extinct—for it will never have even a momentary existence in these Irish Colleges about to be established by the Ministers of the Crown. I am not insensible to the difficulties which surround the Government with reference to this question; but I regret, deeply regret the mode in which they have abruptly cut, and not attempted to unravel the Gordian knot. I agree with my noble Friends on the Treasury Bench, that if religious instruction is to be administered within these Colleges to members of the Established Church, it must also be administered to others not of that faith; but this principle has been acted upon over and over again: and I think it is rather strange to contend at this time of day, when we have admitted Roman Catholic chaplains into our gaols and workhouses, concurrently with Protestant ministers, and without experiencing any inconvenient results—it seems strange to contend that we should refuse to admit any chaplains at all for the instruction of their youth and of ours, in places of education, where I should have thought their services would have been required. ["Oh, oh."] My noble Friend near me need not be alarmed. I am not about to enter upon the delicate question of concurrent endowments; such a proposition would, I know, be very displeasing to many of your Lordships, and, if adopted at the present moment, might involve the Government in difficulties which no friend would wish to impose upon them. But might no middle course be steered, which would deliver the Government and the Legislature from an embarrassment of this kind, and would yet relieve the measure from the odium under which it now labours, and justly labours, of being opposed to the religious feelings of every party in the country. Why should not my noble Friends consent to the enactment of a clause which should prevent the reception of scholars in these Colleges, till private endowments have been instituted, sufficient to assure the public mind that religious and secular instruction shall not be dissociated in these Irish Colleges? This proviso would not disturb or disarrange the machinery of your Bill; and if you really are of opinion, as you say you are, that private benefactions will ultimately take place under this system, would not such a determination, adopted by you the Ministers of the Crown, act as a stimulus, and hasten the period of these endowments? If enlightened men attach the importance which you say they do to the industrial and scientific knowledge to be communicated at these Colleges, will they not combine, independently even of religious considerations, and subscribe that amount of funds which may be required to establish the religious foundations, as the only means of bringing the Colleges themselves into early operation? I shall submit no cut and dried plan to your Lordships, because I know well, that at this late period of the Session at which this Bill has been brought up to us, at this the eleventh hour of the measure, and in the present state of the House, and temper of men's minds, no prospect would exist of carrying such an extensive modification; but what is impossible for an individual is easy to a Government. I know I may be asked a thousand questions: with what amount of private benefactions I would be satisfied; where would I draw my line; what classes of sectarians would I admit. I will not enter upon such a fruitful field of controversy, if there is no hope that any proposition of the nature to which I have adverted will be entertained; but this I will say, that, to the fair and manly eye of common sense, a reasonable line of demarcation would appear—by no means removing all inconveniences, not unattended by difficulties either in principle or in practice—but which yet would satisfy the minds of just thinking and considerate men, that, in a somewhat difficult position, Her Majesty's Ministers had done their best to obviate the scruples and meet the wishes of earnest minded men, and to efface from this measure that which, say what you please, will be considered a blot, an irreparable and deadly blot, alike by the Protestants of England, and the Roman Catholics of Ireland. If it be argued that my proposition would indefinitely postpone the opening of the Colleges, why then, I say, that if, under the influence of such a stimulus, private endowments are not instituted to the desired extent, we have the gravest reason to apprehend that, without any such impelling motive, the benefactions will be small indeed, or none at all; and then we are brought at once to that frightful admission, that education is likely to be conducted in the Irish Colleges without any admixture of religion. Education, my Lords, ill regulated, is like the giant made by man in the fairy tale—fatal to those who have called it into existence; but by impregnating it with the heavenly spark, with that which purifies all it lights upon, nil tangit quod non ornat, you make the monster not only harmless but beneficial, and as available for good as for great purposes. I doubt whether my proposition would entail any delay; but if such were the result, I do not think that a little delay would prejudice the cause; a little delay in your proceedings may possibly assuage the angry feeling prevalent among Irishmen, and will at least show that you respect their honest, even if you consider them, which I do not, mistaken views. If, in addition to these arrangements, your Lordships would decide that the authorities of their own respective faiths should have power to require the attendance of their youth at their respective places of worship; if a certificate to show that every pupil had made due progress in his religious studies under his own religious instructor were considered essential to the attainment of honours at an examination, and to the conferring of a degree, I believe the suspicions of all parties would be disarmed; I believe the Bill would be then approved of by good and considerate men; I believe it would be no longer a measure of irritation and well-founded distrust, but, on the contrary, of love, conciliation, and peace. I am not insensible to the argument raised by some high-minded men against the propriety of taking any step which may have the effect of appearing to sanction different, and to some extent contradictory, systems of faith; still, my Lords, I feel that within certain limits a Christian should bend to circumstances for the general good of the Christian cause; and where vital truth is to be found, even if it be encrusted with error, it is our duty, if we have no power to substitute a better system—it is our duty to encourage, not to withhold, the religion which may save, because it may be in our opinion tempered with some or even with much of alloy. My noble Friend the Secretary for the Colonies has endeavoured to impress upon your Lordships, that the establishment of professors of different persuasions must necessarily engender interminable strife and confusion. I am not going, my Lords, to argue on the present occasion in favour of concurrent endowments. This, I have already observed, but I must pause to ask, whether these assertions of my noble Friend can be borne out by experience? I have heard that in Vienna, a capital situated in the midst of a Roman Catholic population, devotedly attached to the Roman Catholic faith, there is a Protestant theological chair; and yet that Austrian institution is harassed by no religious dissensions; in Bohn and other towns in Germany, the professors of different persuasions inculcate their different faiths without any inconvenient results. Is my noble Friend, who was so long Chief Secretary in Ireland, prepared to declare that Ireland is the only country in which the professors of the different religions cannot live in peace? But facts, my Lords, and not analogy alone, disprove the reasoning of my noble Friend. Why, at this moment, if I mistake not greatly, there are two sets of professors in the Belfast Institution maintaining different creeds, and both are salaried by the Government, and yet the institution is not disturbed by their feuds. My noble Friends do not contradict me. I am, therefore, correct in my statement. The positions of my noble Friend on this point are utterly untenable. Again, when my noble Friend dilates upon the dissatisfaction and endless strife which would result from the establishment of professors of different faiths in the same institution, does he forget that if the expectations of the Government be realized, if professors of different faiths be placed by private endowments in the different chairs, as they maintain will be the case, does he forget that the controversial spirit he dreads so much, and which would be necessarily engendered in his opinion by conflicting religious endowments, would be the natural and certain result of the Ministerial scheme itself, of which he is one of the authors and promoters. Or will he maintain that greater harmony is likely to prevail among professors of differing creeds established by private benefactions, than among men appointed by the Government, and grateful for that appointment. What, then, is the value of this argument of my noble Friend, with reference to the danger of controversy? an argument which has been used to-night to justify our placing religion under a positive ban and sentence of excommunication. My noble Friend casts his own arguments to the winds. He has argued to-night on the policy of establishing institutions in which the education of Roman Catholic and Protestant may be conjointly carried on. Separate institutions, we are told, would prevent the growth of that happy intercourse between Roman Catholic and Protestant, which, formed in the golden days of early life, so greatly tend to eradicate the prejudices resulting from difference of religious belief. There is, unquestionably, weight in this argument, and I for one do not believe that these advantages need be foregone; in my humble judgment, a blending of the youth is not incompatible with good religious instruction for both; but if it really be incompatible, as you maintain, why then separate institutions, which would enable both parties to carry their own religious views into complete effect, are surely preferable to the abandonment of all religious instruction by the State; are surely preferable, even without reference to those higher considerations which should have weight with your Lordships are preferable, even in a hard dry-politic point of view, to that storm of Irish unpopularity which has already burst upon these institutions yet in embryo —institutions whose only hope of success depends on their cordial reception by the people among whom they are planted. Separate institutions do not involve unjust ascendancy, and it is this which galls the Irish mind, and of this you should eradicate every vestige in your legislation. But when my noble Friend expatiates on the harmony which is likely to arise from this measure, what credit can we give to his anticipations? Are the signs of the times in accordance with his prophecy? The clergy of this country are generally opposed to the Bill. The Representatives of the University of Oxford have voted against it. Is it probable that the clergy of the Established Church in Ireland, which dislikes the National Board because it only gives extracts from Scripture, will regard with favour a system which teaches no Scripture at all. Mr. O'Connell, the leader of the Roman Catholic masses, is utterly hostile to it; the most influential of the Irish Members have denounced it, and the Roman Catholic prelates have declared it injurious to the faith and morals of their youth. Do you think, my Lords, that the priesthood of Ireland, whose influence you have yourselves admitted to be essential to the pacification of Ireland, whose opinion is literally law with millions, do you think they will regard with satisfaction a measure condemned by those with whom they are in the habit of acting, and to whom they look up with reverence and affection? and can you believe that without their co-operation these institutions are likely to take root among the Roman Catholic population of that country? By the measure of Maynooth you conciliated, by this Bill you may alienate, the power that influences millions. By this Bill we shall probably neutralize the good effects of our recent policy, and undo with our left hand what we have just done with our right. For what conceivable object shall we force reluctant parties in Ireland to accept, at a great cost that which you may call a boon, but which they stigmatize as a curse upon their country. I believe this measure will either prove an utter failure, or another bitter source of discord in that sufficiently distracted country. When you see men of such different parties concurring in one common denunciation of the measure; when you see on the Protestant side of the question such names as those of the Members of the University of Oxford, and those appended to the petition which my noble Friend has to-night presented to the House; and on the Roman Catholic side of the question such names as some of those who appear adverse to the Bill among the Roman Catholic hierarchy; men who last year stood manfully by Her Majesty's Ministers, and braved much obloquy in their behalf in endeavouring to carry out the provisions of that excellent measure the Charitable Bequests Bill; when you see this, all this, my Lords, have you not some suspicion that opposition from such varied and honourable sources would not have arisen, unless this Bill had been utterly distasteful to the feelings of religious men of every party, and pregnant with danger to the interests of all religion? My noble Friend has adverted in terms of unnecessary censure to a memorial recently issued by the Roman Catholic Prelates of Ireland. They may be mistaken on one or two points; but are they so very wrong in all their positions? Are they so very wrong in believing that on many subjects the professors of one persuasion cannot safely instruct the youth of another? Take, for instance, the department of history? Would not the religious faith of the professor, in nineteen instances out of twenty, affect his general course of instruction—give even, sometimes, an undue colouring to facts, and trench pretty strongly, at particular periods, on the confines of that very religious instruction which you so deeply deprecate? Is it likely that the most influential event in modern history—the mighty movement of the Reformation—with all its important chain of consequences, would be viewed in the same light, or treated in the same spirit, by the Roman Catholic and the Protestant professor? The very supposition appears to me to be founded on a belief that the instructor of youth shall be devoid of all religious impressions—which God forbid in any institution foudned by the State. Again, on subjects of moral philosophy the Roman Catholics differ, in some respects, materially from us. I concur, however, with my noble Friend in thinking, that the chairs of anatomy and geology may be safely occupied by Roman Catholic or Protestant professors; but I think it of immense importance that those chairs should be filled by men of Christian views, because there are no sciences, particularly that of geology, which, if treated in an artful and unfriendly spirit, can be made more easily subservient to the purpose of shaking the faith of inexperienced youth; and when it is triumphantly contended that some doubting geological allusion can scarcely shake a man's well-founded faith, your Lordships must remember, that you are subjecting to this ordeal youths in the first dawn of manhood, of whom by far the greater number will never have applied their minds for five minutes together to any consecutive train of thought, on any serious or speculative subjects, during the whole course of their previous lives. My noble Friend has asked us whether we will cling to the system of Oxford and Cambridge in compelling the adoption of tests? He has specifically alluded to tests as applied to professors, and tests as applied to students. I admit that it is of more importance to ascertain that the student, during his residence in the College, has become grounded in the great truths of his faith, than to make him state at his matriculation what he exactly believes to be true; but with reference to professors, the test has this undoubted advantage, that it prevents a man from openly teaching that which is in opposition to his test—in short, from endeavouring to subvert the doctrine he has sworn to observe. But my noble Friends have felt it incumbent upon them to refuse that test, little stringent as it was, which was proposed in another place as an amendment on this Bill, and which simply required the professors to declare the Holy Scriptures to contain, in their opinion, the revealed Word of God. It has been to-night asserted, that the power of appointing the professors and removing them by the authority of the Crown, obviates the danger of improper nominations, and renders the imposition of tests unnecessary. Now, my Lords, I believe that my noble Friends will endeavour to select as professors men of moral and religious character; and I trust they will pursue this course, not only because the eye of the country is upon them, but from better and higher motives. Still, I cannot look upon this part of the question, with any reference to my noble Friends on this side, or with any reference to my noble Friends on that side of the House. In a matter of this magnitude, I must look to the principle itself, I must look to the case of governments yet unborn; and when we remember the extent to which Governments are pressed on the subject of patronage and appointment, and the temptation under which they naturally labour rather to favour those who support them politically, than to listen to the claims of abstract merit; when we remember how little time a Minister, absorbed by the pressing duties of the moment, can devote to ascertain those distinctions and niceties of character upon which so much of educational success depends—I cannot bring myself to believe, that the power of nomination and removal by the Crown, without the recommendation or sanction of any ecclesiastical board, affords any permanent security whatever against improper doctrines being taught, or, what is far more difficult to guard against, being insinuated with fatal effect from those chairs—a very possible evil, an evil which has prevailed to a great extent in the Foreign Universities, and to which my noble Friends did not seem altogether insensible, when they contended not a week ago, against the abrogation of the Scotch tests. My noble and learned Friend, who spoke third in the debate, adverted in considerable detail to the London University. He observed, that the principle about to be adopted in the Irish Colleges, is that which prevails in the London University; and from this circumstance he argues success. As it is not essential to the matter before us, I will not enter into a question so delicate as that of the success or failure of this University in a religious point of view; but I must remind my noble and learned Friend that, although University College may enjoy the same glorious exemption from religious thraldom as that which is to be conferred on these Irish institutions, still in my humble opinion the parallel does not hold; because University College was founded on the principle, that, after the labours of the day, the pupils would return to their families there to receive religious instruction. But in the Irish Colleges the pupils will by no means invariably come from the towns in which the Colleges are situated, but often from a considerable distance; and therefore cannot return in the evening to receive the benefit of parental instruction. But I carry the matter further than my noble and learned Friend; further than many of your Lordships; and further, much further, than the Ministers of the Crown. I think that if a Government founds an educational institution, it entails upon itself by that very act, responsibilities of the gravest kind, and duties which it cannot delegate. I cannot acquiesce in the principle which has been laid down, and almost admitted, that when the parents of the pupils are living in the towns where the Colleges are situated, it is unnecessary to afford that portion of the youth religious instruction within the walls of the institution. I wholly dissent from this view; parents may be irreligious or indifferent; or, absorbed by various avocations, may refrain from giving up sufficient time to the religious instruction of their children. Many too naturally well-disposed may be utterly disqualified by their own early education and habits of mind, from administering religious instruction on any thing like a sound and definite basis. I think, my Lords, that when a Government founds an educational institution, it engages, as far as human imperfection can engage for the future, to remedy to the best of its ability all those irregularities of circumstance and position which bear hardly on the individual members of that common family of children which it admits to the benefits of a common education; and as it gives the best secular instruction to the child who cannot obtain it under the paternal roof, so it should make up to the offspring of incapable or irreligious parents that which is not his own fault, but the misfortune of his birth. I think a Government is bound to act upon these principles in founding great educational institutions—for such these are. These are not merely lecture rooms which you are about to establish, but a system affecting the whole of the sister island, involving examinations, honours, ultimately degrees, and all the incidents of a University system; and yet you deliberately propose to exclude religion—that which in a Christian country should be the moving principle, the sun and centre of your system. These institutions are, I suppose, intended for the public good; and we cannot more effectually promote the public weal, than by training up our population in habits of religious discipline and faith, or more prejudicially affect it, than by neglecting such precautions. Let me turn your attention, my Lords, for a moment from domestic matters. Let me direct your attention for an instant to the state of the University in France. I do not mean to say that any close parallel can be instituted between the state of society in Ireland and in France. On the contrary the circumstances of the two people are in many respects widely dissimilar; still the actual condition of the French University has a direct bearing on the present question, because it shows the fearful consequences which may be induced by the existence of academical institutions from which religion is practically banished by the State. Here you have, indeed, a glorious example of institutions and authorities utterly divested of religious prepossessions and restrictions. However prejudicial this state of things in the French University, it was in harmony with public feeling, while France was slumbering in the night of utter infidelity; but within the last year, and most especially within the last two years, a prodigious reaction has taken place in the public mind; in the provincial towns churches are now crowded, which were deserted a few years ago; even at Paris at Notre Dame, on Easter Day alone, 3,000 communicants gathered round the altar; two or three years ago the number on such occasions was inconsiderable indeed. And this returning spirit of religion in France has engaged the Church in a struggle, inevitable on their part, with the University; a struggle which will probably involve the Government, at no distant day, in difficulties of a very serious kind. The religious party in France, fast growing in numbers and importance, complain, and with truth, that no young man can pass through the University without imminent danger of losing every principle of Christian faith which he may have imbibed at home. The irreligious state of the University retards the revival of temperate and practical religion in France; and perhaps, on the other hand, favours the progress of those Ultramontane principles which your Lordships dread so much, because religious men, compelled to choose between positive infidelity and perhaps too much belief, range themselves in a strengthening phalanx for the Jesuits, against a University which systematically corrupts their youth, and a Government which, however mild in its general policy, in this respect grievously oppresses their consciences. Look, my Lords, at the astounding spectacle of no less than fifty Bishops of the Gallican Church, men many of them of high and spotless character, appointed not by the Pope, but by the King, yet now arrayed in open opposition to his Government, supported by their clergy, and by an increasing number of the laity, all protesting solemnly against that place of education as pregnant with utter ruin to the youth entrusted to their charge; that University founded on the very same principles on which we are preparing to establish the Irish Colleges. Shall we commit the same fault with such a warning example before our eyes? shall we, with this experience staring us in the face, build up institutions on similar principles — institutions calculated to poison the stream of knowledge at the fountain-head, and to make, or at least run an imminent risk of making, the rising generation and future manhood of the country insensible to those great truths which have made our people not only the most powerful, but the most respected in the world. My noble Friend has observed that the state of religious opinion and religious parties in Ireland renders it impossible to introduce into that country the same system of religious instruction which may be expedient in the older Universities of England; but if it be true that great differences in the social condition of the two countries prevent the adoption of the same system, was it therefore necessary to reject, in the concoction of this scheme, every principle of a religious tendency, and to oppose every amendment that might have invested the Bill before us with a really religious character. Propositions have been made in another place, which would have greatly mitigated my objections to this Bill, had they received the assent of His Majesty's Ministers. Had the Government sanctioned the proposition brought forward by my noble Friend (Lord Mahon), with his usual ability, that the theological chairs should be supported by lecture fees, without calling on the State for payment; if the Government would have agreed to an amendment made by an eminent individual, that the halls for religious instruction should be built out of the public money; had it also been determined that chaplains should be appointed, and that the list of visitors should include the names of the ecclesiastical authorities of the district —this Bill would have been, in my humble opinion, divested of many of its gravest objections. My noble Friend has tauntingly adverted to the system pursued at the University of Oxford in our younger days, and has asked whether indeed it worked so well that we should give it an undoubted preference over that pursued at Edinburgh, where, I believe, no religious instruction is enforced at all. Unquestionably at the time to which he adverts, religious instruction at Oxford was practically in a very defective state, although an efficient remedy has been since applied to the evil; and yet an inference seems to be drawn, that because the system was defective at that time, there can be no great harm in now omitting altogether religious instruction in the new Colleges. My Lords, this is the most extraordinary position it has ever been my lot to hear laid down. If I adopted this strain of argument with respect to secular instruction, what would you say?—if I reminded your Lordships that in the time of Gibbon, young men lounged all the livelong day up and down High-street, never opened a book, or called into useful exercise a single faculty which God had given them; if I reminded your Lordships of this undoubted state of things, and then observed, this was the state of secular instruction at that time; our fathers grew up under that system, and why should it not suit as well the generation of the present day in the Irish Colleges? if I said this, would not your Lordships ask me in what visionary train of thought I had been indulging—whether I really conceived that the world had stood still since that time, that I could imagine it possible to engraft the comparative ignorance, or rather the indifference to the acquisition of knowledge which then prevailed on the light, and science, and information of the present busy age? I ask my noble Friends a similar question. There has sprung up in men's minds within the last few years as great a difference of feeling in matters of religious as of secular import. Shall secular instruction, then, be pushed to its utmost verge, and religious education be alone neglected?—that instruction which can alone give real value to secular knowledge—that which is the keystone to the arch—that without which you may stimulate the intellect, but cannot regulate it; that without which you may make clever, but cannot make good citizens;—shall this be altogether stationary when every other species of instruction is rapidly progressive. The complaint is, that, some years ago, religious discipline and instruction were not sufficiently enforced at Oxford; but in this Bill, religion has not an authorized habitation or a name. The defective state of religious education at Oxford, some years ago, was not so much attributable to inherent faults in the system, as to that general deadness to religious matters, produced by many causes connected with the history and social state of the country; causes which weighed down the public mind during the greater part of the last century, but which the nation has at length, to a great extent, shaken off. The regulations which required attendance on religious worship—which established divinity lectures—which enjoined religious examinations—which, in short, connected religion directly with the instruction of youth, were, even then, in existence at Oxford, though feebly enforced; a state of things, resulting from that universal relaxation of opinion on religious matters, which pervaded the entire nation, and also the Universities; for bodies of men, however distinguished, are still but men, and acted upon, more or less, by the feelings which sway the rest of the community. Still, my Lords, the foundation of all that was originally right and good, remained—the framework was in existence—the machinery was entire; it only required an external impulse—it only required the revival of a more religious feeling in the country to set that machinery again in action, and bring forth the happiest results; but here we have no authorized system of religious polity to work upon and improve. At present, my Lords, attendance on religious worship is strictly enforced at Oxford; undergraduates, from the period of their matriculation, uniformly attend their tutor's divinity lectures, whether intended for holy orders or not. They are examined in the Thirty-nine Articles—in the Four Gospels—in the Acts also—and in the internal and external Evidences of our Faith, without which no man's religious education can be tolerably complete; as he who cannot assign a reason for the faith that is in him, may have his best hopes destroyed by any specious train of argument. Will any noble Lord maintain, that requirements such as these, are too great for the education of our Protestant youth, in an educational Institution founded by the State? Can we conscientiously consent to forego, for the Protestant youth of the sister country, that amount of religious instruction which we think essential to the education of the Protestant youth of England? The Roman Catholic prelates have declared, that such a system is absolutely insufficient for the religious instruction of their youth. I ask my right rev. Friends, whether we can conscientiously adopt a lower standard for ours? Can we, in these days of advanced knowledge and experience, conscientiously assist in building up Institutions framed, not on the model of those elder Universities, which have been successful to so great an extent in our own country, but on that of the French University, which propagates the worst of religious errors, the absence of all religious opinion; and which is producing consequences which may, at no distant period, convulse society in every part of the kingdom? I do not impute to the Ministers of the Crown any hostility to religion. No one will suspect my noble Friend, the noble Duke, who has devoted a long and glorious life to the service of his country, in the field and in the Cabinet, of harbouring any feeling against the religion of his country. My noble Friend the Secretary for the Colonies has never been considered indifferent to religious considerations; still of this I am convinced, that if this measure pass into law, the public will not easily believe, that either the Government or the Parliament are animated by a real wish to protect religion; and as far as any legislative enactment can have that effect, this measure will tend to discourage that anxious wish to extend religious instruction, which has now for some years past been prevalent, not only among those circles in which your Lordships move, but among the middling classes—an anxiety which has been gradually superseding the coldness of the departed age—which has been slowly but surely gathering strength from one end of the country to the other—and which, I trust in God, may not receive a fatal check from the vote to which, I fear, your Lordships are about to come to-night. Deeply impressed with the evils of the course which we are pursuing, I feel it my bounden, though painful, duty to move, that the Bill before us be read this day six months.

The Marquess of Lansdowne would confine his observations to a statement of what parts of the Bill he approved of, and in what respects he disapproved of it. The Bill must be considered as containing three distinct principles. The first was one which had long been recognised by their Lordships, namely, the necessity for bestowing an education upon the people at large. The second principle was a necessary result of the first, namely, the necessity for proportioning the education provided for the people at large, so as to suit it to the condition of all the classes of the people. The third principle involved in the Bill was, the establishment of such a system of education as should render it acceptable to persons of every different form of religion in the land where it was to be founded, and likewise such a system as should remove the snares and stumbling-blocks which would prevent conscientious persons from taking advantage of the benefits of instruction which the Bill might offer to them. Their Lordships had long since adopted the principle of giving an education to the people at large; and the Bill before the House proposed for the first time to adapt that education to the wants of persons of the middle station of life, who previously had been totally overlooked in the educution schemes of the Government; the whole attention of the Board of Education of Ireland having been directed towards the humbler working classes in Ireland. There was a demand for means of education being afforded to the middle classes of persons there, which demand was not made by the laity alone, but in which the clergy joined to a very considerable extent. These two classes united in calling upon the Government to make some provision for the better educasion of persons in the middle ranks of life, by the foundation of scholarships, and the establishment of Colleges or institutions where instruction in the higher branches of learning could be offered at a moderate cost, and of a superior quality. The object which the Bill was expressly devised to achieve, was that which he had just described. But he would beg to ask the noble Earl who had just sat down, whether he thought the measure would prove of any benefit whatever to Ireland, if it were to be confined exclusively to persons of one form of religious belief? Would any person professing other religious belief, apply for instruction or admission to the Colleges which should be instituted under the Bill, if they found that their form of faith was discountenanced at those Colleges? The Bill, as originally framed, made no provision whatever for religious instruction in the Collegiate Establishments which were to be formed under it. But, in consequence of what had occurred during its progress in another place, an alteration had been agreed to, and provision made in it for halls and lecture rooms, where theological lectures might be given to those students who were disposed to attend to such a course of instruction. There were, he admitted, some difficulties in the way of the measure—the principal of which was the appointment of the professors being vested in the Crown. He thought that if this power continued to be so vested, it would at no very distant period become a mere appendage to the patronage of a Minister, and consequently the professorships would degenerate into mere sinecure places, filled, not by competent persons, but by men who had claims on the Minister of the day; and the consequence would be that the College would fall into discredit and be abandoned. He did not object to the Crown having the power of making the first nominations under the Bill; because he thought that power would be carefully and judiciously exercised. He saw, however, with pleasure that this power was limited to a period of short duration; and he trusted, when that period had elapsed, the Government would see the propriety of confiding the appointments to the professorships to some competent and responsible body—to the Board of Education in Ireland, for instance, which being composed of mixed Roman Catholic and Protestant prelates, and of Presbyterian clergymen, was well calculated to act impartially in the matter. There was another fault in the Bill which showed him that it was in an incomplete state, and one which required, and he did not doubt would have, future alteration: he meant the want of some connexion between the four Colleges which were to be established, by which they would constitute and form of themselves an University. The strong religious opinions in the various parts of Ireland, which differed so widely from each other in the north and in the south, would have a corresponding effect upon the Colleges which should be established in those various districts, and lead ultimately to rivalry, and to dissension, hurtful to the whole establishment, and which could only be obviated by collecting all the Colleges under one form of discipline, and subjecting them to the rule of a University. He was fully aware of the difficulty of establishing an Alma Mater which should gather all the newly created Colleges under her authority. He knew, also, the difficulty of making Trinity College, Dublin, such a University, and of endowing it proportionately to the claim of the new Colleges; but if those difficulties were, upon examination, found to be insuperable, he saw no objection to the creation of a central University out of Dublin, and of giving that University the power of conferring degrees; placing all the Colleges under an uniform system of discipline, to be established and enforced by such University. It would not be a College of itself; but would merely constitute a focus, or become the representative of the four Colleges; and he thought such an addition would be a most salutary change in the Bill. Having thus expressed his sentiments, and shown in what parts he approved of the measure, and wherein he disapproved of it, he should conclude by expressing his intention of voting for the second reading.

Lord Clifford said, that had he had the good fortune to have attracted their Lordships' attention, as he wished, three hours previously, he should only have expressed those sentiments respecting the measure before the House, which the noble Marquess who had just spoken had uttered with so much dignity and propriety of expression; and to which he gave an authority as great as that which they would have derived from any other Peer in their Lordships' House. He begged also to thank the noble Lord (Stanley) for the mode in which he had brought the Bill forward; and he should, upon the noble Lord's own showing, have felt disposed to acquiesce in it, even had he not been corroborated in his views by the speech of the noble Marquess. The artful representations which had been so sedulously and so perseveringly spread throughout Ireland, that the people and Government of England were filled with hostile feelings towards the people of Ireland, were wholly and totally false. He pronounced them to be false from his own observation of what the true sentiments of the English nation were; and the people of Ireland had taken a far wiser and better course by looking up to the Government and to the English people for justice and equal rights, than they would have done had they turned to those who took upon themselves to be their counsellors and guides. He put it to the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Carnarvon) whether, after the suggestions which had been thrown out, he thought it would tend to the public interest, and to the pacification of Ireland, to persist in the Amendment, that the Bill be read that day three months?

Lord Beaumont said: I shall not trespass for any length of time on your Lordships' indulgence, as I neither intend to imitate the example of the noble Earl, who introduced a long polemical discussion into his speech, nor wish to follow my noble and learned Friend in his argument on the policy of an endowment of the Roman Catholic priesthood in Ireland; for I confess I could see no connexion between the subject now before the House, and the religious topics dwelt on at such length by the noble Earl, unless the noble Earl intended to prove, by practically showing in his own person the inconvenience which arises from giving way to sectarian zeal and indulging in religious controversy, the wisdom and sound policy of the Government, in excluding from their plan of education all theological professorships. I must likewise own, that the question of an endowment for the Catholic clergy, introduced by the noble and learned Lord, seems to me to be equally foreign to the Bill now before your Lordships, as the polemical discourse of the noble Earl who preceded him. I am relieved, also, from any necessity of dwelling on those details of the Bill which seem to require some further consideration; as the observations made by the noble Marquess who spoke last but one embody, in a more forcible and effective manner than I should express myself, the opinion I entertain of the necessity of affiliating these three Colleges to one University; but although the subject has been nearly exhausted by noble Lords who have preceded me, I am not content to remain altogether silent, but am anxious to express in words, as well as by my vote, my unqualified approval of the measure. My approval is not founded merely on what I may call the narrow ground taken by the noble Lord opposite (Lord Stanley) in the early portion of the speech with which he introduced the measure, namely, its peculiar appropriateness to the present state of Ireland, but on the broad principle it contains, which is alike sound and true in England and Scotland, as in Ireland—I mean the abandonment of all religious tests, and the removal, by mixed education, of those sectarian distinctions and differences which must be fostered by separate establishments for each denomination. I blame not the noble Lord for taking this narrow ground; for I am aware that the connexion of the noble Lord with the Government, and the recent conduct of the Government in respect to Scotch Universities, preclude him from taking a larger view of this question; but I must remind the noble Lord, that the arguments he used were as applicable to England as to Ireland; and if he founds his justification of the present measure on the great diversity of religious opinions and persuasions in Ireland, he will soon find the selfsame argument applied with greater force, and more reason, to the case of England and Scotland. It is true, as the noble Lord stated, that in Ireland there are four distinct denominations, namely, the Presbyterian, the Unitarian, the Roman Catholic, and the Church of England; but in England there are not only these four leading denominations, but an infinite number of other less numerous, but equally distinct sects. The same remark is applicable to all the free States of Europe; the time has gone by when exclusive education can be maintained in any of the great countries which are desirous of encouraging learning and science. I will go so far as to say, that when the establishments for purposes of education are maintained out of the public funds, to which all denominations alike contribute, the Government has no moral right to impose a religious test on its subjects who wish to profit by them. I say you have no right to close the door of your Colleges against the youth who seeks to enter, till you have forced from him a confession of his faith; nor to stop the student who is ascending the steps that lead to the temple of science, and say to him, "Sir, what is your religion? Are you a Trinitarian, or a Unitarian—are you a Catholic, or a Protestant?" The gates of the College should be open to all; as all contribute to support it. My noble Friend near me seemed to mistake the subject altogether, when he supposed the question merely affected the Catholics, and considered it as one on which the Catholic bishops alone ought to be consulted: the question is of general education, and one which concerns the laity, and not the priesthood. It is for the benefit of the former that the measure is introduced; and noble Lords are mistaken if they imagine that the opposition of the Catholic hierarchy is caused by the omission of theological professorships in the intended Colleges; the purport of their memorial was not to have chairs of theology established in the Colleges, but to preserve in their own hands a control over the teaching and professors of all the sciences; they wish to maintain their monopoly of learning, and condemn lay professors, or professors appointed by laymen. Their objection is a very different one from that taken by my noble Friend (the Earl of Carnarvon). My noble Friend is contented to leave astronomy, anatomy, geology, &c., in the hands of lay professors, but complains of the want of a chair for religious teaching, and alludes to the German Universities as examples to be followed upon that head. Let us consider what really is the proposition of the noble Earl, when he wishes to establish a chair for teaching religion. The duty of such a professor would be not to preach particular doctrines, or inculcate one particular creed, but he would have to discuss the polity of each form of faith, enter into the mechanism (if I may so call it) of different religions, lead the mind to investigate, perhaps to doubt; his lectures might be instructive, but would scarcely effect the object the noble Earl seems to have at heart. Let me ask my noble Friend if he is aware what are the discourses which proceed from the chairs of theology in German Universities, and who are the professors who have filled them? Is he ready to recommend teachers, such as Strauss, and other deep but sceptical scholars, who have filled chairs in German Universities, but whose works are at variance with the opinions which I am sure my noble Friend most religiously entertains? Great as is the opposition to the measure on the part of the Roman Catholic hierarchy, it would have been still greater, had the Government followed the suggestion of the noble Earl, and proposed chairs of religion on the principle of the German Universities. There are many other points to which, at an earlier hour of the evening, I would have alluded; but, at the present advanced period of the night, I will be content with repeating my unqualified approbation of the measure.

The Bishop of Norwich could not allow this great question to pass with merely a silent vote on his part. He had come to the House that evening with considerable hesitation as to the manner in which he should give his vote; and had the Bill remained in the state in which it was some weeks ago, he should have considered himself bound to oppose it. But after what he had heard that evening, and after the changes which had taken place, and the strong arguments used by the noble Lord who introduced the measure, he could frankly say that all his scruples were gone; and he felt it his duty, holding the situation which he did in the Church, to give this question of education his unqualified support. He believed that the noble Lords at the head of the Government had done everything they possibly could to introduce all the means which could be well introduced into the Bill for the purpose of religious instruction; and that if they had done more, instead of providing the means of conciliation, they would have excluded the people of Ireland from the advantages of this system of education; and would have failed to bring the Roman Catholic and Protestant population into those bonds of amity which it was the duty of every Christian to establish. He returned his thanks to the Government for introducing this Bill, which, if carried out in the way in which he trusted it would be carried out, would introduce into Ireland that spirit of Catholic Christianity which ought to reign in that country.

Lord Lyttelton wished to ask a question with respect to the 14th Clause. With regard to that clause concerning the attendance of students to receive religious instruction, it simply provided that religious instruction should be afforded to such students who were desirous to receive it. One would infer from this, that the students need not attend if they did not think proper. But there was another provision of the Bill which stated, that the pupils should not be obliged to attend any religious instruction which was not approved of by their parents or guardians. From this it might be inferred, that where the parents or guardians did approve of the pupils' attendance, that then they might be compelled to attend. He wished to ask the noble Lord, whether the authorities of the Colleges would have the power to compel such attendance?

Lord Stanley apprehended, that there was no power laid down in the Bill enabling the College authorities to compel the attendance of any individual to receive religious instruction; at the same time, it was provided that every facility should be afforded to enable them to do so.

The Duke of Newcastle rose merely to signify how thoroughly he disapproved of the Bill altogether; and he deeply regretted that the Government of this country should have introduced such a measure.

Their Lordships adjourned at a quarter past twelve o'clock.

POOR LAW AMENDMENT (SCOTLAND).] On the Motion that the Poor Law Amendment (Scotland) Bill be read a Third Time,

Mr. Hastie said, that as considerable alterations had been made in the Bill, upon which the people of Scotland had no time to express an opinion, he felt it to be his duty to move that the Bill, as amended, be printed, and read a third time that day week. He thought that the Bill, under the circumstances, was pressed with unjustifiable haste. He did not deny that the people of Scotland were in favour of an alteration of the Poor Law; but at the same time, they were anxious to have another year to consider the Bill more fully.

Mr. Dundas seconded the Motion.

The Lord Advocate hoped, after the thorough discussion which the principle and almost every clause in the Bill underwent, that his hon. Friend would not press his Motion, which was equivalent to a postponement of the Bill for another year, particularly as his hon. Friend acknowledged, consistently with the fact, that the people of Scotland were in favour of an alteration of the present law.

Mr. Wakley said, he had supported the Bill originally in the hope that alterations might be made in it with the view to its improvement; but, unfortunately, the many alterations in it were anything but improvements, and as it now stood, it never would work well for the poor of Scotland. He most particularly objected to that part of it by which the able-bodied poor in Scotland were denied relief when out of work. A Scotchman being in distress in England was sent off to Scotland, where he was met by this Bill, which refused him all aid. Why, this was enough to set the Scotch poor mad, particularly when they saw that a different law prevailed in England and Ireland.

Mr. Lockhart believed, that it was the general opinion in Scotland that relief to the able-bodied poor in that country would degrade its peasantry; but he could not allow the third reading to pass without again entering his protest against the Settlement Clause, which would greatly interfere with the working of a measure in other respects unexceptionable. The grievance which that clause would entail on Scotland was unknown in England. The Irishman who laboured there during the greater part of a long life gained no settlement; and in his own country he had no absolute right to relief under any circumstances; yet hon. Members combined to give him a settlement in Scotland after a residence of five years; so that what could not be effected by an industrious residence of fifty years at one side of the Tweed, five years of indolence would gain him on the other. Hence, Irishmen who exhausted themselves in other parts of the kingdom would flow into Scotland, in order to gain a settlement. This, he repeated, was most unjust and ungenerous to Scotland.

Mr. Escott said, that the Bill, as it now stood, altered the present law of Scotland with respect to the rating of funded property for the relief of the poor. Under the existing law such property was rateable for the relief of the poor; but the present Bill gave the parish authorities the power of assessing or not assessing such property as they pleased. He certainly thought this alteration was objectionable.

The House divided on the Question, that the word "now" stand part of the Question:—Ayes 33; Noes 7: Majority 26.

Bill read a third time and passed.

GAMES AND WAGERS.] Sir J. Graham, on moving the Second Reading of the Games and Wagers Bill, said, that he was quite confident that the changes proposed in the existing law by the present Bill would be found most salutary in their operation. The objects of the Bill were twofold. Firstly, it gave additional facilities for the suppression of gaming houses kept open for the purpose of gaming; and, secondly, it amended the law with regard to wagers generally. With regard to the operation of the first portion of the measure, it gave to the justices of the peace, not included in the metropolitan districts, a power of granting warrants, on information given, to make a search, a power analogous to that now exercised within the metropolitan dissricts. Within the metropolitan districts the Bill enlarged the existing power. To issue a warrant heretofore it was necessary to get the information signed by two householders; but, as might be supposed, there was an unwillingness on the part of householders to grant this information. The Bill, therefore, proposed that the warrant to search might be granted on the information of the superintendent of police, and the finding of gaming implements was held to be conclusive evidence that gambling was carried on in the House. With regard to the second portion of the measure, relating to wagers, the Bill entirely followed the recommendation of the Committee. It took away all cognizance of wagers from the courts of law. But at the same time it made parties who made wagers and gained undue advantage fraudulently, subject to the penalties to which persons who obtained money under false pretences were subject. It put an end to all qui tam actions altogether. He, therefore, considered the Bill would prove very beneficial to the public, and he recommended it to the adoption of the House.

Mr. Hawes said, that the Bill did not confine itself to the recommendation of the Committee; for it interfered with licensed victuallers in a manner that was not contemplated. There was an attempt in the Bill to define an unlawful game; but that definition was so extensive as to include any innocent game: added to this, they were going to do that by the Bill that would operate as a further heavy tax upon the licensed victuallers, if they had a billiard table — the licensed victuallers were a body, he thought, who were sufficiently taxed already. The Bill, in fact, went beyond the description of it given by the right hon. Baronet, and beyond what was contemplated by the Gaming Committee. Unless the right hon. Baronet would insert a clause exempting the licensed victuallers from the operation of the Bill, he should vote against its second reading.

Mr. Henley said, he had no objection to support a Bill to put down gaming, but he had a most decided objection to the 8th Clause, which put upon the owner of any house in which a person might be found with a pack of cards in his pocket the necessity of proving that it was not a gaming house.

Mr. Spooner hoped the hon. Member for Lambeth would not persevere in his opposition to the second reading of a Bill, the object of which they must all concur in approving. There were some of the clauses to which he had a strong objection; but he thought the Bill might be so amended in Committee as to get rid of the objections to which it was at present liable.

Sir J. Graham denied that the present Bill was brought in to meet the special case of certain individuals. He brought the measure forward on public grounds, and for the purpose of putting down gambling, which had lately very much increased in the country, and produced such pernicious and fatal effects. He denied that the Bill left gambling by the upper classes untouched. The 2nd Clause was especially levelled against the gambling of the higher classes—namely, against hazard, roulette, and other games, where the bank was kept by the person to whom the house belonged, and where there was a dead pull against the player. The object of the Bill was to protect the public, high and low, against improper gambling. He followed the Report generally, but he did not feel bound servilely to follow all the recommendations of the Committee. It was found, since the Report of the Committee, that French hazard was played in billiard houses after twelve o'clock. It was, therefore, necessary to include such houses in the Bill. He thought that the 8th Clause, which made the finding of certain implements a primâ facie evidence of gambling, would be indispensable to the efficiency of the measure. He admitted the terms of that clause were large, and were studiously made so; but he would be willing to consider in Committee whether those terms might not be restricted. With regard to the licensed victuallers, the hon. Member for Lambeth seemed to labour under an error. Under the present law, the police had the power of entering public houses at all times, so that there was nothing new in the provisions of the proposed Bill. The Bill might not be good for the publican, but it would be good for the public. He did not anticipate any objection to the Bill, and he should be surprised if the House of Commons rejected the second reading of such a measure.

Mr. Warburton thought that the Bill dealt most unfairly with respect to informers. They were first made necessary to carry into effect the Acts of the Legislature, and then, when they gave information, they were prevented from proceeding with the action.

Mr. Bickham Escott said, that he was a Member of the Committee which sat upon the subject of qui tam actions, and the Committee were clearly of opinion that the Statute of Anne was never intended to apply to betting on horse racing. It should be recollected that the informers with respect to the qui tam actions had proceeded on an old and obsolete Statute. He considered that the principle of the present Bill was a good one; and he hoped the House would assent to the second reading.

Mr. Craven Berkeley concurred in what had fallen from the hon. Member for Lambeth, who, he hoped, would persevere in his opposition to the Bill. He considered that the licensed victuallers were hardly dealt with by the Bill. He would give his support to the right hon. Gentleman, if he would strike out all the clauses in the Bill except those that related to qui tam actions.

Sir G. Strickland considered the Bill contained the foundation of a good principle, and one from which the public would derive great benefit. He should, therefore, support the second reading of the Bill; but he certainly thought Clause 8 was too stringent.

Captain Rous said, that it was evident that the licensed victuallers would not be placed in a worse position by the present Bill than they were under the existing law, which gave the police the power of entering their houses at all times. He thought the principle of the Bill was a good one, and he hoped the first conviction under it would be the Crockford Club house.

Mr. Wakley hoped, as a friend to the licensed victuallers, that the hon. Member for Lambeth would not divide the House, as such a course would be likely to prejudice their case. He never knew any matter of police regulation to come before the House, that the licensed victuallers were not selected for persecution. With respect to informers, he thought they were the pests of society, and were entitled to no sympathy, whether they proceeded against the rich or poor.

Sir J. Graham said, that if the House went into Committee on the Bill, he would endeavour to meet the objections which had been urged against the Bill in a fair and conciliatory spirit. With regard to the 8th Clause, he admitted that the terms of it were stringent; but he believed they would be necessary to put an end to the practice which prevailed in Doncaster and other places of persons taking lodgings during the races in private houses where gambling was carried on. Unless they armed the authorities in those localities with strong powers, the evil they sought to suppress would thrive and increase. He did not wish to press harshly on the licensed victuallers, further than to prevent the growing evil of gambling.

Bill read a second time.

CAPTAIN BOLDERO AND MR. BONHAM.] Mr. Hawes wished to put a question to the right hon. Baronet the First Lord of the Treasury, upon a subject of great public importance; of his intention to do which, he had already given the right hon. Gentleman notice. The question had reference to the Report of the Committee which had sat upon a subject connected with the South Eastern Railway Company. He had delayed putting this question, in order that the Government might be the better enabled to act upon their own discretion and responsibility in a matter of this kind. His question was, whether Her Majesty's Ministers had had under their consideration the Report of that Committee, and whether they had taken any steps in consequence, in reference to the names of certain parties mentioned in that Report—namely, Captain Boldero, Mr. Bonham, Mr. Hignett, and Mr. Wray; and if so, whether they were prepared to state what those steps were which they had taken?

Sir R. Peel: Sir, I am prepared now to state to the House, in consequence of the question which has just been put to me by the hon. Member for Lambeth, and which I understood would be put to me, the course which has been taken by Her Majesty's Government, after a full consideration of the Report of the Committee to which the hon. Gentleman refers. Shortly after the Report was presented to the House, Mr. Bonham and Captain Boldero signified to me their wish to tender their resignations of the situations which they respectively held under Her Majesty. They stated, that although—speaking with reference to transactions of the present year which had been brought under the consideration of the Committee — they felt conscious of their perfect integrity, and that their conduct as public officers could not, in the slightest degree, be influenced by the holding of shares in any railway, yet, at the same time, they believed that their efficiency and usefulness as members of a public department were likely to be impaired by that Report. They, therefore, felt themselves called upon to tender their resignations, and I considered it to be my duty to advise Her Majesty to accept them, and Her Majesty has accepted them. In respect to Mr. Wray, who holds the office of Receiver General of Metropolitan Police, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department has forwarded to Mr. Wray a communication, in which he seriously animadverted on the proceedings of this gentleman in reference to this matter, and directed him to confine himself exclusively to the proper functions of his department. With respect to Mr. Hignett, who was Solicitor to the Board of Ordnance, his right hon. Friend the Master General of the Board of Ordnance had felt it to be his duty absolutely to dismiss Mr. Hignett from his situation.

Captain Boldero: Sir, I feel confident that the House will indulge me by its attention for a few moments. I feel that there could scarcely be any position more painful to myself than that which I now occupy, in rising to address you upon the subject which has just been brought under your consideration. The House is aware that the South Eastern Railway Company had presented a petition to this House, accompanied by a letter, in which certain charges were made against my friend Mr. Bonham and myself. That petition was referred to the consideration of a Select Committee; and that Committee, after the most diligent and scrutinizing inquiry, came to this conclusion. In the Report laid upon the Table by the Committee, I find it stated—

"Though, however, Mr. Hignett admitted that he had written the letter referred to, he declared to your Committee, that when he wrote it, he had no authority to use the name of either Mr. Bonham or Captain Boldero; that he 'had no conversation whatever with those gentlemen upon the subject;' and that he used their names, considering that it would 'give weight to' his application for the shares he was soliciting from the Company. Mr. Hignett further declared, that the statement that he had spoken to Mr. Bonham was 'untrue;' and that the presumption intended to be raised by this use of the names of influential members of the Board, that the demands of the Company on the Board might be assisted by the course suggested by the letter, was without foundation, as 'they had not the power to further the objects of the South Eastern Company'—the questions at issue being deemed of a purely military nature, and the decision upon such questions resting solely with the Master General, and not with the Board."

Now, I can declare that this is the undeviating course in every question connected with railways. The Committee further add—

"That they feel it to be their duty, in the first instance, to state, that nothing which has transpired leads them to suppose that the decisions of the Master General upon any of the questions brought before him by the parties promoting either the South Eastern, North Kent, or the London, Chatham, and Kent lines of railway, were influenced by any other than strictly public considerations. Nor has your Committee any reason to suppose that any act of the Board of Ordnance was affected or influenced by the conduct of Mr. Hignett; however well calculated that conduct was to suggest the suspicions expressed in the petition of the South Eastern Railway Company. Your Committee entertain no doubt that the decisions of the Master General and the acts of the Board of Ordnance, in reference to these railway companies, were the result alone of a desire to protect public interests, and to afford, consistently with them, a reasonable and proper accommodation to the public in the districts through which it was proposed that these railways should pass."

Thus the Committee (both on the letter and the petition) enter into a complete exculpation of my friend Mr. Bonham and myself. Sir, when I was under examination before the Committee, I exposed every private transaction connected with the few railway shares, without hesitation, in which I had been engaged. I stated that I had purchased in the North Kent line, and other lines, as I thought them advantageous, but that I was not in any degree influenced by my position as a member of the Board. In the Committee, very few questions were put to me; and I was led to suppose that the explanation I had given was satisfactory, otherwise I should have explained some points in detail, which now appear to me to have been misunderstood by the Committee. If I had not considered my evidence had been conclusive and satisfactory to the Committee, I would have added to its weight. I had not the opportunity of hearing it read by the clerk, nor were the notes of the shorthand writer sent to me. The Committee have done me the justice, in their Report, to notice that oversight. How it occurred I know not. Such is the fact. On a perusal of the evidence, I find I gave one answer which does not appear to be sufficiently explanatory of my intention, and it had reference to my motive for selling forty shares which I then held in the North Kent Railway. The real facts of the case connected with these forty shares I will now state. On Saturday, the 7th June, after the business of the day, I read the public journals; and from the Times newspaper I received the first intelligence that military officers had been examined before the Committee on Group A of railways, touching a powder establishment at Faversham, not the property of the Board of Ordnance. It struck me, then, that possibly the same course might be pursued with reference to the Ordnance property at Chatham and Woolwich, through which the line was proposed to pass; and that perhaps I might be called upon, as a Member of the House, as then holding an official situation in the Board of Ordnance, to explain some acts of the Master General, who was not a Member of this House. I immediately decided upon selling those shares. The 8th was Sunday; on Monday, the 9th, I disposed of the forty shares; and I acted solely on the principle that, should I be called on to give evidence or to take part in a debate in this House, I might do so without the slightest bias, even if it be possible that the small amount of forty shares should bias any gentleman. The sale of these forty shares had no reference, no, not in the remotest degree, to the position I held as a member of the Board. There is a paragraph in the Report worded with extreme severity against me, although I bow to the decision of the Committee. In that paragraph, it states that the progress of the North Kent Bill depended upon the consent of the Board of Ordnance. Of course I am sensible this was the impression then made; but I can assure the House that it is entirely and totally inconsistent with the mode in which public business is carried on in that Department; for the Board has no power whatever in such matters, either in the negative or the affirmative; it is solely in the Master General's hands: the decision and the consent rest with him, the acts of the Board being ministerial only. If there should be any doubt about what I now state, I think the evidence of the Master General of the Ordnance, and of my gallant Friend the Surveyor General, should be brought forward; and I will undertake to say that both will corroborate every word I have uttered; and in that case the paragraph should not have been inserted. However, there is the paragraph; and I am not ashamed to own it deeply affected me; and the more I reflected upon it, the deeper was the wound. I ask the House, with such a paragraph published to the world, what course was open to me but one dictated by an honourable pride—and that was, to place in the hands of the right hon. Baronet the First Lord of the Treasury the resignation of my office as Clerk of the Ordnance? In the letter I then wrote, I thought it my duty to state the only ground which actuated me. The words I used were to this effect:—"It is with reference solely to the impaired degree of usefulness to the Government and to the public service which might arise out of the temporary impression made by recent proceedings that I act, but under the most clear conviction and perfect consciousness of the utter groundlessness of any imputations which may be attempted to be thrown upon my character, either in private or public capacity." This is all I have to say. I shall conclude by thanking the House for their kind and patient attention, and I trust that no word has been uttered by me to give offence to any one.

Mr. Hawes asked the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for the Home Department, whether he considered with respect to Mr. Wray that the object of the Report of the Committee had been accomplished?

Sir J. Graham: Since the Report of the Committee to which the hon. Gentleman refers, and of which he was the Chairman, was presented to the House, I have thought it my official duty carefully to consider the evidence, and, upon mature reflection, considering that the transaction in which Mr. Wray was involved took place as far back as 1836—that it was not immediately connected with the subject-matter which gave rise to the inquiry, and also weighing the terms of the Report, in which the expression is used, that Mr. Wray's conduct, in the opinion of the Committee, was deserving of serious animadversion, I thought, that upon the whole, I should best discharge the duty of my office by putting on record a public letter addressed to Mr. Wray, in which I animadverted strongly on the conduct of Mr. Wray in the year 1836. It should be observed in justice to Mr. Wray, that at that time, with reference to the terms under which he exercised the function of Receiver, it was open to him to employ himself in another business. Since that time the additional labour which has devolved on Mr. Wray is considerable, involving also some augmentation of his salary; and prospectively, therefore, I have enjoined on Mr. Wray the paramount necessity of devoting his time exclusively to the business of the office; and I have told Mr. Wray that any employment undertaken by him, not immediately connected with those duties, will, in my opinion, be the ground of his immediate removal. I can assure the House I have considered this matter dispassionately, and in my humble judgment the letter I have written meets the full justice of the case.

Mr. Hawes asked whether the right hon. Baronet would have any objection to produce the letter?

Sir J. Graham said, that although on ordinary occasions he did not think it advisable to notice the terms in which the Secretary of State was under the painful necessity of reprehending a public officer, yet, considering all the circumstances of the present case, he was prepared to lay the letter on the Table.

Mr. Roebuck observed, that he learned from the right hon. Baronet that, on the appointment of Mr. Wray, it was understood he might employ himself as a barrister, or, in other words, that he was not to withdraw from Westminster Hall. He wanted to know whether that was considered by the right hon. Gentleman as any palliation of the proceedings of a gentleman who did not confine himself to Westminster Hall, in the proper discharge of his duty as a barrister, but employed himself in the business of canvassing for votes for the private purposes of the South Eastern Railway?

Sir J. Graham readily agreed that the permission given to Mr. Wray to employ himself as a barrister was no palliation for the circumstance to which the hon. Gentleman referred; but admitting that such conduct was indefensible, he thought that, considering the lapse of time, and other circumstances to which he had adverted, and not wishing to act with undue severity, the letter he had written would meet the justice of the case.

Mr. Ward wished to say a few words in justice to a gentleman who had not the advantage of making any observations on his own case, and with whom he had been on intimate terms for many years. He did not defend that portion of his conduct for which he had received the censure of the right hon. Baronet, and he had told him so himself; for he thought nothing could justify a transfer of shares by a gentleman who held an official situation for services rendered in a Committee of the House; but, in justice to Mr. Wray and Mr. Bonham, the House must recollect how disgraceful was the constitution of Committees a few years since, how impossible it was for any person having a Bill to get through the House to have a chance of obtaining attention to the facts of the case, unless some person of influence and standing lent his name and took charge of the Bill, which he understood was the position in which Mr. Bonham stood; and as to canvassing, he told his hon. Friend near him, when he first saw the Report, that it was useless to pretend to impracticable purity. He held it to be impossible ever to procure attention to the facts of the case, if the Report of the Committee was to be acted upon. Hon. Members were all canvassed. His hon. Friend, who was largely connected with the railway madness, must be constantly in the habit of being canvassed. [Mr. Hawes: I am not connected with any railway, nor do I hold shares of any kind whatever]. His hon. Friend must be canvassed at times. It was impossible that he should not be so. What he understood by the word "canvassing" was attempting to induce a Member to come down and pay attention to the question before them. What hon. Member had always nerve enough to say no? He had not the slightest wish to extenuate the conduct of Mr. Wray; but he begged leave to remind the House that in 1836 a very different system prevailed in regard to Committees from that which was now in force. He recollected very well being on a Committee which was presided over by a noble Lord who had done much to improve the manner of conducting the private business of the House (Lord G. Somerset); it sat a long time, he believed forty days, and he was canvassed to go down to give his vote. He refused, on the ground that he had not heard one word of the evidence; but it was asked whether he would give his vote if twenty-six Members were pointed out in the Committee-room, not one of whom had ever been there before, and who were prepared to vote? The twenty-six Members were pointed out to him, they having been marshalled by the Duke of Buckingham. He then gave his vote, and assisted the noble Lord to maintain his Report. There was another point on which Mr. Wray had cruelly misrepresented himself. It was in that part of his evidence wherein he stated that he had acted as umpire between the South Eastern Company and Lord Strangford. Upon inquiry, he found that the fact was not so, and that, in that case, Mr. Wray acted as the agent for the railway, and not in the capacity of umpire at all.

Lord John Russell: I heard with considerable surprise what has been stated by my hon. Friend, and I am hardly less surprised at the conduct of the Government with respect to Mr. Wray. I confess I am surprised at what I have now heard, that in 1836 the constitution of this House was so deficient that it was necessary to pay a Gentleman who was appointed on a Committee the sum of 300*l.* for attending and giving his vote—for that is the effect of the statement which has been made in this House in defence of Mr. Wray. I have read the evidence relating to that occurrence, which, it is true, took place in 1836; and if that is a reason for keeping this gentleman in the public service, I do not see why it should not be a reason also for keeping Mr. Bonham in the public service, for what has happened most to affect his character took place in 1836. It was stated that Mr. Wray was employed as a barrister to promote the interest of the South Eastern Railway in 1836, and that, after the Bill passed, the Company thought fit to show their gratitude to Mr. Bonham, who had acted, in reference to that Bill, in his capacity as a Member of Parliament, and had voted in that capacity. The Committee had a reserved fund of 100 shares, and it was agreed accordingly to give those shares to Mr. Bonham; but he did not incur any risk of the market by these shares, as it appeared, from an answer of Mr. Wray to Mr. Duncombe, that Mr. Bonham never saw the shares. There was a profit of 3*l.* per share, and this amounted, on the 100 shares to 300*l.* which were paid over to Mr. Bonham. Now I consider that a culpable transaction on the part of Mr. Bonham, but not less culpable on the part of Mr. Wray, who knew well that he was giving those shares to Mr. Bonham in consequence of his conduct as a Member of Parliament. If this be passed over with a slight reprimand to Mr. Wray, I cannot understand the distinction between that conduct and 300*l.* given by the Secretary of the Treasury to any Member of Parliament in consequence of his vote. The Bill on which Mr. Bonham voted was part of the legislative business of the House; and we should take care that the interests of the public in such matters are properly attended to. That Gentlemen should, in 1836, have come down to this House, and have voted on Bills which they knew nothing about, was a very great abuse; but it does not diminish the evil of giving 300*l.* to a Member of Parliament in consequence of the course which he took in this House. It appears to me, as Mr. Hignett has been dismissed, which was the proper course, and as the resignations of Captain Boldero and Mr. Bonham have been accepted, that a different course should not have been pursued with respect to Mr. Wray.

Mr. Ward said, that the noble Lord had cruelly misrepresented him. He said distinctly that no word could be too strong to express the feeling of reprehension with which he regarded the interference with any man in the discharge of his official duty; and he added, that the only excuse or palliation which could be given was the constitution of private Committees at that time.

Sir James Graham felt it necessary to say two or three words, in consequence of what had fallen from the noble Lord opposite. He had never, since he came into the Home Office, had any personal communication with Mr. Wray, who was personally unknown to him, and towards whom he had but acted judicially. He looked at the Report of the Committee, and weighed carefully the precise expressions which were applied to his conduct, namely, that it was deserving of "severe animadversion;" and in writing the letter to Mr. Wray he had acted solely on his own responsibility, exercising, to the best of his judgment, a dispassionate consideration of the facts; and whatever he had urged, he rejoiced was urged at the side of lenity. He hoped the House would pause until they saw the letter which he had written. It was a letter which contained "severe animadversion," and if it was the pleasure of the House to take any ulterior course, it would be a subject of future discussion, subsequently to the production of the letter.

Colonel Sibthorp had already expressed his opinion of the advantage which would arise from calling on every Member to state whether he possessed railway shares or whether he did not. For his part, although he had not been asked to serve on any Railway Committee, yet he was ready to go to the bar of the House and swear that he had no interest, directly or indirectly, in railways. Let all Members be examined—let them all make such a statement, and then they might have what they might call something like a pure House of Commons. It was his opinion, however, that as at present constituted, instead of being a reformed and purified House, it was more muddy and dirty than ever.

Mr. French considered that the House was perfectly correct in watching with a jealous eye the conduct of those to whom it delegated its authority. He would state this generally, as it appeared to him that it should not be limited in its application to parties only who had been mixed up in pecuniary transactions; there were other still graver delinquencies than any that had been alluded to that evening. Could the House for a moment conceive the person who had been selected in this or the other House of Parliament as a Judge, placing himself in secret communication with the agent of one of the parties, receiving and acting upon the information he acquired in this manner from the individual who had been selected to get up the opposition to the case which he had been appointed to try—browbeating every witness brought up by those who were defending themselves—having the indecency in a railroad case to demand "were their shares at a premium?" and being answered in the affirmative, declaring that "he would have them speedily at a discount!"—and ultimately suppressing the evidence which disproved the case he was anxious to establish? Would not the case be worse if this individual had occupied a high legal station? Perhaps they would tell him that conduct such as this can only be accounted for by the individual being fitter for being placed as an inmate in a large establishment on the other side of the water, than for occupying a seat in either House of Parliament. Conceive a company placing before him every document in their possession in reference to the case—the minute book of all their proceedings, their banker's accounts, showing all their money transactions, and into which they courted an investigation—tendering their chairman for examination, whom he refused to call, but behind his back basely attempted to calumniate—asking "had he ever been a candidate for a lucrative employment in a rival railway?" Possibly such a question should be regarded with contempt, as coming from one who had shown himself incapable of either thinking, acting, or speaking as a gentleman; but as he (Mr. French) was the person about whom that question was put, and feeling that, were there the slightest foundation for that base and dastardly insinuation, he should be unworthy of a place in that House, he had deemed it his duty to call attention to the fact. The individual about whose conduct he had spoken (and he was prepared to establish every statement he had made) was Lord Brougham and Vaux! and the case was the Dublin and Galway Railway.

The following Motion made by Mr. Hawes was then agreed to:—

"An Address for Copy of the Letter addressed by the Secretary of State for the Home Department to Mr. Wray, the Receiver General of Metropolitan Police, in consequence of the Report of a Committee of this House upon the South Eastern Railway Company's Petition; and, also a Copy of the appointment of Mr. Wray to the office he holds."

NEW ZEALAND.] Mr. Ward having presented a Petition from the New Zealand Company, relative to the state of that Colony,

Mr. C. Buller rose, and said: Sir, I entirely concur in the feeling which is expressed in the petition that has just been presented to you from the New Zealand Company; for I felt that it would not be necessary for any one on behalf of the New Zealand Company to bring the question again before the House during this Session; and if I do so on the present occasion, I hope the House will do me the justice to believe that I do it solely from a feeling of a strong necessity for such a course. I may state at once that it is not my desire to trespass on the attention of the House to the same extent as on a former occasion, for the subject-matter of discussion is not such as could justify me in thus trespassing on the House. The facts to which I am about to direct attention are few, but they are of great importance; and as it is not necessary to resume my former statement, I will take up the story where I ended on the former occasion, namely, the 20th of June last, and proceed to put the House in possession of the intelligence which has arrived in this country from New Zealand since that debate, and call attention to what has since been going on in this country relative to the affairs of that Colony. The newspapers and the Papers which have been laid before the House have put Members in possession of the startling intelligence which has arrived from New Zealand since the affairs of that Colony were last discussed; and I am sure that every Gentleman on both sides of the House, who has read those accounts, must feel the deepest commiseration for the past, and the gravest apprehension for the future. Those events were inevitable in their occurrence. They were predicted by all those conversant with the condition and the affairs of New Zealand for the last three years. They are events which were predicted by my noble Friend, whose loss, a deplorable event, [the death of Earl Grey, who expired on July 17th,] which we all regret, has caused—I mean Lord Howick. That noble Lord showed to this House that the circumstances which had occurred in New Zealand, and the policy which had been pursued by the Government towards that Colony, had the inevitable tendency to produce those results; but neither he nor any one in this House could have imagined that those proceedings would have taken place with such promptitude as that which had characterized their occurrence. The Under Secretary for the Colonies gave such an account of these transactions in this House as tended rather to allay the feelings of those who heard him, than to give an idea of the fact that there is a formidable insurrection in New Zealand—an insurrection founded on no new discontent, but on an established hostility to the British Government in New Zealand. That that insurrection will be successful, as far as our present intelligence goes, there can be but little doubt. It cannot be said that, in this matter, the Government has been taken by surprise. The present contest was commenced, in a manner, by themselves, at any rate they had full warning of its approach. Due notice was given that the attack, which has since taken place, was to be made. The Government thereupon sent the best means at their disposal to meet the threatened attack. What has been the result? All the available force of the Government has been completely routed. The most ancient settlement that Englishmen and Europeans had ever established in that quarter of the world, has been swept from the face of the earth. The ancient settlement of the Bay of Islands has fallen into the possession of the savages, and has been pillaged from one end to the other, and every human habi tation which it contained has been destroyed and razed to the ground. It would be well if we could say that the recent news from New Zealand justifies us in anticipating that the mischief is to end here: I much fear that we shall find that the successful attack upon the Bay of Islands is but the commencement of a regular war to be henceforth carried on between the two races in New Zealand. The chief who was the leader in the late insurrection, and to whom I must do the justice to say that he has carried on the war in a spirit more approximating to chivalry than we are accustomed to meet with in the warfare of uncivilized people, has given notice that his next attack will be upon the seat of Government, and that he means fixing the very day—perhaps from a delight in straightforward dealing, and perhaps from the old stratagem of Agesilaus, that you can always deceive an enemy by telling him what you really mean to do—to make Auckland the point of his next attack. From this determination there is every reason to anticipate the greatest disasters. The chief in question has managed to take advantage of the discontents excited by the policy of the Government, and he has commenced his hostile proceedings by declaring that the war upon which he has embarked is a war against the Government alone, and not against the settlers. I will here call the attention of the House to a letter recently received from New Zealand, written by a gentleman of the name of Cormack, and which contains very important information. The letter says, that the native chiefs declare that the war is with the Government and not with the settlers, and that they plundered no house until the Europeans had all evacuated them. Heki declared that it never was his intention to disturb the settlers; on the contrary, that it was his desire to protect them. In addition to this, I will call attention to what I deem a very significant fact. It was supposed that after the affair at Kororarika the natives, in the general pillage which ensued, had spared all the missionary establishments and churches. Such was stated by the hon. Gentleman opposite; but I find that he was incorrect in the universality of that remark. This letter states that the establishment of the French missionaries was the only one which was left standing. I do not wish to draw any invidious comparisons between the French missionaries and those who were known to the natives as having made the most active efforts in getting possession of land, it being the honoured distinction of the Catholic clergy in those islands that not one of their body has participated in these efforts, or taken possession of any land. Those who have done so are considered, and very naturally, as forming a part of that Government with which they seem to take an identical policy, and the effect of that policy has been to deprive them of all hold over the minds of the natives, and to induce the natives to regard them as either members of, or in some way, at least, connected with, the Government. Let us now see what is the state of things at the Government settlement. How are they prepared to meet this state of things? By a letter dated the 28th of March, it appears that the state of things there, at present, is shocking to contemplate. The place is full of vagabonds, most of whom are runaway convicts from Botany Bay. The white savage is worse than the brown. The streets are full, day and night, of drunken men, soldiers, sailors, and "Parkhurst boys." This is an evil arising from a distinct breach of faith on the part of the Government towards the colonists. A pledge was given that no convicts should be sent to New Zealand. It was said that it was to be spared the character of a penal Colony. But the Government, in spite of that pledge, has sent out a number of convicts from Parkhurst, with the intention, after planting them in New Zealand, of granting them a free pardon. The Government have thus done all the mischief of introducing a convict population into the Colony. Ever since these convicts have been in New Zealand, there has been but one account of the mischief which they have occasioned, of the depredations which they have carried on, and of the pernicious influence which they have exercised over the natives. It is now owing to this conduct on the part of the Government that you have Auckland in that state of alarm which this lawless, troublesome, and immoral population has occasioned, a population which creates greater terror in the minds of the settlers than the natives themselves. There is a total absence of all magisterial authority, and it almost seemed as if orders had been given to permit this state of things to take place and continue. Such was at present, from authentic accounts, the condition of Auckland. The chief Heki is advancing with his tribe, and the horde who plundered Kororarika is now advancing upon Auckland. The amount of property which fell at the former place into the hands of the savages is stated at from thirty to forty thousand pounds. This will be held out as a strong inducement to other tribes to join in the hostile movement. The friendly tribes have been called around Auckland; but, by the last accounts, the Governor was represented as full of apprehension at the presence of these tribes, because, if they enable him to succeed in repelling Heki, they may afterwards become masters of New Zealand. Just conceive the effect of the victorious chief, coming from the north, flushed with his success, and laden with booty, and telling these friendly tribes that, if they plunder Auckland, they will get similar booty for themselves. Such is the state of things now existing in the Government settlement, which is to be avowedly the next object of attack. Let us now turn to the settlements in another part of the island. In the petition which has been presented to this House from the colonists, it is stated that there are in the settlements at Cook's Straits no less than 12,000 settlers, who carried out with them no less than 2,000,000*l.* of capital, which they have invested in the Colony. The New Zealand Company has, besides, expended no less than 600,000*l.* to protect these settlers and this mass of property. What has the Government done? They have called away the greater part of the force which was stationed there to protect both settlers and property, in order to protect Auckland. The principal protection afforded to the settlement of Wellington was the ship Hazard, and a very efficient protection, too, for a naval town. That vessel has been ordered off to Auckland. The sole protection now left is about fifty soldiers, to protect a population of from 4,000 to 6,000 people, numbers of them scattered at considerable distances from each other, against the mass of the natives on the spot, amounting to no less than 8,000, and counting amongst these from 1,500 to 1,600 fighting men. This is the force which the Government has reserved. In another settlement, containing from 2,000 to 3,000 people, there is not a single soldier or sailor. The inhabitants have to depend entirely upon themselves. The settlement, which is, perhaps, the worst off of all, is New Plymouth. This settlement contains about 1,000 people, the greater part of them being honest agriculturists and mechanics from my own part of the country—from the south-west of England, and who were taken out thither by the Company, which afterwards merged into the New Zealand Company. This settlement is the nearest to Auckland; but between the two points are to be found the most formidable tribes in New Zealand. This settlement has no fortifications. There is not a soldier, not a marine, not a sailor there to protect the settlers. Now, is this a war which these settlers have brought upon themselves? Can you say that they have been the cause of the mischief? Why, the war has arisen in another part of the island. It is no quarrel of theirs. Indeed, I must say that this whole unfortunate war has arisen in the northern part of the island; and, after all, it involves no material object of any importance to the settlers, for none of the objects in respect of which the welfare of the Colony is at stake are involved in this war. It is not undertaken to give the settlers access to their lands. Were it carried on to punish such monsters as Rauperaha and Rangiheata—were it carried on to exact retribution for the murder of our countrymen, that would have been of itself a legitimate and justifiable object. But with whom has the war, in fact, originated? It was commenced with a chief who has exhibited, throughout the whole transaction, no feeling, no desire to create a war, on account of his own personal interests, whose feelings are all founded upon a rude desire of independence, and who has carried on the war in a spirit of chivalry which would have done honour to Europeans, and exhibited something of European refinement in his mode of warfare—an expression which, by the by, I must qualify—for he has exhibited a degree of refinement which, I regret to find, is not manifested in these days by every European nation. It against this chief that your hostilities are now carried on, and this too, not to enforce the possession of land, but from a wretched quarrel about a flagstaff, which he has again cut down, because, on the last occasion on which he did so, Governor Fitzroy, instead of punishing, rewarded him, by abolishing all customs' dues in that part of the island. I cannot view these matters as attributable to anything but the direct agency of the policy of the Government; and I must say, that I have seen with amazement certain assertions made by Lord Stanley, that all our difficulties in New Zealand have arisen out of the conflicting engagements entered into by the Company on the one hand, and the Treaty of Waitangi on the other. This, too, was said by the noble Lord, after the last debate upon this subject, a great part of which debate turned upon the mischiefs going on in certain parts of the island in which the Company has never set its foot, and in which it does not possess an acre of territory; in fact, in a part of the island fully 600 miles from the settlements of the Company. He said this, too, after a rumour had actually reached this country of the awful catastrophe which has taken place in the Bay of Islands. Neither he nor any one else can charge this upon the New Zealand Company, who had no hand whatever in originating this great mischief. What are the opinions of persons competent to judge in respect of these outrages? Mr. Busby, who is not very favourable to the Company, says that the whole of Heki's insurrection originally arose out of the land question, and from the natives not understanding the mode in which the Government sought to deal with their land. This was stated to be the foundation of the whole mischief. In addition to this, is there no other part of the policy of the Government which has led directly to these results? What instigates Heki to the outrages committed by him? He has been instigated thereto by impunity for his previous outrages—by the reward for those outrages which he actually received. The result of the last outrage which he committed was, that the Governor went to the Bay of Islands, pretended to take a nominal revenge, and proceeded forthwith to abolish the customs. Has nothing resulted, too, from the impunity with which outrage was visited in other parts of the islands? It is notorious that many chiefs in the island held up the impunity of Rauperaha for the massacre at Wairau as an inducement for their tribes to follow the example thus set them; and asking why, if Rauperaha killed the Europeans with impunity in the south, they should not do the same in the north? Mr. George Clarke said, and he is an authority to whom the hon. Baronet the Member for the University of Oxford (Sir R. Inglis) will defer, that among the natives of the north there was a very strong feeling of dislike, disgust, and contempt entertained towards the Government, and that the most calamitous results might follow from this, unless measures were rapidly taken to check them. What circumstances have more particularly contributed to the danger of Auckland? Why have disputes broken out there? Was not the cause stated in the last debate upon this subject? Is anybody responsible for this state of things but the Government? Who placed Auckland in the north? Who placed it the seat of government, where there was the smallest proportion of white men to protect themselves? Who placed it, so circumstanced, amongst the strongest and most populous of the native tribes, and at last brought the two races into collision with each other? The Government—and the Government alone—are responsible for the present danger of Auckland. Who left it defenceless? Governor Fitzroy, to be sure, in refusing to embody the militia after the first outrages had been perpetrated. He and his Council then deliberated upon the instructions sent out by Lord Stanley as to the embodying of the militia for the defence of the place. The result of their deliberation was, that they determined to disregard and repudiate the orders in this respect of successive Secretaries of State, and refrained from embodying the militia for fear of alarming the natives. Here, then, was the result. From fear of alarming the natives, you have placed yourselves absolutely at their mercy. But I am not inclined to do injustice to Captain Fitzroy. He is recalled—I do not wish to have him made the scapegoat for the offences of others. What are the charges which he brings against the Government? He is now defenceless, but it is not his own fault only. He sent to the Government for additional forces, to meet what he conceived to be the exigency of the place. Have his despatches, which contained this request, been all laid before us? [Mr. G. W. Hope: Every one.] What has not been laid before us, then, is the defence of the Government. I allude to the despatches sent long before the collision, in which he states that, from the first, he has actually been endeavouring to impress upon the Government a sense of the necessity of protecting the settlements by an additional force, and that, up to the month of May or June, the Government never took a single step to send him this additional force. The mischiefs which have ensued are, therefore, greatly attributable to the policy of the Government, and not to Captain Fitzroy alone. Lord Stanley is, in a great measure, responsible for them all. He must not shift the responsibility from himself to the Governor, whose acts and policy he entirely approves of. [Mr. G. W. Hope dissented.] It is true that Lord Stanley disapproved of the violation on the part of the Governor of his instructions in regard to debentures; but have the Government disapproved of any other portion of his conduct?

In reference to the whole system of policy which engendered the fatal dissensions of which we have now to complain, have they done anything to put an end to that policy and its evil fruits? There never has been in the history of the whole Colonial Department a Governor who, generally speaking, had to such an extent the cordial approbation of the Department, as Captain Fitzroy has received from Lord Stanley. If we look at the despatches which passed from the noble Lord to his Lieutenant in New Zealand, we find that it is always "You and I," as if he and Captain Fitzroy were perfectly agreed. Of the policy which has been pursued in New Zealand, and of all its fruits, Lord Stanley must bear the full responsibility. What, let me again ask, have been its results? You have brought about the greatest and the most horrible calamity which you could possibly inflict upon the Colony—a determined and a regular war of races. Don't believe that this evil is to be evanescent. If you do send out a force now, and put the natives down by dint of your superior skill and discipline, you do not even then repress the insurrection; you do not extinguish the alienation of the natives; you do not repress the desire for revenge, which you have been so instrumental yourselves in kindling in their bosoms; you do not extirpate the animosity which you have created between the white man and the brown, the feud of blood, the war of races, which, I fear will now last as long as differences of colour enables the two races to be distingushed from each other. I am free to admit that it is frequently the custom of the Opposition to attribute events like those which have recently occurred in New Zealand, to the bad policy and imbecile administration of the Government to which they are opposed. But I ask any candid man to look at the policy which has been pursued in New Zealand, and at its necessary results, and then say whether there can be a doubt that the whole of these results might not have been averted by a display of greater wisdom and firmness on the part of the Government, and whether the disasters which have overtaken the Colony are not attributable to the ruinous and unwise policy which the Government have thought proper to pursue. But to turn from the evils which have been effected, let us now come to what is a far more important question at present—the remedy which is to be applied. What hope have we that any effectual remedy will be applied, or is about to be applied by the Government? I find no satisfaction in Captain Fitzroy's being made the scape-goat—no satisfaction simply in his being recalled. What I want is, a satisfactory proof of your determination to pursue a different and a better course then hitherto. You have now punished Captain Fitzroy. What have you done though to the subordinates, by whom the whole mischief has, in fact, been in a great measure superinduced; that is to say, what has been done to those in power, who, under the Government, have been helping in their unfortunate policy? We have not heard of one single subordinate being reprimanded. Although the Colonial Secretary was obliged to disapprove of their conduct in more than one instance, not one of them has been reprimanded. The last fact which has come to light in reference to them is, that Mr. Shortland has, in reward of his services in New Zealand, been thought worthy of being made Governor of one of the West India islands. There was one circumstance which, up to a recent period, did give me hope: it was the tone assumed by the Government in the late debate upon New Zealand, and the promises then lavishly made of an altered and improved policy for the future. It is not to the particular words then used that I attach importance, but to the general tone of the speeches then delivered, and especially to that of the speech of the right hon. Baronet (Sir R. Peel). When he came forward, as he did on that occasion, and stated his views of that policy, I did think them so entirely in accordance with his own good feelings and judgment, that I was bound to believe him perfectly sincere, not only in his expressions, as indicating his opinions at the time, but in his avowed intentions to give full effect to his feelings and views. I now want to ask the House what effect has been given to them? The immediate effect of the division on that occasion was very visible. I was myself at the moment severely reproached by an hon. Friend, and by others, who perfectly agreed with me upon the general question, for going to a division at all. I was told that so doing was pushing a Government, who were really willing to do right, rather too hard; that it was compromising the interests of the Colony to divide, after the Government had given all that wa wanted in their liberal and numerous promises. I know, too, that there were several Gentlemen on the other side of the House whose votes were materially affected by these promises. I have seen statements from more than one, to the effect that they would then have voted with us, if they had not trusted to the assurances of the right hon. Baronet—if they had not relied on those assurances being carried into effect. We had no choice, after these, but to enter into further negotiation with the Government. It was said by some that the Company were wrong in so doing; but what would have been thought of us if, after such assurances from the head of the Government, we had refused to enter into negotiation with the Government; while it would have been held by many that we were endangering the welfare of the Colony and of all the settlers, from private pique and resentment, had we refrained from such further negotiation? Public opinion compelled us to negotiate. And what is the result? I have seen it in the Papers before the House, and it has, in fact, been communicated by Lord Stanley, in the shape of instructions given to the new Governor. What I complain of in the first instance is, that with the fate of the Colony in the scales, you do nothing to set it right and appease the alarm of the people interested in its fate; you give them, in fact, no more stable assurance than your instructions to your new Governor. What is the real worth of them? You make laws, and your Colonial Governor generally obey them, although in more instances than one, Governor Fitzroy did not even do that. The law has some force even in the Colonial Office; but it is, in too many cases, disregarded by your Governors. This is stated in the petition which has recently been presented from the Settlements, which has been printed, and is now in the hands of hon. Members. From that petition the House will excuse me if I read a few lines:—

"With regard to the alleged responsibility of the officers of Government in New Zealand to the Colonial Office in London, your petitioners would observe that, in the history of this Colony, nothing is more remarkable than the disregard by the local authorities of the instructions which they received from the Secretary of State. The cases of specific disobedience are numerous and important; but that which has led the colonists to despair of the efficacy of instructions from Downing-street, is abundant evidence of an habitual feeling among persons in office in the Colony, that instructions coming from so great a distance may generally be evaded, or totally disregarded, with impunity. On comparing Lord John Russell's admirable body of instructions to the first Governor, dated 9th December, 1840, with the whole of His Excellency's proceedings, it becomes manifest that the advice and commands of the Secretary of State made no more impression on the authorities of the Colony than if they had never been written: that in no one instance were they observed; and that in very many the conduct of the local Government was precisely opposite to the express words and whole tenor of thes aid body of instructions. And what is yet more deserving of remark, not only was this utter contempt of instructions visited by no punishment, but the Governor, whom everybody in the Colony knew to be labouring under disease which absolved him from personal responsibility, was kept in office, and continued to enjoy the confidence of the Colonial Office until the hour of his death. In like manner his subordinates, who really carried on the government in his name, have never been even reminded of Lord John Russell's instructions. The only persons upon whom the Colonial Office has cast any blame for the calamities which the disregard of those instructions has produced, are the suffering colonists and the ruined New Zealand Company; and, although Captain Fitzroy has indeed been recalled, there is every reason to believe that the confidence of the Colonial Office would still have been ostentatiously extended to him, if he had had sense enough to evade or otherwise to disregard, without defying, Lord Stanley's instructions."

In this case, what security have we for these instructions being of any effect? Observe the circumstances under which they have been issued. They have been issued to a gentleman of whom no intelligence has been had for the last five months, and who, you are not certain, is even now alive. But even if he be so, you do not yet know that Captain Grey will accept the new office, in lieu of the office of Governor of a Colony in which he has been so useful—that he will give up that office for that of Governor of New Zealand, with all its responsibility, with its wretched salary, and the fearful task of repairing the blunders of other men. I happen to know that some of Captain Grey's friends have expressed a strong opinion that it would, on his part, be highly imprudent were he to accept the government of New Zealand. These instructions, therefore, are issued to a Governor about whose acceptance of office you are not yet sure. In what state is the Colony now? Suppose any miscarriage arises from this cause? You recalled Governor Fitzroy in April, and you sent out these instructions in July to Captain Grey. Suppose Captain Fitzroy resigns whenever he receives your instructions, into whose hands will the Colonial Government fall should Captain Grey not be on the spot to receive it, or should he refuse to accept the office you have proffered him? It will fall into the hands of the Colonial Secretary, of whom I can only say, that he has been a prominent participator in every one of Captain Fitzroy's blunders, in those especially for which you have recalled Captain Fitzroy—I mean Dr. Sinclair, whose speeches have certainly been the most absurd of any speeches ever delivered in that most absurd body, the Colonial Council, and whose education and qualifications are these—that until two or three years ago he never served in any other capacity than that of the surgeon of a ship. That is the gentleman into whose hands, under these circumstances, the government of the Colony will fall, to whose care will be entrusted for some time the duties of New Zealand. Suppose no miscarriage arises from any of these causes, I want to ask, are your instructions satisfactory, are they clear from ambiguity, are they sure of being made more effective than were your previous instructions? I now want to call attention particularly to an assurance which was given us in the last debate as to the government of the Colony. What is more important to us, than the settlement of our particular claims, is the giving a good government to the Colony. That must necessarily be the first object for us to study to attain, in seeking to discharge aright our responsibility to those whom we have been instrumental in sending thither. Until you have a system of government in the Colony which will guarantee them against the most absurd misgovernment, there will be no security for either property or colonists in New Zealand. On this all-important subject, nothing could be more satisfactory than was the language of the right hon. Baronet at the head of the Government. He then said—

"With respect to the future government of the Colony, I am, for one, strongly inclined to think that a representative government is suited for the condition of the people of that Colony. There is not the objection to it whichimght apply to a penal Colony. You have rescued New Zealand from the evils attendant on a penal settlement. I speak generally; but I think that the government of that Colony, in connexion with those who are immediately interested in its local prosperity, assigning to them due weight and influence in the administration of affairs, framed upon general principles, would be a form of government well calculated for New Zealand. In short, I cannot see what assignable interest you can have, except in the commercial and social prosperity of that country. The only possible ground of connexion that can exist will depend upon its being profitable. It is impossible that, at the distance at which we are, this country can seek any advantage in its connexion with New Zealand except reciprocal interests; and, above all, upon the local prosperity of the Colony."

"At the same time it is impossible to apply the principle of a representative government to an island where the different settlements in the island are at such great distances from each other. The noble Lord says that he thinks Auckland was ill selected as the seat of Government. It might be so in some local respects; but I apprehend that, so far as military and naval considerations are concerned, Auckland possesses great recommendations. But this is one of those questions which must be influenced by local rather than general considerations. It is a point which cannot be determined upon by any other consideration than what may be most advantageous to the people. It is quite clear that, seeing how the settlers are spread over the Northern Island, it would be no easy matter to apply the principle of a representative government, according to the rule observed in more thickly populated countries. I believe that by far the best plan would be the formation of a municipal government with an extensive power of local taxation for local purposes — that this form, at all events, should be established in the first instance. I think you will find that, in the opinion of Mr. Burke, the formation of the Government in North America arose from these municipal institutions. In his speech to the sheriffs of Bristol, he says, these representative governments in North America grew up he knew not how. There they were. The people left this country with those feelings of pride and attachment to liberty which were the boast of the mother country. They began with municipal institutions; and distance, and absence, and the control of local circumstances increased them, and from small beginnings, into representative communities. This was the natural growth of these institutions. Those nations which have Colonies must expect this to be the ultimate result."

The right hon. Baronet says—

"Now I am strongly inclined to think that the germ of a representative government in a Colony ought to be in these municipalities, widening their sphere by degrees, according as the land became settled and peopled. I doubt whether that would not be the safer mode, than that of establishing among so thin a population a representative government that would require the people of Auckland and of Wellington to meet together, separated as they are by such a great distance. That will be one of the subjects which will be referred to the consideration of the able man whom we have appointed to govern that Colony."

This was satisfactory, and we have a right to expect that the result of this statement will be that means should be taken for the establishment of municipal institutions in the Colony—of institutions exercising not merely the power of borough institutions in this country, but which should, in each locality, supply the place of a general representative body for the general purposes of government. If there be any meaning in the language of the right hon. Baronet, that was what he meant; and the colonists of New Zealand had a right to expect municipal institutions similar to those to which Mr. Burke referred as having existed in America, and possessing all the powers necessary for supplying the wants of Government which those small communities required. If this was not the interpretation of the right hon. Baronet's language, what did he mean by the phrase, "I think that the germ of a representative government in a Colony ought to be in their municipalities, widening their sphere by degrees, as the land became settled and peopled?" What was the meaning of this? Did it mean merely that they were to appoint mayors and aldermen, with the power to make regulations for paving and lighting, in a country where no such things were needed—where, in fact, there were no regular roads? Or did it mean that the institutions about to be established were to be like the old American institutions, to supply the place of larger and more general institutions? What he understood from the right hon. Baronet was, that the great difficulty was not the fitness of New Zealand for representative institutions, but that the widely scattered and divided state of the Colony rendered it extremely inconvenient, if not impossible, to carry on the government by means of a parliament meeting in any particular settlement. But is it possible to understand from the speech of the right hon. Baronet, that there is to be no change in the government of New Zealand at all? I am not unreasonable—I do not say that they should have based those new institutions upon the example of the House of Commons, or of any other legislative assembly. I should have been perfectly satisfied if they had been based on the principles of representative government, leaving the people in each locality to govern themselves, as suggested by the right hon. Baronet. This would have been sufficient to have secured a better system of government for the future; and something of this kind, from the statement of the right hon. Baronet, the people of New Zealand had a right to expect. But what did they get from the noble Secretary for the Colonies? The noble Lord, in his instructions to Governor Grey said—

"For these, among other reasons, I think the admission of the representative system is for the present impracticable."

This was Lord Stanley's mode of carrying out the right hon. Baronet's intentions. He says:—

"For these, among other reasons, I think the admission of the representative system is for the present impracticable; and I would, therefore, have you direct your attention and that of the colonists to the formation of local municipal bodies, with considerable powers of taxation for local purposes, and of making the necessary by-laws."

This meant, powers similar to those possessed by every borough town in England; that was, they were to have the power of making regulations for paving and lighting, and passing by-laws, "leaving," continues the noble Lord, "the more general powers of legislation vested in the Council, as at present constituted." And how is that Council constituted? It is composed of the Governor, of three officers removable at the pleasure of the Governor, and paid by the Governor, and of those persons nominated by the Governor removable at pleasure, and who are threatened with removal the moment they venture to vote against the Governor. This is the approach they are to have towards the representative system. Taken in connexion with the promises held out by the right hon. Baronet, what unmeaning language is that of the noble Lord's despatch containing those instructions to Captain Grey? What powers does it confer upon the colonists of self-government? It gives nothing but the power of paving and lighting. Is this a boon? They, the colonists, do not want it—the Nelson people tell us that they do not require any such power; what they want is the fulfilment of the promises of the Government of representative government; and the way in which the Government, or rather the noble Lord (Lord Stanley) fulfils those promises, is to confer the powers of providing for paving and lighting on people who need nothing of the kind. How do the noble Lord's instructions tend to carry out the right hon. Baronet's promises? What guarantee have the colonists, that the Colony will be governed by good laws for the future—that there should be an effectual administration of justice, and the adoption of a sound policy as to the land titles in New Zealand? What security have they for the imposition of wise taxes, and the adoption of a sound and effectual fiscal system; or what guarantee have they against a repetition of the absurdities of unwise Governors—of such absurdities as have been committed by Governor Hobson, Governor Shortland, and Governor Fitzroy; and in what respect will such institutions as the noble Lord is about to establish, be the germ of representative institutions, or how will they pave the way for any representative institutions whatever? Contrast the promises of the right hon. Baronet with their fulfilment by Lord Stanley. The right hon. Baronet said New Zealand was in a fit condition for representative government; and the colonists should have it, as far as possible, under their peculiar circumstances, given to them.

"You cannot," said the right hon. Baronet, "have one parliament as we have in this country, but you should have several municipal institutions, which should answer the purpose of a parliament, and by which each locality should be governed."

And he carried on the analogy still further, by likening those institutions to the old institutions of the States of North America, one of which institutions was that which had been given by charter to Rhode Island; and by which, until within the last five years, it had been governed, though constituting one of the States of the Union. Lord Stanley, however, says, that New Zealand was not fit for representative government; but he says he will give local bodies to the Colony with power to make by-laws; but the general power of legislation is still to vest in the Council as before. What security have we for the fulfilment of the promises of the right hon. Baronet? Literally, none whatever. I will now proceed to another promise held out by the right hon. Baronet. It was admitted, on all hands, that it was most desirable that the disputes between the New Zealand Company and the Colonial Office, should be put an end to. With respect to the New Zealand Company, I must say, at once, I think it would be important to maintain that body in the full exercise of its powers, not mixing itself up in affairs of State, or exercising control, but as a great commercial company, acting on liberal principles, and lending its aid to the Government in devising means for emigration. I do not despair that that relation will be established between the Government and the New Zealand Company, and, without committing to that body any powers of administration, that it will subsist as a company for the future, acting in concert and harmony with the Government, as the great instrument for effecting emigration. Now, for the Company to be useful as an instrument for carrying on emigration, what was the first essential for the security of every colonist in New Zealand? Why, the settlement of the land claims. But on this point, they were left in the same position as before. After all their negotiations with Lord Stanley, the Company were in the same position as they were before these negotiations commenced, except in one particular, and so far as that was concerned they were rather in a worse condition. What the Company claimed was a grant of land, which they contended they were entitled to immediately on the making of the award of Mr. Pennethorn, and which they claimed under the agreement made with Lord John Russell. In 1843, the Company accepted, with much reluctance, and after having more than once refused them, the terms proposed by Lord Stanley, whereby they were to have a conditional title to their land, that title to be granted at once, without going to the Commissioners' court; but to be subject to whatever claim the natives or other persons might hereafter bring forward against them on account of such land. This, no doubt, was a much worse title than that which they had a right to look for under the agreement with Lord John Russell. It was undoubtedly less satisfactory than the title they claimed, but which they found they could not obtain.

It was quite clear that a title open to dispute by any one who could establish a prior right, was of less value in the market than one that was free from any such conditions. But the Company accepted that title, because circumstances induced them to place reliance on the good intentions of the Government, and because they thought that this reliance being shared in by the public, they would be enabled to effect their land sales, and proceed with the work of colonization; but, above all, because the Government complied with the condition he had named, this important one, that they would do their best to relieve the Company from the native claims, and to assist as far as they could in converting this conditional title into an absolute one. If the agreement had been fulfilled in February, 1844, the Company would have been enabled to carry on their land sales, and by the present time, the Government acting on good faith in removing the difficulties as to title, and carrying out their promise of assisting the Company in inducing the native claimants to accept compensation, the conditional title would have been converted into an absolute one. But another circumstance which made them unwilling to accept a conditional title, as proposed by Lord Stanley, instead of the one to which they were entitled under the previous agreement, was, that they had already an award from the Commissioners recognising their claims to the land, and with that award in their favour, it was hardly to be supposed that, in renewing their negotiations with the Colonial Office after the 20th of June, 1845, they would accept a nominal and conditional title for that which by the award they were entitled to without any such condition. It was quite clear if they had in 1845 accepted a mere nominal title, it would have been no fulfilment of the agreement of 1843, and that it would have been much better for the Company to have stood upon Lord Stanley's own interpretation of Lord John Russell's instructions. This matter had been fully discussed by the New Zealand Company before they entered into communication with Lord Stanley; and it was distinctly understood by the deputation who waited upon the noble Lord, that they were not at liberty to treat upon the basis of any conditional title. In the course of the interview, Lord Stanley's attention was called to the subject of the awards. They urged that Lord Stanley had put in a condition which had never before been heard of in the whole course of the controversy—a condition which must destroy any advantage that might else arise; for the noble Lord insisted that not only should there be an award in favour of the Company by the Commissioners, but that that award must be accepted by the natives, and that they were to be satisfied with the compensation awarded to them; that was to say, that the decision of the judge was only to have effect when it was satisfactory to both parties. That was the effect of the instructions of Lord Stanley as to the land which had been awarded to the Company without condition a year ago. This condition, however, only attached to one-third of the Company's land. And with regard to the other two-thirds, what did Lord Stanley offer? Merely the conditional title of May, 1843. And how was that offer made? Not a word was said to the deputation about it. He looked through the minutes of the negotiations between the Directors and Lord Stanley, and could find not one word about this conditional title mentioned from beginning to end. Lord Stanley says, he shows the Directors the instructions he has given to the Governor of New Zealand as to the land titles; but in those instructions, which were those of the 7th of July, there was not one word said about the conditional title. Everything turned upon the award; they never heard one word about the conditional title until the mail had gone out—until the instructions had been forwarded, and the negotiations between the Company and the noble Lord had been put an end to; and then it was that they for the first time heard of the instructions of the 27th of June, directing Captain Grey to give only a conditional title. What was this but the old story over again—that was, of one set of instructions shown before the despatches were sent out, and another afterwards. He wished not to be understood as making any charge of bad faith against the Government, for it was clear nothing could be gained by faith in these respects, except, perhaps, to avoid an inconvenient discussion; but, nevertheless, it was a very great hardship upon the Company that instructions were sent out upon a most important point in regard to their interests, of which they had no knowledge until it was too late to make any representation or remonstrance against them, and after those parties who had waited on Lord Stanley on behalf of the Company, had been told that the instructions shown to them were all that were to be sent out. The Company thought they were communicating unreservedly with Lord Stanley (for that was the phrase used by the noble Lord); they were led to believe that all the instructions were shown to them. And though I do not impute bad faith—though I am willing to believe that this arose from carelessness or mistake—that if bad faith had been intended, the Company could not have been placed in a worse position than they are, in consequence of that carelessness and mistake. And I say further, that this was a mistake which ought not to occur on the part of an important public Department twice on the same subject in two successive years. The former discussions in this House should have made Lord Stanley more cautious; and I say, that a person who repeatedly manage the business of a great public Department in so loose and careless a manner, is not fit to conduct satisfactorily the Colonial Department of the Government of this country. I must refer to another point, as showing the spirit in which the noble Lord has carried on the controversy, while the Company were indulging in the hope that both parties might now join in settling the question at issue, and put an end to the disputes which had unfortunately so long existed between the Colonial Office and the Company. In the minutes of the interview with Lord Stanley, I perceive a determination, on the part of the noble Lord, to deny the claims—the most obvious claims of the Company. In these minutes is this passage:—

"Reference having been made in these discussions to the additional payments required from the Company, either by the awards of the Commissioner of the Court of Claims, or by directions of the Governor, the deputation incidentally remarked, that as a matter of course, the Company would, in consideration of all such payments, be entitled to land at the rate mentioned in the agreement of November, 1840—namely, four acres for every pound sterling; and that a similar claim would arise in respect to all payments for purchases of land required to be made for the fulfilment of that agreement. Lord Stanley expressed some surprise at this claim, and intimated that he was not then prepared to admit its validity."

Now, a more reasonable claim could not have been made. The original agreement was, that the Company should be entitled to four acres of land for every pound expended by them; that was the condition as contained in the original draft of the agreement. But the Company said, you must not limit us to what we have actually expended; for there are many expenses which we are liable to, and much more money will be expended; and the agreement was ultimately made to the effect, that, in consideration of this liability, the Company should be entitled to four acres of land for every pound they had expended on the Colony, or were liable to expend; and he could not conceive any more distinct and actual liability than the money they were called upon to pay on account of compensation to the natives. I find in a letter of the 24th of August, this question distinctly put to the Commissioner by Mr. Wakefield. He asked whether it were intended to recommend a further allotment of land to the Company, and upon the same terms of four acres for every pound expended, on account of the further compensation which they were required by the awards to pay to the native claimants? And the answer of the Commissioner was most distinct—that he did intend to recommend that a proportionate quantity of land should be awarded to the Company upon the terms stated, for the money so paid. This was in the letter of Commissioner Spain, of the 24th of August, 1842. I refer to this, not because the amount is great—I believe it would not be more than 24,000 or 25,000 acres altogether—but to show that Lord Stanley has been carrying on the controversy in the same spirit of opposition to the Company as he had all along exhibited; and in that spirit he now refused to carry out the award of his own Commissioner. But we have still better evidence of the spirit by which that noble Lord has been actuated in these matters. Since the debate in this House, the noble Lord has taken an opportunity of publicly stating his opinions on the subject. Did he, on that occasion, express any intention of fulfilling any of the promises made by his right hon. Colleague? He did not. The whole tenor of the noble Lord's speech was a declaration of obstinate adherence to the worst principles of his own policy. The view which the noble Lord took of the Treaty of Waitangi, and which he declared his intention of enforcing, was wholly incompatible with the colonization of New Zealand. I can only regard the speech of the noble Lord as an answer to the speeches of the two right hon. Baronets, his Colleagues, which they made in this House. The noble Lord asserted that the whole of the misunderstanding had been caused by the misrepresentations of the New Zealand Company to Lord John Russell as to the land. Now, these remarks of the noble Lord were unbecoming; more especially after the statement had been denied, and the noble Lord had been defied over and over again to point out when and how such misrepresentations had been made. Lord Stanley had been challenged to do this at the commencement of the controversy; but he had never done so to the present hour. Another point in the speech of the noble Lord surprised me even more, and that was his declaration to adhere to the Treaty of Waitangi in its fullest integrity. The noble Lord said—
